COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR, NOURSE AND WOOLF LJJ

Admiralty – Jurisdiction – Action in rem – Claim arising in respect of goods or materials supplied to a ship for her operation or maintenance – Goods supplied to a ship for her operation – Containers – Agreement by plaintiffs to hire containers for use on defendants' cargo-carrying ships – Plaintiffs delivering containers to depots for filling by shippers – Containers used interchangeably on ships owned or chartered by defendants – Whether containers 'goods supplied to a ship for her operation' – Whether claim in respect of container agreement falling within jurisdiction of Admiralty Court – Supreme Court Act 1981, ss 20(2)(m), 21(4).

The plaintiffs entered into an agreement with the defendant shipping line to lease to them containers for use on their cargo-carrying vessels. Under the terms of the agreement the containers were delivered direct to shippers at specified depots to be filled and were used interchangeably on a number of vessels which were either owned or chartered by the defendants. Subsequently, the plaintiffs issued a writ in rem claiming, inter alia, damages for breach of the agreement and one of the defendants' ships was arrested. Under s 20(2)(m)^a of the Supreme Court Act 1981 the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction regarding 'any claim in respect of goods . . . supplied to a ship for her operation' and by s 21(4)^b an action in rem could be brought against the ship in connection with which the claim arose or against any other ship in the same entire beneficial ownership or chartered to the same person under a charter by demise, so long as that person would have been liable on the claim if the action had been brought in personam. The defendants applied for the writ to be struck out and the ship released from arrest, on the ground that the plaintiffs' claim did not lie within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. The judge dismissed the application, holding that the containers were goods supplied to a ship for her operation and that accordingly the plaintiffs' claim fell within s 20(2)(m) of the 1981 Act. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Held – In order to maintain an action under s 20(2)(m) of the 1981 Act it was necessary to demonstrate a sufficiently direct connection between the agreement relied on and the operation of the ship. Since the true purpose of the leasing agreement was to enable the defendants to meet the convenience of shippers in providing packaging for all their cargoes, the containers had not been shown to be sufficiently closely connected with the operation of the defendants' ships, or with any ships, so as to bring the plaintiffs' claim within s 20(2)(m). Furthermore (per Sir John Donaldson MR and Woolf LJ), it had not been established, for the purposes of s 21(4) of the 1981 Act, that when the cause of action arose the defendants were the beneficial owners or charterers of a ship or ships to which the plaintiffs' claim related, and accordingly there was insufficient evidence to justify the ship's arrest under s 21(4). It followed that the plaintiffs' claim did not come within the

The defendants, Nigerian National Shipping Line (NNSL), the owners of the River Rima, appealed against the order of Sheen J dated 3 April 1987 whereby (i) he refused the defendants' application to set aside the writ issued in rem against the River Rima by the plaintiffs, Tiphook Container Rental Co Ltd, and discharge the vessel from arrest and (ii) declared that the plaintiffs' claim for damages for, inter alia, breach of their agreement with the defendants for the hire of cargo containers fell within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson MR. e

Richard Aikens QC and L E Persey for NNSL.

Jonathan Sumption QC and Mark Hapgood for the plaintiffs. f

At the conclusion of the argument Sir John Donaldson MR announced that the appeal would be allowed for reasons to be given later. g

1 May. The following judgments were delivered.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR. The River Rima is a Nigerian vessel registered in Lagos and owned by the Nigerian National Shipping Line (NNSL). In terms of design, she is what is called a 'combo' vessel, being equipped to carry both containers and general dry cargo. Since August 1986 she has been continuously under arrest at the suit of various parties and is berthed in the port of Liverpool. The arrest with which we are concerned was instigated by Tiphook Container Rental Co Ltd, who, on 9 March 1987, issued a writ in rem claiming damages for the conversion of certain containers leased to NNSL and further damages for breach of an obligation to maintain the containers in good condition and repair. h

The issue in the appeal is not whether these claims are well founded but whether they can be maintained in an action in rem. That jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is governed, so far as is material, by ss 20 and 21 of the Supreme Court Act 1981. j a Section 20(2) contains an exhaustive list of 'questions and claims' in lettered paragraphs, most of which can found an action in rem (s 21(2) and (4)). The particular lettered paragraphs relied on in the instant case are the following:

'(m) any claim in respect of goods or materials supplied to a ship for her operation or maintenance; (n) any claim in respect of the construction, repair or equipment of a ship or in respect of dock charges or dues.'

b However, for completeness, and because it might be thought by anyone who was unfamiliar with the decision of the House of Lords in Gatol International Inc v Arkwright-Boston Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Co [1985] 1 All ER 129, [1985] AC 255 to be a more obvious basis for the plaintiffs' claims, I should also mention para (h), which reads:

c 'any claim arising out of any agreement relating to the carriage of goods in a ship or to the use or hire of a ship.'

d The relevant facts are within a small compass and are largely undisputed. NNSL own a number of vessels capable of carrying containerised cargoes. They also have a number of contracts whereby NNSL lease containers from their owners, including one with the plaintiffs. That with the plaintiffs specified daily rates of hire for the containers, together with handling and other charges. It also specified various depots throughout the world at which containers can be picked up and redelivered. It is wholly silent as to the use to be made of the containers by NNSL, whether by land or by sea. However this omission is to some extent made good by an affidavit sworn by Mr Abdullah Abubakar, the Liverpool line manager of NNSL, who deposed as follows:

e '... 6. The procedure regarding the hire of the containers is as follows. As and when the containers are required, N.N.S.L. contact their container leasing agents—all current leasing is now dealt with by Scamar of Paris. The agents then arrange for the containers to be leased and to be delivered to the location where they are required, normally direct to the shippers so that the containers can be stuffed, and sometimes to a container terminal. 7. The containers will be carried by an N.N.S.L. vessel if such is available. However, if no N.N.S.L. vessel is available, they will be carried aboard any other vessel which is available with N.N.S.L. being named as the shipper on the Bill of Lading... 9. I am informed by Mr. Alegbeleye, the Hamburg Line Manager of N.N.S.L., that containers leased to N.N.S.L. have been used by Nigerian Green Line (a participating member of both Conference lines) over the last six months by way of an agreement reached between N.N.S.L. and Nigerian Green Line Limited. 10. Accordingly, I verily believe that the containers hired by N.N.S.L. are for the use of the company and not by way of supplies to N.N.S.L. vessels, for their operation or otherwise. The containers are for the convenience of the various shippers utilising N.N.S.L. services...'

h Sheen J held that the court had no jurisdiction under para (n), which in his judgment covered only 'items which become part of the ship or are carried permanently'. That part of his decision is now accepted. However, he held that para (m) did give the court jurisdiction, the containers being 'goods... supplied to a ship for her operation'. In reply to the argument that the operation of a ship involved only moving the ship from port to port, he said:

j 'It seems to me that the words "for her operation" cannot be construed so narrowly that they are confined to the meaning which [counsel for NNSL] submitted should be attached to them, namely "in order that the ship could operate, in the sense of moving from port to port". [NNSL's] ships are operated for commercial purposes. They are only profit earning when carrying cargo. NNSL took on hire containers solely for the purpose of increasing the profit earned by each ship by reducing the time taken to load and unload the cargo and also for the purpose of reducing the number of men employed in those operations. All these considerations are related to the efficiency of [NNSL's] commercial activity in the operation of their ships. The operation of a ship must be viewed as a complete commercial operation . . . [NNSL], as shipowners, operate their ships for the purpose of earning money by carrying goods from one port to another, and for no other purpose. The only purpose for which [NNSL] hired the containers, supplied by the plaintiffs, and carried them in their ships was and is to facilitate that operation. The House of Lords has held that an agreement for the hire of containers is not an agreement relating to the carriage of goods in a ship. Having eliminated the relationship to the carriage of goods the containers must have been hired by [NNSL] and supplied by the plaintiffs for the operation of the ship. Accordingly, I agree with the decision of the Rotterdam District Court that containers leased to shipowners are goods supplied for the operation of their ships.' a

Accordingly he dismissed an application for the writ to be set aside and for the arrest of the vessel to be discharged. NNSL have appealed and, at the conclusion of the argument, we announced that the appeal would be allowed, but indicated that we would give our reasons for this decision at a later date. This I now do. b

There is no doubt that the judge was much influenced by the decision of the District Court of Rotterdam in The River Jimini (29 June 1984, unreported) to which he referred and by the desirability of there being a common international approach to the Admiralty jurisdiction of courts. In this he was clearly right. The International Convention relating to the Arrest of Sea-going Ships (Brussels, 10 May 1952; TS 47 (1960); Cmnd 1128), which has been ratified by Great Britain, was intended to have just this effect and the relevant sections of the Supreme Court Act 1981 and their predecessors in the Administration of Justice Act 1956 were intended to give effect to the convention. Nevertheless, it is not yet the case that there is any established body of law as to the meaning of art 1(1)(k) of the Brussels convention, which is the equivalent of para (m). c

The River Jimini was also owned by NNSL and the claim related to containers leased to them. The decision of the Rotterdam court was provisional in nature: d

'For the time being it must be . . . assumed that [the claimant] is right to allege that the claim for which the attachment has been made is a claim under maritime law in the sense of the Brussels treaty.' e

Furthermore, it did no more than decide that 'supplied' in the paragraph did not necessarily denote a change in ownership and that it was no obstacle to the application of the paragraph that the containers were not delivered on board the ship and were not used exclusively on board. As the judge pointed out, containers are 'stuffed' ashore and, to facilitate this process, carriers often make suitable containers available to shippers for later carriage on their own ships. In The River Jimini, the containers concerned appear all to have been intended for carriage, and were in fact carried, on board that vessel or on board her sister ships. By contrast, in the instant case the containers were in practice carried by vessels in other ownerships, if NNSL vessels were not available. f

There are two interrelated obstacles in the way of the plaintiffs. The first arises under para (m) itself and the second under s 21(4) of the 1981 Act which gives effect to the right to arrest sister ships contained in the Brussels convention. g

As there is no clear connection between the containers, the subject matter of the action, and the River Rima or indeed any particular ship, the plaintiffs are driven to argue that the effect of s 6 of the Interpretation Act 1978 is to cause para (m) to be read as 'any claim in respect of goods or materials supplied to a ship or ships for her or their operation or maintenance' and that accordingly it matters not what ship or ships were involved or that it or they may not have been owned by NNSL. This is not necessarily correct, because the presumption that words in the singular include the plural only applies 'unless the contrary intention appears'. h

Assuming that it is correct, the plaintiffs still have to bring themselves with s 21(4), which is in the following terms:

In the case of any such claim as is mentioned in section 20(2)(e) to (r), where—(a) the claim arises in connection with a ship; and (b) the person who would be liable on the claim in an action in personam ("the relevant person") was, when the cause of action arose, the owner or charterer of, or in possession or in control of, the ship, an action in rem may (whether or not the claim gives rise to a maritime lien on that ship) be brought in the High Court against—(i) that ship, if at the time when the action is brought the relevant person is either the beneficial owner of that ship as respects all the shares in it or the charterer of it under a charter by demise; or (ii) any other ship of which, at the time when the action is brought, the relevant person is the beneficial owner as respects all the shares in it.'

Applying this section, I turn to para (a) and ask myself in connection with what ship or ships the claim arises. The answer must be: ships in the ownership of NNSL or other ships in different ownerships by which the containers have been or are to be carried under bills of lading naming NNSL as the shippers. I then turn to para (b) and ask myself whether NNSL was, when the cause of action arose, the owner or charterer of, or in possession or control of, that ship or those ships. The answer is: probably, but not necessarily. This answer is insufficient to justify the application of s 21(4), without which the issue of a writ in rem and the consequential arrest cannot be upheld.

There is a further obstacle in the way of the plaintiffs which arises from para (m) viewed in isolation, namely the construction and application to the facts of this case of the words 'supplied to a ship [or ships] for her [or their] operation'. Like the judge of the Rotterdam court, I am not impressed either by the fact that the containers were not sold to NNSL, an objection which would apply to much electronic equipment on vessels, or by the fact that the containers were not delivered directly on board. But it does have to be shown that the containers were leased to NNSL for the operation of the ship or ships. In a broad 'loosely woven' sense this is no doubt true. As Sheen J pointed out, containerisation is encouraged by shipowners because it makes cargo handling easier and quicker and in some circumstances increases the cargo-carrying capacity of the ship by making deck storage available for goods which otherwise could not be so carried. But it can equally, and as I think more cogently, be said that the purpose of supplying containers is to meet the convenience of shippers by providing them with ready-made packaging for their goods, something which has nothing to do with the operation of the ship. So viewed, para (h) becomes much more relevant than para (m). The containers were leased by NNSL in relation to the carriage of goods in a ship, whether this was for the profit or convenience of the shippers or the carriers or both.

It is at this point that it becomes necessary to consider the decision of the House of Lords in Gatol International Inc v Arkwright-Boston Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Co [1985] 1 All ER 129, [1985] AC 255 and The Sonia S [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 63. In The Sonia S Sheen J was confronted with a claim identical to that of the plaintiffs in the present case, save that there was no suggestion that the containers would be carried in any ships other than those of the defendants. The arrest was sought to be justified under paras (h), (m) and (n). Sheen J upheld the arrest under para (h), no doubt thinking that this was the firmest basis, and gave no ruling on the application of para (m) or (n). He said ([1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 63 at 65):

'It is said on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiffs' claim in this action is a claim for money due under a leasing agreement and is no more than a claim for rental of certain containers. The defendants contend that the Court should not look further than that. I do not take that view. The reality of the agreement is quite clear. This is a claim by the owners of containers against shipowners to whom they lease these containers, quite clearly to enable the shipowners to provide a service to their customers. That was a service or facility to enable the customers to pack their own goods in containers and thereafter for those goods to be carried by sea in the defendants' ships and ultimately to their destination, whether at a port or inland. It seems to me that the claim arises out of an agreement which relates to the carriage of goods in a ship. It relates to it, as I have said, because the only purpose of the agreement was for the shipowners to provide for their customers the facility of packing their own goods, and for no purpose other than to have those goods carried in a ship.'

Then after referring to The Jade, The Eschersheim [1976] 1 All ER 920, [1976] 1 WLR 430 and quoting from the speech of Lord Diplock, the judge continued:

'By parity of reasoning the only possible use for these containers which was contemplated by the parties to this agreement was that they would be used for the carriage of goods in one of the defendants' ships. I have no doubt that this is a claim arising out of an agreement relating to the carriage of goods.'

However, in Gatol International Inc v Arkwright-Boston Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Co [1985] 1 All ER 129 at 137, [1985] AC 255 at 271 Lord Keith, giving the leading speech, said:

'I consider that in The Sonia S there was likewise an insufficiently direct connection between the agreement for the hire of containers and the carriage of goods in a ship. There is clear fallacy in the reasoning of Sheen J in the latter part of his judgment, where he equates the use to which the containers were to be put with the use to which the salvage vessel was to be put in The Jade, The Eschersheim. The salvage vessel there was a ship which was to be used under the salvage agreement. The containers were not a ship. In my opinion that decision was wrong and should be overruled.'

In the Gatol case, underwriters were seeking to arrest a ship in order to recover insurance premiums due under a cargo policy and were relying on the equivalent of para (h). The House of Lords held that, even allowing that 'relating to' had a broader or looser connotation than 'for' which is the relevant participle in para (m), the agreement sued on must have a reasonably direct connection with the carriage of goods in a ship and that a contract of insurance was not connected with the carriage of goods in a ship in a sufficiently direct sense to be capable of falling within para (h). Consistently with that strict approach, I consider that I must hold that this leasing agreement between the plaintiffs and NNSL, whilst no doubt designed to enable NNSL to provide a service for cargo-owners, to encourage the routing of cargo via NNSL and to enable NNSL to handle cargo more easily in cases in which they were themselves the carriers, is not sufficiently directly connected with the operation of ships to enable me to say that the containers were supplied by the plaintiffs to NNSL 'for the operation of a ship or ships'.

For these reasons I was in favour of allowing the appeal, setting aside the writ and discharging the vessel from arrest, subject to the rights of various caveators.

NOURSE LJ. I agree. Counsel for the plaintiffs accepted Sheen J's decision that the claim made in this action does not fall within para (n) of s 20(2) of the Supreme Court Act 1981. Moreover, the disapproval of the decision of the same judge in The Sonia S [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 63 by the House of Lords in Gatol International Inc v Arkwright-Boston Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Co [1985] 1 All ER 129, [1985] AC 255, although I would respectfully doubt whether that disapproval was necessary to their Lordships' decision, precluded counsel for the plaintiffs from asking this court to hold that the claim falls within para (h). That meant that he was left only with para (m), which is in these terms:

'Any claim in respect of goods or materials supplied to a ship for her operation or maintenance.'

- a Counsel for the plaintiffs referred us to the statutory predecessors of para (m), which before the enactment of s 1 of the Administration of Justice Act 1956 applied to 'necessaries' supplied to a ship as interpreted by authority, in particular by The Riga (1872) LR 3 A & E 516. He relied on the view expressed by Brandon J in The Fairport (No 5) [1967] 2 Lloyd's Rep 162 to the effect that claims under para (m) are certainly no narrower than claims which were formerly described as claims for necessities under the earlier legislation. While that no doubt is correct, I would myself think that each case must be
- b considered on its own facts, in order to see whether the claim which is made is one in respect of goods or materials supplied to a ship for her operation or maintenance.

- In the present case there can be no doubt that the containers were 'goods'. I am also prepared to accept that it is possible to conceive of a state of affairs in which they would have been goods supplied to a ship for her operation. The question is whether the existence of that state of affairs is disclosed by the evidence. In my judgment it is not. I
- c do not think that the containers can fairly be said to have been 'supplied to a ship'. I do not think it conclusive that the lease agreement did not link the user of the containers with NNSL's ships, or indeed with any ship. I would agree that you must look at all the facts together. But when you do that you find that the containers were delivered, not to a ship, but to the location where they were required, normally direct to the shippers so that they could be stuffed by them. That suggests to me that they were supplied not to
- d the ship but to the shippers, and I do not think that that reality was transformed into something different by the fact that they were leased to the shipowner and not to the shippers. All that that meant was that the shipowner provided the shippers with a facility for the more convenient shipment of their goods. It did not mean that the containers were supplied to the ship.

- e On that short ground I too was in favour of allowing this appeal. I prefer to express no view as to the effect of s 21(4) of the 1981 Act.

- WOOLF LJ. I agree that the appeal should be allowed. For the reasons given by both Sir John Donaldson MR and Nourse LJ the claim does not fall within para (m) of s 20(2) of the Supreme Court Act 1981. In addition, for the reasons set out in the judgment of
- f Sir John Donaldson MR the claim does not fall within s 21(4) of the 1981 Act. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to bring and enforce the proceedings in rem.

Appeal allowed.

Secretary of State for the Home Department v Oxford Regional Mental Health Review Tribunal and another

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH, LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK, LORD ACKNER, LORD OLIVER OF AYLMERTON AND LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY

9, 29 JULY 1987

Mental health – Mental health review tribunal – Discharge of restricted patient – Discharge – Decision directing conditional discharge of restricted patient – Direction subject to arrangements being made for support of patient – Whether decision directing conditional discharge a provisional or final decision – Whether tribunal having power to reconsider decision – Whether decision vitiated by failure to inform Secretary of State of date of hearing – Mental Health Act 1983, s 73(2)(7).

The appellant, who was a restricted patient under the Mental Health Act 1983, applied to a mental health review tribunal under s 73⁴ of that Act to be discharged from hospital. The tribunal heard the application but, contrary to the requirements of the Mental Health Review Tribunal Rules 1983, failed to inform the Secretary of State of the date of hearing. The tribunal directed that the appellant be conditionally discharged under s 73(2) but that the discharge be deferred under s 73(7) to enable suitable arrangements to be made for the appellant's care. The Secretary of State applied for judicial review of the tribunal's decision, contending that the failure to notify him of the hearing amounted to a breach of natural justice. The judge dismissed the application, holding that a tribunal's decision under s 73(2) and (7) was merely provisional and the tribunal could therefore reconvene to cure any breach of the rules and reconsider their decision. On appeal by the Secretary of State, the Court of Appeal held that the tribunal's decision to direct a conditional discharge was final and could not be reconsidered once made and therefore since the Secretary of State had not been given the opportunity to make representations the decision was vitiated. The appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

Held – Where a mental health review tribunal satisfied themselves that a restricted patient should be conditionally discharged pursuant to s 73(2) of the 1983 Act but directed, pursuant to s 73(7), that the conditional discharge be deferred, the tribunal were not entitled later to reconsider the question whether the patient should in fact be conditionally discharged, because the purpose of the deferment under s 73(7) was merely to enable arrangements to be made to satisfy the conditions imposed. Accordingly, the tribunal were not entitled to reconvene to reconsider whether the appellant should be discharged. It followed that their original decision was vitiated by the failure to inform the Secretary of State of the date of hearing. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 11 e, p 12 c to g and p 13 j to p 14 b, post).

Per curiam. Where a tribunal directs that a patient's conditional discharge be deferred, the deferment should not be to a fixed date but instead the decision should simply specify what arrangements are required and indicate that the direction is deferred until those arrangements have been made to the satisfaction of the tribunal (see p 13 g to p 14 b, post).

Appeal

- C*, a restricted patient detained at Broadmoor Hospital pursuant to ss 37 and 41 of and para 3 of Sch 5 to the Mental Health Act 1983, appealed pursuant to leave given by the b Appeal Committee of the House of Lords on 5 November 1986 against the decision of the Court of Appeal (Lawton, Stephen Brown LJ and Sir John Megaw) ([1986] 3 All ER 239, [1986] 1 WLR 1180) on 23 April 1986 allowing an appeal by the Secretary of State for the Home Department against the decision of Woolf J hearing the Crown Office list on 8 November 1985 whereby he dismissed an application by the Secretary of State for judicial review by way of (i) an order of certiorari to quash the decision of the Oxford
c Regional Mental Health Review Tribunal (president her Honour Judge Norwood) made on 12 February 1985 that the appellant be conditionally discharged, such discharge to be deferred until 28 June 1985 for proposals to meet the conditions to be prepared, and (ii) an order of mandamus requiring the tribunal to redetermine the appellant's application for review after receiving such supplementary observations as the Secretary of State might place before it. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bridge.

- d* David Sullivan QC and Oliver Thorold for the appellant.
Nigel Fleming for the Secretary of State.
 The tribunal were not represented.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

- e* 29 July. The following opinions were delivered.

- LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, the appellant, who is now 46 years old, suffers from psychopathic disorder as defined in s 1 of the Mental Health Act 1983. When he was 17 years old he sexually abused and strangled a six-year-old boy. He was
f acquitted of murder, but convicted of manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility. There being no power at that time to make a hospital order, he was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. He was released in 1965. In 1969 he became a voluntary patient at the West Middlesex Hospital and shortly thereafter was admitted to and detained at Broadmoor Hospital pursuant to s 26 of the Mental Health Act 1959. He disclosed that he had committed certain burglaries, of which he was in due course g convicted, and he was thereupon made subject to a hospital order under s 60 of the 1959 Act and a restriction order without limit of time under s 65. Those orders continue in force under the corresponding ss 37 and 41 of the 1983 consolidating Act.

- The Secretary of State has power under s 42 of the 1983 Act to order the discharge of a patient subject to a hospital order and a restriction order either absolutely or subject to conditions. On absolute discharge both the hospital order and the restriction order cease
h to have effect. A conditional discharge leaves the patient liable to recall by the Secretary of State, which, in effect, reactivates the hospital order and the restriction order. Under the 1959 Act it was only by the exercise of this executive discretion that such a patient could secure his discharge. But now such a patient (a 'restricted patient' within the definition of that phrase in Pt V of the 1983 Act) enjoys the benefit of one of the changes
j in the law effected by the Mental Health (Amendment) Act 1982 in that a mental health review tribunal is empowered to order his discharge under s 73 of the 1983 Act.

The provisions of s 73 of the 1983 Act on which this appeal depends, if written out in full to include in sub-s (1)(a) the words incorporated by reference from s 72(1)(b), read as follows:

'(1) Where an application to a Mental Health Review Tribunal is made by a restricted patient who is subject to a restriction order, or where the case of such a patient is referred to such a tribunal, the tribunal shall direct the absolute discharge of the patient if satisfied—(a)[(i) that he is not then suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment or from any of those forms of disorder of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment; or (ii) that it is not necessary for the health or safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment]; and (b) that it is not appropriate for the patient to remain liable to be recalled to hospital for further treatment. a

(2) Where in the case of any such patient as is mentioned in subsection (1) above the tribunal are satisfied as to the matters referred to in paragraph (a) of that subsection but not as to the matter referred to in paragraph (b) of that subsection the tribunal shall direct the conditional discharge of the patient . . .

(7) A tribunal may defer a direction for the conditional discharge of a patient until such arrangements as appear to the tribunal to be necessary for that purpose have been made to their satisfaction; and where by virtue of any such deferment no direction has been given on an application or reference before the time when the patient's case comes before the tribunal on a subsequent application or reference, the previous application or reference shall be treated as one on which no direction under this section can be given . . . c

The effects of absolute and conditional discharge by order of a mental health review tribunal are the same as those respectively of absolute and conditional discharge by the Secretary of State under s 42. In addition, the Secretary of State may add to the conditions imposed by the tribunal and may, from time to time, vary any conditions, whether imposed by the tribunal or by himself. e

In June 1984 the appellant applied to the Oxford Regional Mental Health Review Tribunal for his discharge. The procedure in relation to such an application is governed by the Mental Health Review Tribunal Rules 1983, SI 1983/942. I need not refer to them in any detail. In accordance with the rules, reports on the appellant by Dr Tidmarsh, the consultant psychiatrist who had been responsible for the care and treatment of the appellant at Broadmoor since 1981, were submitted to the tribunal. These were to the effect that discharge would be quite inappropriate. The Secretary of State, who is clearly the only party capable of representing any interest the public may have in opposing an application for discharge, notified the tribunal of his opposition. The tribunal heard and determined the application on 12 February 1985. In breach of the rules the Secretary of State was not given notice of the hearing. A report commissioned by the appellant's solicitor from Dr Russell Davis, a consultant psychiatrist who had seen the appellant for an aggregate of one and a half hours on two visits in January 1985, was put before the tribunal. This supported the application for discharge on the ground that the appellant's disorder was not 'of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained'. A copy of this report, dated 1 February 1985, was sent to the Secretary of State, as the rules require, but did not reach him until the very day of the tribunal's determination. Dr Tidmarsh, your Lordships were told, attended the hearing and was cross-examined by the solicitor appearing for the appellant. Dr Russell Davis did not attend. f

The determination of the tribunal is recorded in a document headed 'Decision of the Oxford Regional Mental Health Review Tribunal'. The operative part reads as follows:

'The Tribunal has considered the Patient's Application relating to the above named and hereby directs that:—This patient shall be conditionally discharged, such discharge to be deferred to Friday 28 June 1985, for proposals to meet the conditions to be prepared. The conditions shall be that:—1. The patient reside at and abide by the rules of a suitably supervised hostel which has an Active i

- a* Rehabilitation Programme. 2. The patient shall be placed under the supervision of a suitable Probation Officer or suitable Social Worker, who shall report from time to time as requested to the Home Office and the hospital referred to in condition 3.
3. The patient shall attend a Psychiatric Out-Patient Clinic as directed by a Consultant Psychiatrist yet to be nominated. The Tribunal is satisfied about these reasons because:—They were satisfied that this patient continues to suffer from Psychopathic Disorder but not of a nature [or] degree which makes it appropriate for him to be
- b* liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment but were satisfied that this patient should remain liable to recall.'

It has always been common ground that this decision was made in breach of the rules. What is more important is that there was here a breach of the most fundamental rule of natural justice, in that the Secretary of State, as a vitally interested party, was denied a c hearing. That is not in dispute.

On receiving notice of the tribunal's decision, the Secretary of State promptly applied by way of judicial review to have it quashed. On 8 November 1985 Woolf J refused the remedy sought on the ground that it was unnecessary and that the appropriate alternative remedy was for the tribunal to reopen the issue to the extent of considering the representations of the Secretary of State before finally determining the appellant's d application under s 73(7). The Secretary of State's appeal against this decision was allowed by the Court of Appeal (Lawton, Stephen Brown LJ and Sir John Megaw), who on 23 April 1986 quashed the tribunal's decision (see [1986] 3 All ER 239, [1986] 1 WLR 1180). The appellant now appeals by leave of your Lordships' House.

My Lords, whatever view be taken, as a matter of construction, of the interaction between sub-ss (2) and (7) of s 73, as to which Woolf J and the Court of Appeal differed, I e find it difficult to see how the tribunal's decision made in February 1985 can properly stand. Such a fundamental flaw as vitiated the proceedings leading to that decision must surely call for a complete rehearing de novo. If every issue remains open for decision under sub-s (7) and that provides the appropriate occasion for the rehearing, the earlier purported decision is at best irrelevant, at worst an embarrassment which the tribunal would have to do their best to put out of mind but which would make it difficult for

f justice to be seen to be done at a rehearing before the tribunal constituted as it was in February 1985. If the construction adopted by the Court of Appeal is right and there is no power under sub-s (7) to reopen any issue already decided under sub-s (2) the earlier decision must, of course, be quashed and that will enable the rehearing to take place, as the Court of Appeal thought that it should, before a differently constituted tribunal.

Counsel for the appellant was unable to suggest any avenue of escape from this

g dilemma. There is an inherent inconsistency in the argument advanced which, on the one hand, accepts that the 1985 proceedings were defective and relies on a rehearing under sub-s (7) to cure that defect, but, on the other hand, claims that the appellant is entitled to rely on the earlier decision in his favour which, though reversible, should be the point from which the rehearing ought to start. Though the earlier decision was made in breach of the rules of natural justice, which in a word means unfairly, it would

h nevertheless be unfair to the appellant, so it is said, to deprive him of the benefit of that decision, provisionally made in his favour, when the tribunal which made that decision reconsider it under sub-s (7). I am not persuaded by this argument.

I turn now to the question of the true construction of s 73 which your Lordships have to decide. The first issue which a mental health review tribunal must address on an

j application falling for determination under s 73 is whether they are satisfied as to one or other of the matters referred to in para (a) of sub-s (1). If they are so satisfied and also satisfied that the patient need not remain liable to recall it is mandatory under sub-s (1) that they shall direct his absolute discharge.

If the tribunal think the patient should remain liable to recall, they can only contemplate a conditional discharge under sub-s (2). Here the tribunal's satisfaction or lack of satisfaction as to one or other of the para (a) matters will, I think, inevitably be coloured by the conditions they have in mind to impose. Thus the answers to the questions arising out of sub-para (a)(i), whether or not the patient's disorder is 'of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in hospital for medical treatment', or sub-para (a)(ii), whether or not it is necessary for his own health or safety or for the protection of others 'that he should receive such treatment', which must here mean treatment under detention, may be vitally influenced by the conditions which are to be imposed to regulate his life style on release into the community. To take obvious examples suggested by the decision of the tribunal in this case, the tribunal may perfectly properly be satisfied that hospital detention is no longer necessary provided that the patient can be placed in a suitable hostel and required to submit to treatment as an out-patient by a suitable psychiatrist. These are matters to be secured by imposing appropriate conditions.

Once satisfied under sub-s (2) as to one or other of the matters referred to in para (a) of sub-s (1), it is mandatory that the tribunal 'shall direct the conditional discharge of the patient'. But if the tribunal are only able to be so satisfied by the imposition of conditions to which the patient will be subject on release, it is obvious that in many, perhaps most, cases some time must elapse between the decision that conditional discharge is appropriate and the effective order directing discharge of the patient, for the purpose of making the necessary practical arrangements to enable the patient to comply with the conditions, eg securing a suitable hostel placement for him and finding a suitable psychiatrist who is prepared to undertake his treatment as an out-patient. This seems to me to be the common sense of the matter and it is, I think, precisely for this purpose that the tribunal, being satisfied as required by sub-s (2), are given the option either to direct the immediate discharge of the patient under sub-s (2) or to defer that direction under sub-s (7). Unless a decision has first been reached under sub-s (2) that discharge on certain conditions is appropriate, I find it difficult to see what is envisaged by the words in sub-s (7) 'such arrangements as appear to the tribunal to be necessary for that purpose'. The purpose contemplated must surely be that of enabling the patient to comply with the conditions which the tribunal have already decided to impose. Conversely, when the tribunal have deferred a direction for the conditional discharge of the patient, the words of sub-s (7) which reserve to the tribunal the further decision as to whether the necessary arrangements 'have been made to their satisfaction' are wholly inapt to indicate a deferment of the decision whether the tribunal can be satisfied, as required under sub-s (2), of the matters on which a decision in favour of conditional discharge depends.

The contrary argument is that no direction for the conditional discharge of the patient can ever be given unless the tribunal are satisfied as required by sub-s (2) at the moment when the direction is given. Having deferred a direction under sub-s (7) the tribunal, it is submitted, not only may, but must, examine the whole issue afresh before the direction for discharge is given. If this were right, the two-stage procedure, which seems to be contemplated by sub-ss (2) and (7) and which, as it appears to me, is designed to serve the purpose I have suggested in the foregoing paragraph, would not seem to serve any useful purpose at all. Moreover, for reasons indicated earlier in this opinion this construction of s 73 would not avail the appellant in resisting an order to quash the decision of the tribunal in this case. But, to my mind, the conclusive refutation of this suggested construction is to be found in the second part of sub-s (7) following the semicolon. This provision contemplates (i) an application or reference leading to a deferred direction for conditional discharge and (ii) a further application or reference relating to the same patient coming before the tribunal before any direction for his conditional discharge has actually been given. In this situation it is provided that no direction may be given pursuant to the first application or reference. The effect of this is that the whole issue must be reopened pursuant to the second application or reference. If, as submitted on behalf of the appellant, the whole issue always remains at large following a deferred a direction for conditional discharge, this provision would be otiose. Its evident purpose is to ensure that, in the situation to which it applies, it will not be open to the tribunal when the second application or reference comes before them to say: 'We decided on the first application or reference in favour of conditional discharge but deferred giving the direction; being now satisfied that the necessary arrangements have been made for the purpose we now direct the conditional discharge of the patient pursuant to that application or reference and there is no necessity for us to consider the matter afresh pursuant to the new application or reference.'

b I think this provision, so interpreted, also meets the point, of which much was made in the argument, that, if the tribunal having deferred a direction under sub-s (7) have no power to reopen the issue under sub-s (2), they may be compelled to discharge a patient whose condition has deteriorated since the tribunal first considered the matter and made a deferred direction for conditional discharge. It may well be, I think, that the second c part of sub-s (7) is designed to meet this very contingency. But, whether that is so or not, it certainly enables the Secretary of State, when a deterioration in the condition of the patient is brought to his attention, to forestall the patient's discharge by exercising his power under s 71 of the 1983 Act to refer the patient's case to the tribunal afresh.

d My Lords, the conclusion I have expressed on the true construction of s 73 is one I have reached by considering the statute without reference to the rules. Both Woolf J at first instance and Sir John Megaw in the Court of Appeal relied substantially on the rules in support of the respective conclusions, which they reached on the meaning of the statute. I doubt, with respect, whether the rules are strictly available as an aid to construing the statute. But, on turning to the rules, I am comforted to find, as I think and as Sir John Megaw thought, that they have been drafted in a way which is wholly consistent with the interpretation of the 1983 Act which I prefer and inconsistent with e that urged on behalf of the appellant.

f Apart from the substantive issue, there was some discussion in argument of the form of the decision made by the tribunal on 12 February 1985. The members of the tribunal were not, of course, in any way responsible for the administrative failure to notify the Secretary of State of the hearing date, which vitiates their decision. If it had been made after the Secretary of State had had the opportunity to be heard, I should be minded to g criticise its form in only one substantial respect. Leaving aside pedantic quibbles over terminology, the document recording the decision in writing, as required by r 24(1) of the 1983 rules, makes clear in substance that it is what the rules call 'a deferred direction for conditional discharge in accordance with section 73(7) of the Act' (see r 2), and properly sets out the conditions to be imposed and the reasons for the tribunal's decision which show that they have applied their minds to and determined the issues arising h under s 73(2). My criticism is of the deferment to a fixed date. There is no authority for this in the Act or the rules and in the nature of the case it is impossible for a tribunal in making a deferred direction for conditional discharge to predict how long it will take to make the necessary arrangements. The decision should simply indicate that the direction is deferred until the necessary arrangements have been made to the satisfaction of the tribunal and specify what arrangements are required, which can normally be done, no i doubt, simply by reference to the conditions to be imposed. Whoever is responsible for making the arrangements should then proceed with all reasonable expedition to do so and should bring the matter to the attention of the tribunal again as soon as practicable after it is thought that satisfactory arrangements have been made. Pursuant to r 25 the tribunal may then decide that the arrangements are to their satisfaction without a further hearing.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR NICOLAS BROWNE-WILKINSON V-C, PARKER AND RALPH GIBSON LJJ

19 MARCH, 2 APRIL 1987 e

Libel and slander – Injunction – Interlocutory injunction – Justification – Defendant pleading justification – Plaintiff seeking injunction restraining publication – Truth of words published not in question – Words published in pursuance of conspiracy having sole or dominant purpose of injuring plaintiff – Whether injunction restraining further publication should be granted. f

By an exclusive supply agreement made in 1982 the defendants, who owned and operated a number of petrol stations, agreed to buy and the plaintiff, an oil company (G), agreed to sell all the petrol required for certain of the defendants' filling stations. Disputes arose between the parties over the terms of that agreement and in June 1986 G obtained judgment for over £500,000 on its claim for outstanding moneys due. In December 1986, in separate proceedings instituted by the defendants, the judge held that G was in breach of its agreement to supply petrol and ordered an inquiry as to the quantum of damages, which, it was not disputed, would probably be about £1,500. After judgment a document giving an account of the litigation and the judgment was circulated to a number of G's customers and on 18 March 1987 during a major race meeting a light aircraft hired by the defendants flew over the area towing a sign displaying the clearly visible words '[G] exposed in fundamental breach'. The aircraft could be seen both from G's head office and from the racecourse where G was entertaining a number of customers. g
The next day, after an exchange of telexes between the parties' solicitors, G applied for an interim injunction to restrain further display of the sign. The judge refused relief on the ground that the truth of the words was not in issue and that, in a libel action where a defendant intended to justify, interim relief was, as a matter of principle, never granted. h
G appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending that where there was clear evidence of a conspiracy to injure the principle had no application. j

Held – The principle that an interlocutory injunction would not be granted to restrain publication of defamatory material where the defendant intended to plead justification

a did not apply where the material was being published in pursuance of a conspiracy which had the sole or dominant purpose of injuring the plaintiff. In the circumstances, the occasion, scale and manner of publication was such that there was a prima facie case that it was carried out by the defendants as part of a concerted plan to inflict damage on G. Accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the injunction granted (see p 18 b to d j and p 19 c to h, post).

e Interlocutory appeal

f The plaintiff, Gulf Oil (GB) Ltd (Gulf), appealed against the decision of Warner J on 19 March 1987 whereby he refused its application for an interlocutory injunction against the defendants, Alfred William James Page, Stephen Martin Page and Segap Garages Ltd, restraining them from exhibiting or publishing on any airborne sign the legend 'Gulf exposed in fundamental breach'. The facts are set out in the judgment of Parker LJ.

John Cherryman QC and Edward Davidson for Gulf.

Leolin Price QC and Hubert Picarda for the defendants.

g At the conclusion of the argument Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C announced that the appeal would be allowed and limited relief granted for reasons to be given later.

2 April. The following judgments were delivered.

h PARKER LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C). The brothers Alfred and Stephen Page own, control and are directors of a company, Segap Garages Ltd (Segap). That company owns and operates a number of petrol filling stations. By an exclusive supply agreement dated 5 May 1982 Segap agreed to buy and Gulf Oil (GB) Ltd (Gulf) agreed to sell all the fuel required for certain of Segap's filling stations. The term of the agreement was five years from 13 April 1982.

j At the beginning of 1985 Gulf was supplying the fuel to four filling stations. All were being supplied on credit terms. By 3 April 1985 Segap's product debt amounted to some £400,000, of which about £6,800 was due for payment on 10 April, about £7,000 on the 11 April and the remainder on 20 April. Segap had also by that date placed orders for deliveries on the 4, 6 and 9 April. In this situation, Gulf, by telex dated 3 April, refused to make any further deliveries save on cod direct debit terms. Segap refused to accept deliveries on such terms and Gulf maintained its refusal to supply on existing credit terms. As a result Gulf did not make the deliveries due on 4, 6 and 9 April. On 10 April

Segap obtained supplies from an alternative source but made it clear that it was holding Gulf to the agreement. It did not, however, make the payments due on 10 and 11 April. On 15 April Gulf gave notice terminating the agreement, claiming to be entitled so to do pursuant to a clause in the agreement which gave it a right to terminate in the event of breach of the agreement by Segap. The breaches relied on by Gulf were the obtaining of supplies from another source and the failure to make the payments due on 10 and 11 April. Gulf did not thereafter make any further deliveries and Segap did not make the payment due on 20 April or any further payment, albeit that it continued to assert that Gulf remained bound by the supply agreement. a

In July 1985 Gulf issued a writ against Segap and the two Pages claiming, inter alia, the outstanding moneys due under the agreement for which it was alleged the two Pages as well as Segap were liable. Judgment in this action was given in favour of Gulf by Knox J on 9 June 1986. Also in July 1985 Segap issued proceedings against Gulf claiming damages for Gulf's failure to supply from 3 April onwards. In this action Segap continued to claim that the agreement was still in full force and effect. Judgment in those proceedings was given by Scott J on 19 December 1986. By that time Segap and the two Pages had paid £550,000 on account of the amount awarded by Knox J plus interest and costs. Scott J held that Gulf was in breach of the supply agreement in refusing peremptorily to supply save on cod direct debit terms but that it was entitled on 15 April to terminate the agreement for non-payment of the amounts due on 10 and 11 April. Accordingly, the agreement was terminated by the telex of 15 April and Segap was entitled to damages, but only in respect of the failure to fulfill the orders for deliveries on 4, 6 and 9 April. An inquiry as to the quantum of such damages was ordered. It is not disputed that such damages will probably be in the order of £1,500. c

Segap has appealed and Gulf has cross-appealed against the judgment of Scott J and the appeal and cross-appeal are pending. e

After the judgment of Scott J a document giving an account of the litigation and judgment was circulated to a number of Gulf customers, and on 18 March 1987, during the Cheltenham race meeting, a light aircraft flew over Cheltenham where it could be seen both from Gulf's head offices and from the racecourse where Gulf was entertaining a number of customers. The aircraft was displaying a clearly visible legend 'Gulf exposed in fundamental breach'. Thereupon Gulf's solicitors sent two telexes to the solicitors acting for Segap and the two Pages in the following terms. f

The first read:

'Our client: Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Limited.

Your clients: Messrs A.W.J. + S.M. Page and Segap Garages Limited. g

Our client has been aware for some time of a campaign, which is believed to be orchestrated by your clients and which has been conducted by circulating leaflets to our client's retail outlets about the recent litigation between our respective clients. Today an aeroplane flew low over the Cheltenham area (where it is well known our client's head office is situated and large crowds were attending the races) towing a sign bearing the words "Gulf Oil exposed in fundamental breach". Our client has reason to believe that this too was arranged by your clients. Our client takes a very serious view of this flagrantly offensive conduct, for which there can be no conceivable explanation but an intention to damage our client in a blaze of publicity, the potential damage of which is incalculable. Please note that application will be made on behalf of our client ex parte tomorrow morning in the Chancery Division for an immediate injunction to restrain any repetition of today's activity. Please inform us immediately of the name and address of the operator of the aircraft concerned. We believe the operator to be Airspace Outdoor Advertising Limited of PO Box 2, Bishops Waltham, Hampshire. Our client will hold your clients liable for all damage suffered as a result of your clients' conduct.' h

The second read:

a 'Your clients: Messrs A.W.J. Page and S.M. Page and Segap Garages Limited.
Our client: Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Limited.

b One point further to our telex timed at 17:32 today arises: Please let us know if you have instructions to accept service of the writ we propose issuing tomorrow. This request goes to the writ only: If an order is made tomorrow, it will have to be served personally.'

The following morning Gulf's solicitors received the following reply:

'Your client: Gulf Oil (Great Britain) Limited.

c 1. I thank you for your telexes of yesterday evening on which we have taken instructions. 2. Our clients arranged the aeroplane towing the sign. 3. You have correctly identified the operator of the aeroplane. 4. You have not identified any cause of action which your client says it has against ours. How does your client put its case? Is there in existence a draft statement of claim or draft evidence which we could see? If so, please fax together with draft minutes of order. 5. We are instructed to appear by counsel (Mr Price Q.C) on your client's ex parte application and if injunctive relief is obtained to your client to apply immediately inter partes for the discharge of such relief. Will your application be before the motions judge or have any other arrangements been made? Please let us know. 6. We have instructions to accept service of the writ. 7. Finally, we assume but please confirm that the truth of the words on the sign is not at issue? Regards.'

e On receipt of this telex Gulf immediately applied in the Chancery Division for an interim injunction in these terms:

f '... that until trial or further order in the meantime the defendants and each of them, in the case of the third defendant by its directors and officers and in the case of all defendants by themselves their servants or agents or otherwise howsoever be restrained from exhibiting or publishing on any airborne sign or otherwise howsoever the legend "Gulf exposed in fundamental breach" or any words to the like or similar effect.'

g The application was heard by Warner J. It was opposed by counsel on behalf of Segap and the two Pages. It was refused by Warner J. At that time no writ had been issued but the writ which Gulf proposed to issue was intended to be, and subsequently was, indorsed with a claim for damages for conspiracy. The matter was of great urgency because the Cheltenham Gold Cup was due to be run at 3 pm the same day and this is an event which attracts particularly large numbers of racegoers. Gulf accordingly appealed forthwith to this court against the refusal to grant interim relief and the appeal was heard at 2 pm. Interim relief was, after brief argument on both sides and for reasons to be given later, granted in the terms sought, save that the injunction was limited to exhibition by h airborne sign and to the duration of the current Cheltenham Race Meeting.

j Relief was refused by Warner J on the simple ground that the truth of the words was not in issue and that, in a libel action, if a defendant intends to justify, interim relief is, as a matter of principle, never granted. Counsel for Gulf did not seek to challenge the principle, but contended that where there was clear evidence of a conspiracy to injure the principle had no application. Counsel for the defendants advanced the contrary contention, asserting that if interim relief could be granted in such a case as this it would, in effect, reverse the long-standing principle because it would often be open to a plaintiff in a libel action to claim also in conspiracy against the reporter, editor, printers and publishers of the libel.

The point is an important one and it is unfortunate that time considerations did not allow counsel on either side to prepare or develop full argument. This being so, and the matter being in any event interlocutory only, it is, in my view, undesirable that this court should make any further pronouncement on the law than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of disposing of the appeal. a

There was in the exchange of telexes clear evidence of a combination between the two Pages and Segap to display the airborne sign over the Cheltenham Racecourse where it could be seen, and in order that it should be seen, by the maximum number of people, the vast majority of whom would have no interest whatever in the supply of fuel to retail filling stations. This was done, moreover, at a time when appeal and cross-appeal from the judgment of Scott J was pending and when, according to his judgment, the supply agreement had been terminated. The defendants had therefore, at the time, no immediate interest of their own to protect against Gulf and no interest of their own to further as against Gulf. In these circumstances there is, in my view, a strong inference that the purpose of the display was simply to inflict on Gulf the maximum possible damage in its business by way of revenge. There is thus not merely a serious question to be tried, but a strong prima facie case in conspiracy to injure. It may be that that case will not in the event succeed, but, unless the libel principle is a complete answer to the claim for interlocutory relief, this is a plain case for the grant of such relief on the principles enunciated in American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd [1975] 1 All ER 504, [1975] AC 396. Indeed, this was not seriously disputed. b

In my view, the principle mentioned is not a bar. It was established in this court in Bonnard v Perryman [1891] 2 Ch 269, [1891-4] All ER Rep 965, in which case the court expressly approved the statement of the law by Lord Esher MR in William Coulson & Sons v James Coulson & Co (1887) 3 TLR 846. It has been applied consistently ever since: see, for example, Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 All ER 8, [1969] 1 QB 349, Harakas v Baltic Mercantile and Shipping Exchange Ltd [1982] 2 All ER 701, [1982] 1 WLR 958 and Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 321, [1982] QB 1. It is, in my view, unaffected by the general principles laid down in American Cyanamid. e

However, in Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 All ER 8 at 10, [1969] 1 QB 349 at 360, Lord Denning MR, explaining the reason for the rule, said:

'The court will not restrain the publication of an article, even though it is defamatory, when the defendant says that he intends to justify it or to make fair comment on a matter of public interest. That has been established for many years ever since Bonnard v. Perryman ([1891] 2 Ch 269, [1891-4] All ER Rep 965). The reason sometimes given is that the defences of justification and fair comment are for the jury, which is the constitutional tribunal, and not for a judge; but a better reason is the importance in the public interest that the truth should out. As the court said in that case ([1891] 2 Ch 269 at 284, [1891-4] All ER Rep 965 at 968): "The right of free speech is one which it is for the public interest that individuals should possess, and, indeed, that they should exercise without impediment, so long as no wrongful act is done." There is no wrong done if it is true, or if it is fair comment on a matter of public interest. The court will not prejudice the issue by granting an injunction in advance of publication.' f

It is true that there is no wrong done if what is published is true provided that it is not published in pursuance of a combination and, even if it is, there is still no wrong unless the sole or dominant purpose of the combination and publication is to injure the plaintiff. If, however, there is both combination and purpose or dominant purpose to injure there is a wrong done. When a plaintiff sues in conspiracy there is, therefore, a potential wrong even if it is admitted, as it is in the present case, that the publication is true and thus that there is no question of a cause of action in defamation. In such a case the court can, and in my view should, proceed on the same principles as it would in the case of any other tort. j

a in libel actions is, in my view, unreal. A plaintiff in an action against the author and publisher of a newspaper article, for example, might well establish a combination, but it appears to me that it would only be in the rarest case that sufficient evidence of a dominant purpose to injure could be made out to warrant the grant of interlocutory relief, and I have no doubt that the court would scrutinise with the greatest care any case where a cause of action in conspiracy was joined to a cause of action in defamation and would require to be satisfied that such joinder was not merely an attempt to circumvent the rule in defamation.

b Where, however, it is not asserted that there is any cause of action in libel and the plaintiff relies on conspiracy only, then the court needs only to be satisfied that there is a serious question on combination and intention to injure to be tried. Very often there may not be, but in the present circumstances, in my view, there clearly was. The occasion, scale and manner of publication of the true statement was such that a strong prima facie case of dominant purpose to injure was made out.

c I find it unnecessary to consider the question of the apparent anomaly that an act done by one which is not actionable can become actionable if done in combination and with the sole or dominant intent to injure, for it is well established that this is so.

d I also find it unnecessary to consider counsel's submission for the defendants that the alleged conspiracy was between two directors of a company and the company itself, for it is admitted in the telexes that the arrangements for the aerial display were made by all three defendants.

For the above reasons the plaintiffs were, in my view, entitled to the limited injunction granted.

e RALPH GIBSON LJ. I agree that the judge was not right to refuse relief on the ground that, in this case, the principle established in Bonnard v Perryman [1891] 2 Ch 269, [1891-4] All ER Rep 965 constituted a bar. Although that principle, which is applied in defamation cases, is not directly applicable in its terms to a case where the basis of claim is conspiracy to inflict deliberate damage without any just cause, nevertheless it seems to me that that principle, namely the individual and the public interest in the right of free speech, is a matter of great importance in the consideration of the question whether in the exercise of the court's discretion an interlocutory injunction should be made and, if Yes, what should be the extent of any restriction on publication of any statement pending trial. The plaintiffs made out, as I think, an arguable case that the aerial display was carried out by the defendants as part of a concerted plan to inflict deliberate damage on the plaintiffs thereby without any just cause. Due regard being given to the principle of free speech, the plaintiffs were, in my judgment, entitled to the limited injunction granted by this court.

SIR NICOLAS BROWNE-WILKINSON V-C. I agree with both judgments and have nothing to add.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

DILLON, STEPHEN BROWN AND NICHOLLS LJJ

26 MARCH 1987

Divorce – Property – Adjustment order – Transfer of property – Application for property adjustment order in respect of matrimonial home – Wife registering claim for ancillary relief as pending action – Husband obtaining loan from bank secured by first charge on matrimonial home – Bank not searching land charges register – Whether wife's application for property adjustment order having priority over bank's charge – Land Charges Act 1972, s 5 – Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, ss 24(1), 37.

Land charge – Pending action – Registration – Pending land action – Application by wife for transfer of matrimonial home – Wife registering claim for ancillary relief as pending action – Husband obtaining loan from bank secured by first charge on matrimonial home – Bank not searching land charges register – Whether wife's application for property adjustment order having priority over bank's charge – Land Charges Act 1972, s 5 – Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, ss 24(1), 37.

On the breakdown of the parties' marriage the wife left the matrimonial home, which was unregistered land in the husband's sole name, and on 4 June 1985 she presented a petition for divorce. She also asked, in the usual general terms, for ancillary relief including a property adjustment order but without specifying any particular property. On 7 June she registered her claim for ancillary relief as a pending action under s 5^a of the Land Charges Act 1972, the matrimonial home being described as the property charged. On 21 June the husband saw the manager at the local branch of his bank, with which he had had business dealings since 1974, seeking what he described as a bridging loan for the purchase of a house to be secured by a first charge on the matrimonial home. The bank manager agreed to the loan because he regarded the husband as a reliable businessman and a good customer. The loan was accordingly arranged and the husband executed a legal charge over the matrimonial home on 4 July 1985. The bank made the advance without any search in the land charges register and thus had no actual knowledge of the wife's registration of the lis pendens. Subsequently, the bank discovered that the husband had acted dishonestly with the intent of realising as many of his assets as he could and transferring them out of the jurisdiction in order to defeat the wife's claim. The wife applied for, inter alia, a property adjustment order in respect of the matrimonial property under s 24(1)^b of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 and for an order to set aside the bank's legal charge under s 37^c of that Act. The judge gave judgment for the wife, set aside the charge and ordered that the proceeds of sale of the property be transferred to her. The bank appealed.

Held – A wife's application for a property adjustment order under s 24 of the 1973 Act was a claim to property which, if registered against the matrimonial home under s 5 of the 1972 Act as a pending land action, constituted notice to, and had priority over, any subsequent mortgage or conveyance executed by the husband. It followed that the wife's f The third party, Barclays Bank plc, appealed against the order of his Honour Judge Hutchinson sitting as a judge of the High Court in Lincoln made on 12 September 1986 whereby it was ordered that the legal charge dated 4 July 1985 and made between the bank and the respondent, Leobardo Perez-Rivas (the husband), be set aside and that the fund representing the proceeds of sale of the property Heydour Priory be transferred to the solicitors acting for the petitioner, Juliet Mary Perez-Adamson (the wife), and after all proper costs had been defrayed be transferred by them to the wife. The facts are set out in the judgment of Dillon LJ.

g Gavin Lightman QC, Thomas Sharpe and Michael Jefferis for the bank.
Joseph Jackson QC and Iain MacLeod for the wife.
 The husband did not appear.

h DILLON LJ. This is an appeal by the third party, Barclays Bank plc, against an order of his Honour Judge Hutchinson, sitting as a judge of the High Court, made on 12 September 1986. It arises in relation to proceedings in the Family Division between Mrs Juliet Mary Perez-Adamson, the petitioner, and Mr Leobardo Perez-Rivas, the respondent, formerly husband and wife.

j The husband came from abroad but had, until the matters in question, made his home with the wife in this country, latterly at a property called Heydour Priory, Heydour, near Grantham in Lincolnshire. The husband and wife had been married in December 1970, and since January 1974 the husband had been a customer of the bank at its Grantham branch. The marriage, however, unfortunately broke down. The wife left Heydour Priory, and on 4 June 1985 she presented a petition in the Lincoln County Court whereby she prayed for the dissolution of the marriage and to be granted custody of the four children of the marriage. She also asked, in the usual general terms, for ancillary relief,

Having issued her petition, she applied to the court on the next day for various injunctions which are not directly relevant to these proceedings, but, in addition, she also applied through her solicitors to the Land Registry for the registration of a pending action under s 5 of the Land Charges Act 1972 in respect of her claim for ancillary relief. The registration was effected on 7 June 1985, and the property charged is described as Heydour Priory, Heydour, Grantham. That was obviously defined by the application for the registration.

On 18 June 1985 notice to proceed with the application for ancillary relief was duly issued by the wife's solicitors, returnable on 9 July 1985. That, for present purposes, is franked by the prayer in the petition. Then on 21 June the husband went to see the bank's manager at the Grantham branch, a Mr Sargeant, and he sought a loan from the bank on the security of the property Heydour Priory. Mr Sargeant regarded the husband as a reliable businessman and a blue-chip customer, and his evidence is that at his meeting with the husband the husband told him that the husband and the wife had decided to separate, that their affairs were being sorted out amicably and that the husband wished to purchase a property for the wife as part of the settlement of their affairs. He asked, therefore, for a bridging loan of £50,000 (later increased to £60,000) to purchase such a property. He said he had not yet found a suitable property, but he wanted the cash to be available to facilitate a speedy purchase when the right property was found. A bridging loan was therefore arranged for a period of 12 months to be secured by a first legal charge on the property. The husband was the sole legal owner of the property. The husband apparently told the bank manager that he had about £100,000 worth of investments, but that there might be disadvantages in realising investments to repay the bank loan because they had been recently purchased and realisation would result in a loss.

It was a plausible explanation; it was untrue. What the husband was in fact doing was realising as many of his assets as he possibly could and sending the money, via another bank account of which the wife did not know, out of the jurisdiction of this court. In this he was successful.

On 4 July 1985 a legal charge on Heydour Priory in favour of the bank was duly executed by the husband. On 8 July £50,000 of the agreed advance of £60,000 was drawn down by the husband. The balance of the advance was drawn down shortly afterwards. The bank accepted the legal charge and made the advance without making any search in the land charges register. Consequently, the bank did not actually know that the wife had effected the registration of the lis pendens under s 5 of the 1972 Act.

The bank found out, however, not very long afterwards, that the husband was not acting honestly. It was, of course, by that time too late to recall the money which the husband had had. I need not go further into the history of the husband's misdoings; he has played no part in the proceedings before the judge or in this court; he remains outside the jurisdiction with the money which he has succeeded in taking outside the jurisdiction and also, in breach of orders of the court, with the children of the marriage.

What came before the judge on the occasion on which he made his order were the wife's applications for ancillary relief, including application for a property adjustment order in respect of Heydour Priory and another property, and also an application by the wife to set aside the mortgage in favour of the bank under s 37 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973. That section starts with a definition of 'financial relief' as including relief under any of certain provisions of the Act which are referred to in the section and which include the statutory provision for making property adjustment orders. Section 37(2) provides:

'Where proceedings for financial relief are brought by one person against another, the court may, on the application of the first-mentioned person—(a) if it is satisfied that the other party to the proceedings is, with the intention of defeating the claim for financial relief, about to make any disposition or to transfer out of the jurisdiction

- a* or otherwise deal with any property, make such order as it thinks fit for restraining the other party from so doing or otherwise for protecting the claim; (b) if it is satisfied that the other party has, with that intention, made a reviewable disposition and that if the disposition were set aside financial relief or different financial relief would be granted to the applicant, make an order setting aside the disposition; (c) if it is satisfied, in a case where an order has been obtained under any of the provisions mentioned in subsection (1) above by the applicant against the other party, that the other party has, with that intention, made a reviewable disposition, make an order setting aside the disposition . . .’

Then sub-s (4) provides:

- c* ‘Any disposition made by the other party to the proceedings for financial relief in question (whether before or after the commencement of those proceedings) is a reviewable disposition for the purposes of subsection (2)(b) and (c) above unless it was made for valuable consideration (other than marriage) to a person who, at the time of the disposition, acted in relation to it in good faith and without notice of any intention on the part of the other party to defeat the applicant’s claim for financial relief.’

- d* It is common ground in these proceedings, in so far as it is material, that the legal charge in favour of the bank was made for valuable consideration and that the bank acted in relation to it in good faith. It is also clear that the bank had no express notice of any intention on the part of the husband to defeat the wife’s claim for financial relief. The case turns on the effect of the registration under s 5 of the 1972 Act.

- e* The first point that is taken by counsel for the bank is that there was nothing capable of being registered under s 5 because the land in respect of which the wife was seeking a property adjustment order had not been identified in the proceedings between the wife and the husband at the time the registration was effected. He refers to some observations by Megarry V-C in Sowerby v Sowerby (1982) 44 P & CR 192 at 196–197, where the Vice-Chancellor considered at the end of his judgment that where the claim in the matrimonial proceedings was not particularised it could not be said that there was an action or a proceeding relating to land within the meaning of s 5. He said that a lis pendens must involve a claim in relation to specific property. But, having expressed his doubts and expressed, further, the view that, if a procedure was adopted in the Family Division for obtaining an order requiring a proper specification of the property in question, the doubts would be resolved, he left the matter there, recognising that he had not heard the matter fully argued out.

- g* If it is open to a wife, for instance, who has in the usual form sought a property adjustment order without indicating what property she has in mind in the petition for divorce, to particularise in the divorce proceedings by specifying the particular property, whether in response to a demand from her husband’s advisers or not, it seems to me that what one has got in the petition is a general claim to a property adjustment order in respect of any property the husband might own, which the wife has in this case particularised, so far as Heydour Priory is concerned, in her application to the Land Registry to register the lis pendens in respect of that property. I see no need for any further particularisation. The need that the property should be particularised arises for the protection of those dealing with the owner of the property and it is satisfied if there is a registration in respect of a particular property. Because of the provisions of the 1972 Act, persons dealing with the owner will not be prejudiced if they are dealing in respect of a property which has not been the subject of any registration. Therefore I would reject that point of counsel for the bank which would indeed, if valid, seem to upset the established practice in the Family Division. I see no reason why more should be required of an applicant wife in that respect.

Then comes the question: what is the effect of a registration under s 5 of the 1972 Act?

It is referred to as a registration in the register of pending actions, and it seems that registration of pending actions by the term lis pendens goes back as far as the Judgments Act 1839. Section 5(7) of the 1972 Act provides: a

‘A pending land action [that is the description of what is to be registered] shall not bind a purchaser without express notice of it unless it is for the time being registered under this section.’

Section 198 of the Law of Property Act 1925 provides: b

‘(1) The registration of any instrument or matter under the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925, or any enactment which it replaces, in any register kept at the land registry or elsewhere, shall be deemed to constitute actual notice of such instrument or matter, and of the fact of such registration, to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected, as from the date of registration or other prescribed date and so long as the registration continues in force . . .’ c

The clear implication, as it seems to me, from s 5(7) of the 1972 Act is that a pending land action does bind a purchaser, even if he has no express notice of it, if it is for the time being registered under the section. The term ‘pending land action’ is defined in s 17 of the 1972 Act as meaning ‘any action or proceeding pending in court relating to land or any interest in or charge on land’. ‘Land’ is widely defined, but does not include an undivided share in land. That definition was considered by Megarry J in Calgary and Edmonton Land Co Ltd v Dobinson [1974] 1 All ER 484 at 489, [1974] Ch 102 at 107. He said: d

‘As for more general considerations, it seems to me that once it is accepted (as it has been) that some restriction must be placed on the wide statutory language, the question becomes one of what restriction is most consonant with the language and general purposes of the statute, and with common sense and practicability. The rights made registrable under the Land Charges Act 1972, as under the Land Charges Act 1925, are in general substantive rights in the land. Those with specified rights or claims to the land or any interest in it must register those rights or claims (and so give warning to purchasers) or else suffer the consequences of failure to register. What is protected is some substantive right adverse to the owner, rather than a mere fetter on the owner’s rights of disposition . . . What is registrable as a pending land action is an action or proceeding which claims some proprietary right in the land, and not an action merely claiming that the owner should be restrained from exercising his powers of disposition.’ (My emphasis.) e

The effect of that, because otherwise there is no point in having registration to give warning to purchasers, seems to me to be that the claim, if it be a claim rather than a present right which is being protected, will bind the purchaser once registration has been effected, so long as the registration subsists. g

The position of registration of claims for ancillary relief was considered by the courts in Whittingham v Whittingham (National Westminster Bank Ltd intervening) [1978] 3 All ER 805, [1979] Fam 9. What that case actually decided was that, where a wife had applied in divorce proceedings for an order that a certain property be transferred to her but she had not effected any registration of the claim as a pending action and her husband subsequently charged the property in favour of a bank, the wife could not apply to set aside the charge because her claim under s 24 of the 1973 Act for the transfer of the property was not binding on the bank. Of course registration of such a claim for a property adjustment order could only arise after a divorce petition has been presented, and there may well be cases in which the avoidance transaction, or, as it is put in s 37, ‘the reviewable disposition’, has been made before the petition was presented. In those cases all that will have to be considered where a third party is concerned is whether the third party gave valuable consideration and at the time of the disposition acted in relation h a to it in good faith and without notice of any intention on the part of the other party to defeat the applicant's claim for financial relief. Where, however, there has been a registration, the position is not quite the same. Balcombe J, having given his reasons in Whittingham v Whittingham at first instance for concluding that on the facts of that case the wife's claim for ancillary relief was not binding on the bank, said at the end of his judgment ([1978] 3 All ER 805 at 812, [1979] Fam 9 at 18):

b 'I do not believe that the practical effect of this judgment will be seriously to prejudice the ability of a spouse, usually a wife, to set aside a reviewable disposition of land under s 37 of the 1973 Act. Where a party has applied for a transfer of property order, registration of that application as a pending land action should afford an effective protection against any future disposition.'

c When that case came to this court the decision of Balcombe J was affirmed. Stamp LJ said in giving the leading judgment of this court ([1978] 3 All ER 805 at 813-814, [1979] Fam 9 at 21):

d 'I am bound to say that considering the matter without the aid of authority I would not feel much hesitation in holding that a summons to obtain the transfer of a specified property under s 24 does relate to that property. Furthermore it appears to me desirable that a wife who has issued such a summons should be able to safeguard the property, pending hearing of the application, by registering a lis. If this is not so, she is placed in the unenviable position of having to establish that a transaction which subsequently takes place by way of sale or mortgage is a reviewable disposition within s 37, involving litigation in which the good faith of the purchaser [or] mortgagee and the question whether he had notice of the wife's intention fall to be considered. Such questions are not usually at all easy to decide; in fact it was because of the difficulties involved in establishing whether a purchaser or mortgagor had or had not constructive notice of a particular dealing with land that the policy of registration of interests in land was brought into force by the effect of the Land Charges Acts. The right of a wife or husband to apply for a transfer of property under s 24 is of recent origin, and I can see no good reason for not regarding a summons to obtain a transfer of a particular property as one which does relate to that property.'

f Orr LJ agreed.

The position therefore is that the long-established procedure for the registration of a lis pendens has to be married with the code under the 1973 Act for property adjustment as between spouses. The 1972 Act also includes provisions for the registration of various other property rights or interests which have in some cases been previously the subject of registrations under quite different statutes.

j Taking the whole together, I would accept the view of Stamp LJ that the code, as we now have it, has the effect that the registration of the lis pendens in respect of the wife's claim for property adjustment gives her priority over any subsequent conveyance or mortgage of the property executed by the husband. Counsel for the bank urges that that is only so if the other party to the transaction, being supposed to know of the claim for ancillary relief and the property adjustment order, is to be held to have had notice of intention on the part of the husband to defeat the wife's claim for financial relief. If the bank or other third party, not having actual knowledge of the registration and of the existence of the claim for ancillary relief, did not ask any questions, it might be difficult to establish that it had notice of an intention on the part of the husband to defeat the claim for ancillary relief. If the bank or third party did ask but was given a specious but untruthful answer, it would be well nigh impossible for a court to hold that the bank or other third party had the requisite notice of the husband's intention. There would be a very serious lacuna in the protection for the wife which Stamp LJ thought so desirable.

In my judgment there is no such lacuna, and so, for these reasons which are substantially the same as those which the judge in the court below gave, I would dismiss the appeal because the wife's claim for a property adjustment order has priority to the bank's charge and the wife has obtained, from the order of the judge now under appeal, an order for the transfer of the proceeds of the property to her. The property was sold pending the hearing, it being common ground that neither spouse was then occupying it.

I would dismiss this appeal.

STEPHEN BROWN LJ. I agree, for the reasons given by Dillon LJ, that this appeal should be dismissed.

NICHOLLS LJ. I agree. In Whittingham v Whittingham (National Westminster Bank Ltd intervening) [1978] 3 All ER 805, [1979] Fam 9, this court decided that proceedings in which a property adjustment order is sought under s 24 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 are, to the extent to which they relate to land, a pending land action within s 5 of the Land Charges Act 1972. The court reached that conclusion notwithstanding that until the property adjustment order is made, the applicant under s 24 has not, or may not have, a subsisting proprietary interest in the land in question.

The effect of registration of a pending land action in the register of pending actions is, as provided in s 198(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, that the registration is 'deemed to constitute actual notice of [the] . . . matter . . . to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected'. In this case the 'matter' consists of the proceedings in which the property transfer order is being claimed.

In my view the effect of these statutory provisions is that, when the bank took a charge over the property after the registration of a pending land action had been made in the present case in respect of the property, that charge ranked behind the claims made by the wife with regard to that property in the pending petition. Any other view would fly in the face of the purpose intended to be achieved by registration. If what is registrable is, as here, a subsisting claim under a statute which enables the property or an interest therein to be transferred to the petitioner or to others, it seems to me to follow that what is intended to be protected by that registration, by means of all persons being deemed to have actual notice, is that claim. Accordingly, if that claim ultimately results in a property transfer order, a person who was deemed to have actual notice of that claim when he acquired his interest ranks behind the interest in the land which the court orders to be transferred to the petitioner or other person in accordance with s 24 of the 1973 Act. Accordingly, in this case the bank's charge ranks behind the interest in the property ordered to be transferred to the wife, and it does so without any recourse needing to be had to s 37 of the 1973 Act.

I too would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SLADE, PARKER AND MUSTILL LJJ

20, 21, 22, 23, 26 JANUARY, 24 MARCH 1987

Capital gains tax – Tax avoidance scheme – Composite transaction – Preordained series of transactions – Commercial purpose – Linear transactions – Second transaction not certain when first transaction carried out – Steps in series of transactions dependent on uncertain events – Steps having commercial purpose other than tax avoidance – Whether series of transactions to be treated as single composite transaction – Whether taxpayer liable for capital gains tax.

Development land tax – Tax avoidance scheme – Composite transaction – Preordained series of transactions – Taxpayer company wishing to sell land – Taxpayer company first fragmenting ownership of land among five other companies in same group in order to utilise tax exemptions available to each – Purchaser ending negotiations before sale agreed – Purchaser resuming negotiations some months later after change of circumstances – Purchase completed on terms different from those previously proposed – Whether series of transactions to be treated as single composite transaction – Whether taxpayer company liable for development land tax.

Capital gains tax – Assessment – Vacation – Unilateral vacating of assessment by Revenue – Year wrongly stated in assessment – Taxpayer not misled – When mistake discovered assessment for correct year impossible – Whether unilateral vacating of assessment possible – Whether error could be corrected – Taxes Management Act 1970, s 114.

In separate cases the question arose whether a series of linear transactions in which, in the events which happened, execution of the second transaction was not certain at the time the first transaction was effected was to be treated for tax purposes as a preordained series of transactions, i.e. a single composite transaction.

In the first case the taxpayers owned all the shares in a company (Q Ltd) which owned and operated supermarkets. In 1973 they decided to sell or merge the business with a similar business, but their attempts to do so were not successful until 1976. In 1976 they commenced negotiations with C Ltd for a merger and by March they were exploring the possibility of establishing a company in the Isle of Man to act as a holding company for the merger. In June 1976 M Ltd was incorporated in the Isle of Man and by an agreement on 19 July between the taxpayers and M Ltd (the July agreement) M Ltd acquired the issued share capital of Q Ltd in exchange for its own shares. Meanwhile, following an inquiry by another company (J Ltd), the negotiations with C Ltd were abandoned for a time, but they were resumed when it appeared that a sale to J Ltd would not go through. However, at a meeting between the taxpayers and J Ltd on 9 August an agreement (the August agreement) was reached whereby M Ltd sold the shares in Q Ltd to J Ltd for over £2m. On various occasions from March 1977 M Ltd, whose only assets were the proceeds of the sale of the shares in Q Ltd, made interest-free loans to the taxpayers and by October 1981 the entire proceeds had been lent to them. The taxpayers were assessed to capital gains tax for 1976-77 and 1977-78 on the basis that on the sale of the shares by M Ltd to J Ltd there had been disposals by the taxpayers giving rise to chargeable gains, the consideration for the disposals being the cash received by M Ltd for the shares. On appeal by the taxpayers the Special Commissioners found that there had been a single composite transaction consisting of the transfer of the shares to M Ltd in July, their sale to J Ltd in August and the loans of the proceeds of sale to the taxpayers but that, since the July and August agreements had both been genuine transactions, and M Ltd had acquired the shares as a principal, the taxpayers could not be regarded as having disposed of their shares directly to J Ltd. a

In the second case the taxpayer company, a member of a group of companies, was engaged in negotiations to sell certain land to a company (MP) outside the group at a price of £202,500. On 25 March 1980 the taxpayer company contracted to sell the land to five companies within the group (the first transaction). It was accepted that the first transaction was undertaken solely in order to take advantage of the £50,000 exemption from development land tax afforded by s 12 of the Development Land Tax Act 1976. On 22 May the taxpayer company sent a draft contract to MP in which the five companies were named as vendors. In July MP replied that it no longer wished to purchase the land. By February 1981, however, MP's circumstances had changed and negotiations were resumed. A sale of the land by the five companies to MP was completed in November 1981 at a higher price and on different terms (the second transaction). In 1984 the taxpayer company was assessed to development land tax on the footing that the second transaction was to be treated for tax purposes as a disposal of the land by the taxpayer company direct to MP. On appeal by the taxpayer company the Special Commissioners determined that if effect was to be given to two or more transactions as a single composite transaction there had to exist throughout an unbroken intention of an active nature, that on the facts the required continuity was lacking and accordingly that the true disponors of the land were the five companies and not the taxpayer company, and they therefore discharged the assessment. c

In the third case G was the managing director of, and a shareholder in, a company (PGI) which he controlled. He was also a trustee of a family trust holding shares in PGI. In 1973 G entered into negotiations for the sale of the entire issued share capital of PGI to CSI. In order to postpone indefinitely capital gains tax which would otherwise have been payable on a direct sale of those shares to CSI, an Isle of Man company (PGH) was set up to exchange its shares for those of PGI and sell the PGI shares on to CSI, and the proceeds of the sale would then be lent, interest free, to the original shareholders of PGI (the shareholders). In February 1974 CSI broke off negotiations, but the share exchange between PGI and PGH was, nevertheless, proceeded with and completed in March 1974. In January 1976 PGH, which was effectively controlled by G, sold all the shares in PGI to a third party (H). The Revenue raised assessments for the year 1973-74 on all the shareholders on the ground that the share exchange constituted a chargeable disposal by the shareholders. In March 1982 further and alternative assessments were raised for the year 1975-76 on the ground that the sale of the PGI shares to H was to be regarded for capital gains tax purposes as a disposal by the shareholders. Because of a typing error in the further assessment on the trustees the year assessed was stated to be 1974-75. All the assessments were appealed against. By the time the Revenue noticed the incorrect date it was too late to raise any further assessment for the year 1975-76. The inspector therefore marked in the assessment book that the assessment for 1974-75 had been 'vacated' and notified the collector of taxes not to proceed against the trustees on that assessment. The inspector did not, however, inform the trustees of his actions. The solicitors acting for the trustees and the other shareholders eventually sent to the Revenue a schedule of the appeals in which the further assessment on the trustees was stated to be for the year 1975-76. The Special Commissioner found that the share exchange and the subsequent sale were not linked by any continuous pursued intention and they accordingly allowed the appeals. In relation to the mistake in the year of assessment the commissioners held that the assessment could not stand. f

In each case an appeal by the Crown was dismissed by the judge. The Crown appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Held – The appeals would be dismissed for the following reasons—

(1) The fiscal consequences of a preordained series of transactions, intended to operate as such, were generally to be ascertained by considering the result of the series as a whole, and not by dissecting the scheme and considering each individual transaction separately. However, the mere fact that a scheme which involved a series of stages was designed to avoid or mitigate tax did not, by itself, entitle the Revenue to charge tax by reference to the result of the series as a whole without considering each individual stage separately. The phrases ‘a preordained series of transactions’ and ‘one single composite transaction’, which were synonymous, were not apt to describe two transactions, each of which, independently, undeniably had legal effect, unless at the time when the first transaction was effected all the essential features (and not merely the general nature) of the second transaction had already been determined by a person or persons who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of the second transaction (see p 34 j, p 35 g, p 37 j, p 41 d e, p 56 f, p 67 g, p 68 e to p 69 e, p 70 j to p 71 b, p 72 d and p 74 d, post); W T Ramsay Ltd v IRC [1981] 1 All ER 865, IRC v Burmah Oil Co Ltd [1982] STC 30 and Furniss (Inspector of Taxes) v Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530 distinguished.

(a) on the basis of the facts found by the commissioners in the first case they could not in law properly have found that the July and August agreements constituted a single composite transaction for tax purposes, since at the date of the July agreement J Ltd’s final decision was unpredictable and the taxpayers, although hoping and intending that the sale to J Ltd would go through if they could achieve it, did not have the practical ability to ensure that result because their ability to do so depended on what J Ltd might finally be willing to contract with M Ltd on terms which the taxpayers regarded as acceptable (see p 46 f g, p 47 d, p 56 f, p 67 g, p 68 e f, p 73 e and p 74 d, post);

(b) on the facts of the second case it could not be said that, at the date of the first transaction, all the essential features of the second transaction had already been determined by a person who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of that second transaction. Furthermore, although the first transaction had been effected without any commercial or business purpose apart from a tax advantage, it would not have been open to the commissioners, on the facts found by them, properly to find that the first and second transactions had been one single composite transaction, and the judge had rightly decided that, when the second transaction followed, it did so as an independent transaction (see p 49 g h, p 50 a f, p 56 f, p 67 g, p 68 e f, p 73 g to j and p 74 d, post);

(c) on the facts of the third case it could not properly be said that the share exchange and the subsequent sale of the shares to CSI were a preordained series of transactions or a single composite transaction because, at the date of the share exchange, so far from the essential features of a sale to CSI or any other purchaser having already been determined, no one had the intention, still less the practical ability, to implement a sale to CSI or indeed to any other purchaser (see p 55 g, p 56 d to f, p 67 g, p 68 e f and p 74 b d, post).

(3) For the vacation of an assessment to be valid it had to be properly effected and, in the absence of any statutory authority for the purported ‘vacation’ by the inspector of taxes in the third case, his entry in the assessment book that the assessment had been ‘vacated’ had not been properly made and had no legal effect. Furthermore, on its true construction s 114^a of the Taxes Management Act 1970 did not give the Revenue power to treat an assessment made for one fiscal year as an assessment made for another fiscal year, the year of assessment being an essential part of the assessment itself. If the Revenue made an assessment for a wrong year, their proper course was to issue an assessment for the correct year. It followed therefore that the assessment made against the trustees could not be treated as an assessment for 1975-76, and if it were to be regarded as an assessment for 1974-75 it could give rise to no liability on the part of the trustees (see p 53 b c, p 54 b c f j to p 55 a, p 56 f, p 68 e f and p 74 d, post).

Appeals

Craven (Inspector of Taxes) v Stephen White

Craven (Inspector of Taxes) v Brian White

The Crown appealed against the order of Peter Gibson J ([1985] 3 All ER 125, [1985] 1 WLR 1024) entered on 3 June 1985 whereby he dismissed the appeals by the Crown by way of cases stated (set out at [1985] 3 All ER 126–148) from determinations of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts adjusting various assessments to capital gains tax made on Stephen White, Archibald Henry White and Brian White arising out of the exchange by them on 19 July 1976 of their shares in S White & Sons (Queensferry) Ltd (Queensferry) for shares in Millor Investments Ltd (Millor), an Isle of Man company, and the sale by Millor on 9 August 1976 to Morris & David Jones Ltd of the shares in Queensferry which it had acquired on 19 July 1976. Although the Crown had appealed against the commissioners' decisions in respect of all three Whites, Archibald Henry White died prior to the hearing in the High Court and, no personal representative of his estate having been appointed by the date of the hearing of the appeals, the appeals in the High Court related only to Stephen White and Brian White. The facts are set out in the judgment of Slade LJ.

IRC v Bowater Property Developments Ltd

The Crown appealed against the order of Warner J ([1985] STC 783) entered on 7 November 1985 whereby he dismissed the appeal by the Crown by way of case stated (set out at [1985] STC 784–794) from a determination of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts that Bowater Property Developments Ltd (BPD) should not be treated for the purposes of development land tax as the disponor in relation to the disposal of an interest in some 23 acres of land at Cooks Lane, Milton Regis, Sittingbourne, Kent to Milton Pipes Ltd effected by a contract dated 23 October 1981. The facts are set out in the judgment of Slade LJ.

Baylis (Inspector of Taxes) v Gregory

Baylis (Inspector of Taxes) v Gregory and Weare

The Crown appealed against the order of Vinelott J ([1986] 1 All ER 289, [1986] 1 WLR 624) entered on 30 December 1985 whereby he dismissed the appeal by the Crown by way of case stated (set out at [1986] 1 All ER 302) from a determination of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts discharging assessments to capital gains tax made on Robert Felix Gregory for the years 1973–74 and 1975–76, both in the sum of £785,000. The Crown also appealed against the order of Vinelott J ([1986] 1 All ER 289, [1986] 1 WLR 624) entered on 14 January 1986 whereby he dismissed the appeal by the Crown by way of case stated (set out at [1986] 1 All ER 291–302) from a determination of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts discharging two alternative assessments to capital gains tax made on Robert Felix Gregory and Bernard John Weare (the trustees) as trustees of the estate of Joseph Gregory deceased for the years 1973–74 and 1974–75 (or 1975–76), both in the sum of £155,000. The year for which the second assessment was made was one of the issues in dispute before the commissioners. By an amended respondent's notice dated 26 January 1987 under RSC Ord 59, r 6(1)(b) the trustees gave notice that they would contend that the decision of Vinelott J incorporated in the order entered on 14 January 1986 should be affirmed on alternative grounds. The facts are set out in the judgment of Slade LJ.

The appeals were heard together by consent.

Jules Sher QC and Alan Moses for the Crown.

Leolin Price QC and Grant Crawford for the Whites.

Andrew Park QC and David Goy for BPD.

SLADE LJ. There are before the court appeals by the Crown from three judgments. The first is from a judgment of Peter Gibson J delivered on 24 May 1985 in Craven (Inspector of Taxes) v Stephen White, Craven (Inspector of Taxes) v Brian White [1985] 3 All ER 125, [1985] 1 WLR 1024. The second is from a judgment of Warner J delivered on 18 October 1985 in IRC v Bowater Property Developments Ltd [1985] STC 783. The third is from a judgment of Vinelott J delivered on 26 November 1985 in Baylis (Inspector of Taxes) v Gregory, Baylis (Inspector of Taxes) v Gregory and Weare [1986] 1 All ER 289, [1986] 1 WLR 624. The first and third of these judgments concern assessments to capital gains tax. The second of them concerns an assessment to development land tax. The three cases are quite separate from one another on their facts. However, they raise similar problems concerning the extent and limitations of the principle relating to tax avoidance schemes which has come to be known as 'the Ramsay principle'. This was first stated by the House of Lords in W T Ramsay Ltd v IRC, Eilbeck (Inspector of Taxes) v Rawling [1981] 1 All ER 865, [1982] AC 300 (Ramsay). It has subsequently been developed by their Lordships in IRC v Burmah Oil Co Ltd [1982] STC 30 (Burmah) and Furniss (Inspector of Taxes) v Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530, [1984] AC 474 (Dawson), in which they reaffirmed the correctness of the dissenting judgment of Eveleigh LJ in Floor v Davis (Inspector of Taxes) [1978] 2 All ER 1079, [1978] Ch 295 (Floor).

The facts of all the cases now before this court have certain common features. In each of them there has been a disposition by the taxpayers of assets to one or more companies, followed by a disposition of those assets by the company or companies to an ultimate purchaser. Save possibly in Craven v White, where this element is in dispute, the first disposition has had no commercial purpose other than that of tax avoidance. In none of the cases now before the court did there exist a contractual obligation to effect the second disposition at the time when the first was made. In each case the Crown, in reliance on the Ramsay principle, asserts that for the purpose of ascertaining their fiscal consequences the two steps or transactions involved should be treated as a single composite transaction under which there was a 'disposal' by the taxpayers in favour of the ultimate purchaser.

Section 19(1) of the Finance Act 1965, which introduced capital gains tax, provided:

'Tax shall be charged in accordance with this Act in respect of capital gains, that is to say chargeable gains computed in accordance with this Act and accruing to a person on the disposal of assets.'

Since a 'disposal of assets' is the event which gives rise to the charge, the first inquiry must always be whether or not such a 'disposal' in the relevant sense has occurred. The 1965 Act contained provisions stating in effect that certain specifically defined events should or should not (as the case might be) be treated as involving a disposal of assets. However, it contained no comprehensive definition of the word 'disposal'. Accordingly, where an assessment to capital gains tax is under challenge and the transactions in a question are not specifically covered by a particular statutory provision, the task of the court, in the final analysis, must always involve the identification of the relevant disposal or disposals of assets (if any). In deciding whether a disposal has occurred within the meaning of the statute, it may have to consider in particular (i) who were the parties to that disposal, (ii) what was its date and (iii) what were the assets disposed of.

b The identification of the relevant disposal or disposals was the essential issue before the court in Dawson and is the essential issue in each of these three appeals, though the second of them happens to concern disposals with reference to the Development Land Tax Act 1976 rather than the 1965 Act.

c There are many similarities (though the taxpayers would say essential differences) between the facts of the first and third appeals and the facts of Dawson. A brief reference to the facts of that well-known case will suffice for present purposes. The Dawsons held shares in two operating companies. They reached an agreement in principle with another company (Wood Bastow) that Wood Bastow would purchase all those shares. Before the sale took place, they entered into a scheme designed to defer the liability to pay capital gains tax to which the transfer of the shares to Wood Bastow would otherwise have given rise. To that end, with the concurrence of Wood Bastow, they arranged for their shares to be exchanged for shares in a company (Greenjacket) specially incorporated for the purpose in the Isle of Man. The final part of the scheme, which was implemented on 20 December 1971, involved two distinct steps, namely (a) a transfer by the Dawsons to Greenjacket of the shares in the operating companies and (b) a subsequent transfer of the same shares (on the same day) by Greenjacket to Wood Bastow. The thinking behind the scheme was that para 6 of Sch 7 to the 1965 Act would apply, so as to prevent the transfers by the Dawsons to Greenjacket from being chargeable disposals of the shares in the family companies.

e The facts of Dawson had at least four features in common with the facts of each of the three present appeals. They involved a transfer of assets by A to B, followed by a transfer of those same assets by B to C. The commissioners in each case accepted that the transfer by A to B was a genuine transaction: there was nothing sham about it in the sense that it purported to be something that it was not in fact. The commissioners in each case further accepted that the transfer by A to B had passed to B the full legal and beneficial ownership of the assets in question. In each of the four cases the Revenue has further sought to exact tax on the basis that for fiscal purposes there has been a disposal by A not in favour of B but in favour of C.

f There are, however, certain significant differences between the facts of Dawson and the present cases. In particular, in Dawson (unlike the present cases) at the time when the transfer of assets by A to B took place there existed, by virtue of the prearranged scheme, the practical certainty (albeit covered by no pre-existing legally binding contractual arrangements) that the transfer of the same assets by B to C would almost immediately follow. Whether or not this renders Dawson distinguishable on its facts is one of the important issues on each of the present appeals.

g On appeal by the Crown to this court from the decision of Vinelott J in Dawson [1982] STC 267, this court rejected the Crown's claim that there had been a disposal of the shares in the operating companies by the Dawsons in favour of Wood Bastow (see [1984] AC 474). All its members (of whom I was one) found difficulty in accepting the reanalysis of the relevant transactions for which the Crown contended, in such a way (in Oliver LJ's words) 'as to attribute to them, for fiscal purposes, a legal result which they did not have and which indeed they were specifically designed to avoid having' (see [1984] AC 474 at 483). Oliver LJ was also particularly concerned with the prospect of double taxation. He considered that, if the Crown's argument were right, when the taxpayers sold their shares in Greenjacket their value on the sale would, under Sch 7, fall to be measured by the asset content of Greenjacket, which would include the assets representing the proceeds of sale of the original shares in the operating companies (see [1984] AC 474 at 482); the gain on that transaction would then be computed under that schedule on the difference between that value and the acquisition cost of the original shares, which (on this hypothesis) would already have been taxed. In my own judgment I referred to what seemed to me the conceptual difficulties involved in regarding a composite transaction embodying a transfer by A to B of the full legal and beneficial title to property and a subsequent transfer of the same property by B to C as giving rise to three disposals for capital gains tax purposes, namely a disposal by A in favour of B, a disposal by B in favour of C and a disposal by A in favour of C in each case of the same assets (see [1984] AC 474 at 505–506).

The House of Lords, however, in reversing the decision of this court in Dawson, concluded:

‘The result of correctly applying the Ramsay principle to the facts of this case is that there was a disposal by the Dawsons in favour of Wood Bastow in consideration of a sum of money paid with the concurrence of the Dawsons to Greenjacket. Capital gains tax is payable accordingly.’

Their Lordships’ decision made it clear that the ‘three disposals’ point which had concerned me was, at least on the facts of that case, without substance. If in any given case the Ramsay principle applies, there will merely have been one disposal for fiscal purposes, namely a disposal by A to C; the introduction of B into the scheme will fall to be wholly disregarded for fiscal purposes (see [1984] 1 All ER 530 at 543, [1984] AC 474 at 527 per Lord Brightman). By parity of reasoning, the decision indicated that Oliver LJ’s fears of oppressive double taxation were not well founded on the facts of that case. As Lord Brightman put it ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 541–542, [1984] AC 474 at 525):

‘If the Crown’s case were correct, there would be a disposal by the Dawsons to Wood Bastow on which capital gains tax would be payable. There could be no additional capital gains tax on the steps by which that disposal was achieved, namely the sale first to Greenjacket and then by Greenjacket to Wood Bastow, because it is the Crown’s case that the fiscal consequences of the introduction of Greenjacket are to be disregarded. The Crown cannot, and does not claim to, have it both ways.’ (Lord Brightman’s emphasis.)

This decision of the House of Lords has thus clearly established that, in the light of the Ramsay principle, and contrary to the views which I had expressed in this court, a composite transaction which embodies a transfer by A to B of the full legal and beneficial title to property and a subsequent transfer by B to C of the full legal and beneficial title to the same property is capable in certain circumstances of giving rise to a disposal by A to C for capital gains tax purposes. The task of this court on the first and third of the present appeals is to consider whether or not the facts are such as to produce this result.

The House of Lords in Dawson, while giving guidance in general terms, did not think it necessary or appropriate to attempt a comprehensive definition of the circumstances in which two such successive transfers of the same property may give rise to a disposal by A to C for fiscal purposes. As Lord Scarman observed, the law in the area of the Ramsay principle is in an early stage of development (see [1984] 1 All ER 530 at 533, [1984] AC 474 at 513–514). Nevertheless, a number of significant guidelines are to be found in their Lordships’ speeches.

Firstly, they contain expositions of the general nature of the Ramsay principle which was being applied. Lord Fraser, who had himself been a party to the Ramsay decision, explained it thus ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 532, [1984] AC 474 at 512):

‘The true principle of the decision in Ramsay was that the fiscal consequences of a preordained series of transactions, intended to operate as such, are generally to be ascertained by considering the result of the series as a whole, and not by dissecting the scheme and considering each individual transaction separately. The principle was stated in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, a [1982] AC 300 at 324, especially where his Lordship said: "For the commissioners considering a particular case it is wrong, and an unnecessary self-limitation, to regard themselves as precluded by their own finding that documents or transactions are not 'shams' from considering what, as evidenced by the documents themselves or by the manifested intentions of the parties, the relevant transaction is. They are not, under the Duke of Westminster doctrine [see IRC v Duke of Westminster [1936] AC 1, [1935] All ER Rep 259] or any other authority, bound to consider individually

b each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole." (Lord Fraser's emphasis.)

c "The fact that the court accepted that each step in a transaction was a genuine step producing its intended legal result did not confine the court to considering each step in isolation for the purpose of assessing the fiscal results. Lord Wilberforce said ([1981] 1 All ER 865 at 872, [1982] AC 300 at 325): "... viewed as a whole, a composite transaction may produce an effect which brings it within a fiscal provision." Lord Wilberforce added later ([1981] 1 All ER 865 at 873, [1982] AC 300 at 326): "To force the courts to adopt, in relation to closely integrated situations, a step by step, dissecting, approach which the parties themselves may have negated would be a denial rather than an affirmation of the true judicial process. In each case the facts must be established; and a legal analysis made; legislation cannot be required or even be desirable to enable the courts to arrive at a conclusion which corresponds with the parties' own intentions."

e Secondly, Dawson establishes that the Ramsay principle is capable of applying to what has been described in argument in the present appeal as 'linear transactions', as well as to 'self-cancelling transactions' such as those under consideration in Ramsay itself. In the latter case the respective taxpayers had adopted elaborate and artificial schemes which were designed to create a loss for tax purposes, capable of being set off against existing realised gains, but would nevertheless not leave the taxpayers out of pocket after the schemes had been carried through to completion. The actual decisions in Ramsay were

f that the schemes gave rise to no allowable loss (save a sum not exceeding £370 in one case). In Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530 at 532, [1984] AC 474 at 512, as Lord Fraser pointed out, the scheme was much simpler and had enduring legal consequences. However, this was not a sufficient ground for failing to apply the Ramsay principle.

g Thirdly, however, the mere fact that a scheme which involves a series of stages is designed to avoid or mitigate tax does not by itself entitle the Revenue to charge tax by reference to the result of the series as a whole, without considering each individual stage separately. Lord Brightman, with whose speech the rest of their Lordships concurred, expressed, in the following crucially important passage the conditions which have to be satisfied if the Ramsay principle is to be applied in any given case ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 543, [1984] AC 474 at 527):

h "The formulation by Lord Diplock in Burmah expresses the limitations of the Ramsay principle. First, there must be a preordained series of transactions, or, if one likes, one single composite transaction. This composite transaction may or may not include the achievement of a legitimate commercial (ie business) end. The composite transaction does, in the instant case: it achieved a sale of the shares in the operating companies by the Dawsons to Wood Bastow. It did not in Ramsay. Second, there must be steps inserted which have no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax, not "no business effect". If those two ingredients exist, the inserted steps are to be disregarded for fiscal purposes. The court must then look at the end result. Precisely how the end result will be taxed will depend on the terms of the taxing statute sought to be applied." (Lord Brightman's emphasis.)

Fourthly (and this is allied to the third point), as Lord Brightman stated, in any case where the Revenue is seeking to invoke the Ramsay principle, the commissioners will be required to make two findings of fact, namely:

'first, whether there was a preordained series of transactions, ie a single composite transaction; second, whether that transaction contained steps which were inserted without any commercial or business purpose apart from a tax advantage. Those are facts to be found by the commissioners. They may be primary facts or, more probably, inferences to be drawn from the primary facts. If they are inferences, they are nevertheless facts to be found by the commissioners. Such inferences of fact cannot be disturbed by the court save on Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow [1955] 3 All ER 48, [1956] AC 14 principles.'

Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, [1982] AC 300 at 324 had referred to the duty of the commissioners as being to—'find the facts and then decide as a matter (reviewable) of law whether what is in issue is a composite transaction or a number of independent transactions.'

To the limited extent that he referred to this matter as being 'one of law', I think that, as Peter Gibson J pointed out in his judgment in Craven (Inspector of Taxes) v White [1985] 3 All ER 125 at 152, [1985] 1 WLR 1024 at 1031, Lord Wilberforce's opinion must be regarded as having been overruled by Lord Brightman's speech in Dawson, with which all their Lordships concurred.

For present purposes, the third of these four guidelines is of paramount importance. In two of the three appeals before us the schemes in question admittedly included steps which had no business purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax. The principal argument in all three appeals has centred round the condition for the application of the Ramsay principle that 'there must be a preordained series of transactions, or, if one likes, one single composite transaction'. I will refer to this as the first Ramsay condition. The first appeal, however, also concerns the application of the condition that 'there must be steps inserted which have no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax'. I will refer to this as the second Ramsay condition.

In opening the appeals on behalf of the Crown, counsel rightly indicated that perhaps the most important point of principle which this court has to consider is the essential nature of the link between two or more transactions which will suffice to satisfy the first Ramsay condition and thus entitle the Revenue or the court to treat all the transactions as one single transaction for fiscal purposes. In the course of his forceful and able argument, he naturally put the point in different phraseology and with differing shades of emphasis. However, while it is expressed in slightly more qualified terms in its notices of appeal in the other cases, I think that the basic proposition which the Crown is concerned to establish is well and clearly reflected in its notices of appeal in the Baylis cases, as follows:

'(4) It is submitted that in order to prove a pre-ordained series of transactions which culminates in an ultimate disposal it is only necessary to prove that at the time of the first transaction it was intended by the taxpayer that the first transaction should be used as conveyancing machinery in order to achieve a final disposal of the asset if a disposal was ultimately made. It is submitted that provided the machinery by which the commercial end is to be achieved is pre-ordained, it is irrelevant that there remains a possibility that its execution may be frustrated by a failure to achieve the commercial end itself or that at the time of the first transaction there was no immediate prospect or intention of finally disposing of the asset.'

a While in Dawson the proposed price and other terms of the ultimate purchase by C had been negotiated, although not to the stage of commitment, in advance of the transfer of assets by A to B, this was not so in any of the cases now before the court. Counsel for the Crown accepted that, if the evidence shows that, in advance of the first transaction, the purchase price and terms were all known, that may be the best evidence of the existence of one single composite transaction. Nevertheless, he submitted, the Ramsay principle is not applicable only in a case where there existed at the time of the first transaction a known purchaser who was prepared to purchase at a known price and on known terms. Since, he submitted, the purpose of the Ramsay principle is to identify the real transaction in any given case, by ignoring artificially inserted steps, the actual identification of the purchaser and the price does not signify anything of critical importance. If A Ltd wishes to sell its land free of development land tax and fragments the land into five subsidiary companies which have not used their £50,000 free band, can it make any difference, he asked, whether at the time of the fragmentation A Ltd has found the purchaser and negotiated the terms of the purchase or whether it has listed the sale in an immediately impending auction at a modest reserve which will for all practical purposes ensure its sale?

d In the Crown's submission, the essential link required to enable the Revenue to treat two or more transactions as a single composite transaction within the first Ramsay condition does not depend on the identification at the first stage of the ultimate purchaser or the proposed terms of his purchase, or indeed on the likelihood or otherwise of the second transaction following the first. The essential link is the intention of the taxpayer at the time of the first transaction. If, it is said, he embarks on the first stage with a view to facilitating an ultimate sale of the asset by means of a second stage, and that ultimate sale eventuates, that is enough to satisfy the first Ramsay condition. In the submission of e counsel for the Crown, it suffices for this purpose even if, at the time of the transfer of assets by the taxpayer, A, to B, A has no present intention to sell but his intention is merely that the transfer shall serve as a convenient springboard in case at some future date it may be desired to sell. (In the course of his argument he referred to the initial transfer in such a case as an instance of 'strategic tax planning', and I will use the same convenient phrase hereafter in this judgment.) In the alternative, he submitted, it must f in any event suffice if, at the time of the transfer of assets by A to B, A has the present general intention to sell and intends that such transfer shall serve as a springboard for a sale when it eventuates.

g It would be quite wrong to dissect and apply every word of Lord Brightman's formulation of either the first or the second Ramsay condition as if it had statutory force. In due course, the House of Lords are themselves likely to give further guidance as to the circumstances in which the Ramsay principle is capable of applying to a linear transaction. In the mean time, however, I think that we in this court are both bound and entitled to apply Lord Brightman's careful and considered formulation of the limits of the Ramsay principle (which followed a similar formulation by Lord Diplock in Burmah and has the approval of all their Lordships) according to what we understand to be its true meaning and intent. Proceeding on this footing, I find myself unable to accept the Crown's basic h contention. In my judgment, for the reasons which I will now attempt to state, it would involve an unwarrantable extension of the Ramsay principle.

j Firstly, as Lord Brightman's speech makes clear, their Lordships in Dawson regarded the phrases 'a preordained series of transactions' and 'one single composite transaction' as synonymous. I would not regard either phrase as apt to describe two transactions, each of which, independently, undeniably had legal effect, unless (as in Dawson, Ramsay and Burmah) at the time when the first transaction was effected all the essential features (not merely the general nature) of the second transaction had already been determined by a person or persons who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of the second transaction. Special considerations might apply to a case where the second transaction consisted of a sale by auction which had been arranged before the first transaction was effected. Normally, however, it seems to me that a transfer by A to B followed by a sale by B to C could not, on the ordinary meaning of words, be together described either as 'one single composite transaction' or as 'a preordained series of transactions' unless at the time of the first transfer C had been identified as a prospective purchaser, and all the main terms of the sale to him had at least in principle been agreed; if this is not so, they have to be regarded as independent transactions. I am fortified in the belief that the House of Lords, in their precise formulation of the first Ramsay condition, would not have accepted the Crown's basic contention by the second, third and fourth considerations to which I am about to refer. a

Secondly, in the particular circumstances of all of Ramsay, Burmah and Dawson, at the time when the first stage in the relevant scheme was carried through all the essential features of the second stage had in fact been determined by persons who had the firm intention and for practical purposes the ability to procure the implementation of the second stage. Furthermore, this point emerges more or less explicitly from many of the speeches in those decisions. b

As to the Ramsay scheme itself:

'It was reasonable to assume that all steps would, in practice, be carried out, but there was no binding arrangement that they should. The nature of the scheme was such that once set in motion it would proceed through all its stages to completion.' c

(See [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 874, [1982] AC 300 at 328 per Lord Wilberforce.) d

In the case of the Rawling scheme, one of the six Jersey companies concerned had actually contracted to procure the implementation of all the steps comprised in the scheme and was in a position to obtain the requisite co-operation of two of its associated companies (see [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 877, [1982] AC 300 at 332). Lord Wilberforce described the common features of the Ramsay and Rawling schemes thus: e

'First, it is the clear and stated intention that once started each scheme shall proceed through the various steps to the end; they are not intended to be arrested half-way . . . This intention may be expressed either as a firm contractual obligation (it was so in Rawling) or as in Ramsay as an expectation without contractual force.' f

Burmah raised the question whether certain transactions resulted in an allowable capital loss for the purposes of corporation tax on capital gains. Lord Fraser in his speech, with which all the rest of their Lordships agreed, referred to certain differences between the two-stage scheme there under consideration and the schemes in Ramsay and Rawling (see [1982] STC 30 at 36-37). One difference was that in those cases the taxpayers had been provided with a 'preconceived and ready-made plan', whereas in Burmah the plan, though preconceived, was specially tailor-made for Burmah. Again, in those earlier cases, it was the clear and stated intention that, once started, each scheme would proceed to completion and would not be arrested half way. In Burmah the first series of events, those occurring on 12 December 1982, could have stood on their own and need not have been followed by the second series on 18 December. However, as Lord Fraser pointed out ([1982] STC 30 at 37): g

'... it is clear that the events initiated on 18 December formed part of a single scheme and I have already quoted the finding by the Special Commissioners that they took place in the order and according to a time-table prepared in advance . . . No doubt the directors could have chosen, even at that stage, to abandon the scheme but the reality was that the decision had already been taken to carry it through to completion . . .'

In Dawson, though there was no pre-existing contract when the scheme began to be implemented, there was an equivalent practical certainty that all its steps would be carried through to the end. Lord Brightman described the manner in which the two sale h a agreements had been exchanged on the very same day and referred to minutes of the board meetings of the companies concerned. He commented ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 538, [1984] AC 474 at 520):

b 'These show that the whole process was planned and executed with faultless precision. The meetings began at 12.45 pm on 20 December, at which time the shareholdings of the operating companies were still owned by the Dawsons unaffected by any contract for sale. They ended with the shareholdings in the ownership of Wood Bastow. The minutes do not disclose when the meeting ended, but perhaps it was all over in time for lunch.'

c There are many other similar references in the speeches, in which the inevitability for practical purposes of the scheme proceeding from the first stage to the completion of the second stage is stressed. I do not think that the House of Lords would have been at such pains to emphasise this feature of the respective schemes if it had not regarded it as being of cardinal importance in deciding whether or not the various transactions could properly be treated as one composite transaction for fiscal purposes and whether or not the intermediate steps, inserted purely for the purposes of tax avoidance, could be disregarded for tax purposes, even though otherwise fully legally effective according to their terms.

d Thirdly, the Crown's basic proposition is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the whole rationale of the Ramsay principle, as explained by Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 esp at 871, [1982] AC 300 esp at 323-324 and by Lord Brightman in Dawson, who explained it thus ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 542-543, [1984] AC 474 at 526-527):

e 'In a preplanned tax saving scheme, no distinction is to be drawn for fiscal purposes, because none exists in reality, between (i) a series of steps which are followed through by virtue of an arrangement which falls short of a binding contract, and (ii) a like series of steps which are followed through because the participants are contractually bound to take each step seriatim. In a contractual case the fiscal consequences will naturally fall to be assessed in the light of the contractually agreed results. For example, equitable interests may pass when the contract for sale is signed. In many cases equity will regard that as done which is contracted to be done. Ramsay says that the fiscal result is to be no different if the several steps are preordained rather than precontracted. For example, in the instant case tax will, on the Ramsay principle, fall to be assessed on the basis that there was a tripartite contract between the Dawsons, Greenjacket and Wood Bastow under which the Dawsons contracted to transfer their shares in the operating companies to Greenjacket in return for an allotment of shares in Greenjacket, and under which Greenjacket simultaneously contracted to transfer the same shares to Wood Bastow for a sum in cash. Under such a tripartite contract the Dawsons would clearly have disposed of the shares in the operating companies in favour of Wood Bastow in consideration of a sum of money paid by Wood Bastow with the concurrence of the Dawsons to Greenjacket. Tax would be assessed, and the base value of the Greenjacket shares calculated, accordingly. Ramsay says that this fiscal result cannot be avoided because the preordained series of steps are to be found in an informal arrangement instead of in a binding contract. The day is not saved for the taxpayer because the arrangement is unsigned or contains the words "this is not a binding contract".'

j Thus, the whole rationale of the Ramsay principle is that no distinction falls to be drawn between case (i) and case (ii) referred to in this passage, 'because none exists in reality'. The whole of this reasoning presupposes that, in a case where there was no pre-existing contract but the Ramsay principle applies, all the steps in the preordained series of transactions would have been capable of being embodied in a binding contract before the first transaction was effected, though the persons having control of the scheme chose or omitted so to embody them. This in turn presupposes that, before the first transaction was effected, all the essential features of the second transaction were planned, intended and ascertained.

Fourthly, I think that, if the Ramsay principle were to be held to apply to transactions of which the connecting link is so tenuous as that suggested in the Crown's basic contention, formidable uncertainty and practical difficulties would arise in the administration of our tax law, which the House of Lords, in formulating and developing the Ramsay principle, did not contemplate and would not have intended. The whole essence of this principle when it applies is that the step inserted in the series of transactions which has no commercial purpose apart from the liability to tax falls to be wholly disregarded for fiscal purposes (see Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530 at 543, [1984] AC 474 at 527 per Lord Brightman). But the step so inserted may well, by itself, have immediately and permanently altered the legal rights of the parties, for example by transferring the legal and beneficial title to assets from A to B. In the circumstances envisaged in the Crown's basic contention, a substantial interval of time may elapse before any transfer of those assets by B to C ensues and, indeed, in the event, no such transfer may ever take place. In the mean time the Revenue may well assess the interested parties to tax (prima facie quite properly) on the basis that there has been a disposal of assets by A to B, effective according to the tenor of the documents. (It can by no means be assumed that in the case of other tax saving schemes the first disposal will be wholly covered by a specific statutory exemption, such as was available in Dawson.) What are then to be the fiscal consequences if and when a sale of assets by B to C at last ensues? If the original scheme was designed to avoid or mitigate tax, it is to be assumed that, if it could properly do so in reliance on the Ramsay principle, the Revenue would subsequently wish to claim tax, on the basis of a disposal by A to C, when the sale to C eventuates. However, of one thing I am certain. The 1965 Act, on its true construction, does not permit one single transfer of assets by A to be treated for capital gains tax purposes both as a disposal of all those assets in favour of B and as a disposal of all those same assets in favour of C. Neither the House of Lords in Dawson nor counsel for the Crown in this court suggested to the contrary. What then is to be the status of the earlier assessment in such circumstances? Was it wrong when made or has it merely become wrong? If it cannot be said that it was wrong when made, how can the taxpayer escape oppressive double taxation in the absence of any relieving statutory provision? (No such provision has been drawn to our attention.) If the Revenue is to be entitled to claim tax on the basis of a disposal by A to C, what is to be regarded as the date of that disposal? What is to be regarded as the base value of the assets disposed of and at what date is it to be ascertained? The list of difficult practical and conceptual problems that could arise, if the Crown's basic contention were well founded, could be multiplied.

Though several of these problems were canvassed in some depth in argument before us, I cannot attempt to provide satisfactory answers to them and I do not think that counsel for the Crown, with due respect to his submissions, was able to do so. In drawing attention to them, I observe that, in cases where the scheme involves a preordained series of transactions, in the sense which I attribute to that phrase (as in Dawson, Ramsay and Burmah), there may be little practical likelihood of the problems arising, because there is no practical likelihood of a substantial 'limbo' period elapsing between the first and second stages of the series. In other cases, the problems might be real and serious.

Finally, before turning to the facts of the individual cases before us, I should mention that each of the notices of appeal before us includes, inter alia, the following ground:

'the effect of the learned judge's decision is that the Ramsay principle can be easily side-stepped by the simple expedient of the taxpayer taking the first step in the composite transaction (namely, the share exchange) prior to going into the market to find his purchaser ...'

While I appreciate the concern of the Revenue in this context, this ground, with due respect to the submission, seems to me to beg the very question which has to be decided, namely whether or not there has indeed been a composite transaction. It assumes that a two transactions are together capable of constituting one composite transaction within the meaning of the first Ramsay condition even though at the time of the first transaction the persons having control of the matter had not yet gone into the market to find a purchaser and there was at that time no certainty whatever that an ultimate sale would eventuate. For the reasons which I have attempted to indicate, this assumption is, in my judgment, incorrect. This was not the sort of case which the House of Lords, in referring to 'one composite transaction' can have had in mind. Various fiscal statutes expressly b state that the term 'disposition' includes a 'disposition effected by associated operations'. Simply for example, s 51(1) of the Finance Act 1975 (in the context of capital transfer tax) so provides; and s 44(1)(b) of that Act provides that 'associated operations' means 'any two operations of which one is effected with reference to the other, or with a view to enabling the other to be effected or facilitating its being effected . . .'. If the capital gains tax legislation had included similar provisions, the Crown's basic contention might have

c been easily sustainable. In my judgment, however, the gap cannot be filled by judicial legislation.

As things are, as a matter of general principle, I conclude that two successive transactions, each of which has legal effects, are not properly to be regarded as a preordained series or as a single composite transaction within the meaning of the first
d Ramsay condition as stated by the House of Lords unless, at the time when the first transaction was effected, all the essential features (not merely the general nature) of the second transaction had already been determined by a person or persons who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of the second transaction.

After these general observations, I turn to a separate consideration of the three appeals now before us.

e Craven v Stephen White, Craven v Brian White

In this case the Special Commissioners heard together appeals by three taxpayers, Archibald, Brian and Stephen White, against assessments to capital gains tax. They gave their decision allowing those appeals on 18 January 1984 ([1985] 3 All ER 125, [1985] 1 f WLR 1024), after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Dawson but before the decision of the House of Lords. The Crown appealed against the decision in each case, but the appeals which came before Peter Gibson J related only to Brian and Stephen White: by that time Archibald White had died.

I gratefully adopt, more or less verbatim, Peter Gibson J's summary of the basic facts of the case, merely adding a few references to certain additional points which counsel for the Crown drew to our attention. Archibald, Brian and Stephen White, until 19 July g 1976, owned all the issued share capital of S White & Sons (Queensferry) Ltd (Queensferry), which owned and operated about a dozen supermarkets. They respectively held 701, 700 and 2,101 £1 ordinary shares.

In 1973, on the advice of Queensferry's accountant, Mr Clarke, they decided that they would either merge Queensferry with a similar business or they would sell it. Between h 1973 and the summer of 1976 they sought without success to achieve one or the other result.

Early in 1976 Stephen White approached Mr Humphreys of Cee-N-Cee Supermarkets (Cee-N-Cee) with a view to resuming talks about a possible merger between Queensferry's business and that of Cee-N-Cee. In February or March 1976 Mr Clarke initiated talks with Manx lawyers, Messrs Kneale & Co (Kneales), about establishing a holding company j in the Isle of Man as a vehicle for such a merger.

At about the same time as discussions were resumed with Mr Humphreys, a company called Oriol Foods Ltd (Oriol) asked Mr Clarke if Queensferry was still up for sale. Oriol itself had been acquired by RCA Corp of America (RCA) in 1974. A subsidiary of Oriol was Morris & David Jones Ltd (Jones). Once Oriol's inquiry was received, negotiations with Cee-N-Cee were set aside and negotiations with Oriol were pursued. In May 1976 broad agreement on price had been reached, that is to say that, if a sale went through, the consideration would probably exceed £2m and be paid in cash. a

In June 1976 the Whites were alarmed by trade press reports that RCA was disenchanted with its food operations. A meeting with Oriol on 17 June to find out how the proposed sale to Oriol stood left Brian and Stephen White and Mr Clarke feeling despondent. They had exhausted other potential purchasers and trading prospects for Queensferry were not good. They went back to Cee-N-Cee, which was willing to resume talks. b

On 21 June 1976 Mr Clarke arranged with Kneales to acquire an off-the-shelf company, Millor Investments Ltd (Millor), as a holding company for the projected merger with Cee-N-Cee. Millor then had a £2 issued share capital, its two £1 shares being held by two advocates' clerks from Kneales. In evidence before the commissioners Mr Clarke and Stephen White insisted that the sole purpose of acquiring Millor was to act as a holding company for the shares of Queensferry and Cee-N-Cee and any other company which might join the group. The commissioners did not accept that this was the sole purpose of the acquisition. They put the matter thus ([1985] 3 All ER 125 at 142): c

‘The view we have formed is that Stephen White’s approach to Mr Humphreys early in 1976 was made as a final resort after repeated unsuccessful attempts since 1973 to dispose of [Queensferry]. We infer, from the fact that so soon as Oriol reappeared as a possible purchaser the talks with Mr Humphreys were set aside, that Stephen White and Brian White regarded a deal with Oriol as a more desirable target than a merger with Cee-N-Cee.’ d

Nevertheless, I think it clear that the commissioners accepted as a fact that a subsidiary purpose of acquiring Millor was that it should act as a holding company if the sale to Jones did not happen but a merger between Queensferry and Cee-N-Cee should eventuate. e

On 23 June 1976 Millor increased its authorised share capital with a view to issuing 3,502 Millor shares in exchange for the Whites’ Queensferry shares on a one for one basis. On 24 June Mr Clarke sent to Kneales a draft which he had prepared of a contract between the Whites and Millor. f

Meanwhile, on 21 June 1976 Oriol had asked Mr Clarke for a further meeting on 25 June. That meeting was held at the offices of Oriol’s solicitors. Oriol asked if a draft contract for the acquisition of Queensferry could be sent to the Whites’ solicitors and were told that the draft should be sent to Kneales as lawyers for Millor. Oriol’s solicitors sent the draft to Kneales. The commissioners found that following the meeting of 25 June negotiations for the acquisition of Queensferry by Oriol ‘resumed more strongly and continued, albeit not always smoothly, towards the execution of the agreement on 9 August’ (see [1985] 3 All ER 125 at 142). Nevertheless, notwithstanding the increased purposefulness of these negotiations, the talks with Cee-N-Cee also continued. g

On 9 July 1976 Queensferry’s authorised share capital was increased and 3,502 new ordinary shares were issued to the Whites on renounceable letters of allotment while the existing ordinary shares were converted into deferred ordinary shares with diminished rights. The commissioners found that the purpose of this reorganisation of share capital was, on the advice of Kneales, to effect stamp duty savings should the contract for the sale to Jones by Millor be entered into. h

On or before 14 July Millor offered to acquire the issued share capital of Queensferry. It offered to buy the deferred ordinary shares for 50p each and to exchange one Millor share for each Queensferry ordinary share, the offer to remain open until 9 August. On 19 July the Whites entered into an agreement with Millor (the July agreement) accepting Millor’s offer, and the Whites held shares in Millor in the same proportions as they had held shares in Queensferry. j

On 20 July the Queensferry board approved and registered the transfers of the deferred ordinary shares to Millor and agreed that, when the renounced letters of allotment for the ordinary shares were received, registration would be completed in accordance with the forms of renunciation.

On 9 August there was a meeting between representatives of Oriel and Jones on the one hand and Stephen and Brian White and Mr Clarke and the two directors (both from Kneales) of Millor on the other. That meeting was stormy: at one stage Stephen White and his party walked out. But agreement was in the end reached and Millor and Jones entered into a written agreement (the August agreement) whereby Jones agreed to purchase the whole of the issued share capital of Queensferry for a consideration of £2.2m subject to adjustment. That consideration was apportioned as to 50p for each deferred ordinary share and the balance to the ordinary shares. Payment of the consideration was to be by instalments, £1.8m on completion and then two other payments of adjustable amounts. In the event, £2,459,493 was paid by Jones.

Following completion and between 25 March 1977 and 6 October 1981 Millor made several interest-free loans to the Whites. In all £275,000 was lent to Stephen White, but of that £50,000 was repaid on 30 September 1981; £145,000 was lent to Brian White and £100,000 to Archibald White; £1,500 was expended on acquiring options on three Manx companies, and the balance lent interest-free to those companies.

Assessments to capital gains tax were raised against each of Archibald and Brian White in the sum of £490,000 for 1976-77 and in the sum of £27,000 for 1977-78, and against Stephen White in the sum of £1,475,000 for 1976-77, and in the sum of £80,000 for 1977-78. At the hearing of their appeals before the Special Commissioners it was submitted on their behalf that the only disposals by them were the disposals of their Queensferry shares to Millor and that of those disposals only the sale of the deferred ordinary shares to Millor was a disposal for capital gains tax purposes, the exchange of the Queensferry ordinary shares for the Millor shares being, by the combined effect of paras 4(2) and 6 of Sch 7 to the 1965 Act, no disposal for such purposes. On the other hand, in reliance on the Ramsay principle, the Crown submitted that the Whites had for such purposes disposed of all their shares in Queensferry to Jones, on the grounds that the transfer of their shares to Millor should be treated as a fiscal nullity. Alternatively, it was submitted, the Whites fell to be assessed on the amounts which they received from Millor by way of loans and at the time when the loans were made.

The commissioners found that before the July agreement with Millor was entered into the Whites and Mr Clarke had reached an understanding that, if a sale to Jones transpired, arrangements could be made for the Whites to have the use of the proceeds of sale, either directly or indirectly, for their own purposes. Nevertheless, they pointed out that this understanding was 'of a different nature from the carefully thought out, and dovetailed, arrangements reflected in the transactions considered in Floor and in Dawson' (see [1985] 3 All ER 125 at 144). Without spelling out their understanding of the nature of a 'composite transaction', they said:

'We consider that we are constrained by authority to look at the transactions as a whole (Ramsay). We have found that the primary objective of the [Whites] was to conclude a sale of [Queensferry's] shares to Jones. That objective was achieved, and the agreements of July and August are to be looked upon as parts of a composite transaction comprising those two agreements, if no more; it is irrelevant that the terms of the August agreement were not finally settled until the day it was executed.'

Nevertheless, following the decision of the majority of this court in Floor, on what was described as the first stage of the transaction in that case, the commissioners held that the July and August agreements were real transactions, that Millor acquired the Queensferry shares as a principal and that accordingly the Whites could not be regarded as having disposed of their shares direct to Jones. They therefore held that there was no disposal for capital gains tax purposes of the Queensferry ordinary shares effected by the July agreement. However, they also held that on each of the occasions when one of the Whites received a loan he must be deemed to have made a part disposal of the shares which he formerly owned in Queensferry.

By the time that Peter Gibson J heard the Crown's appeal against the rejection of the commissioners' argument that the Whites had made a disposal for capital gains tax purposes of their Queensferry shares to Jones, the views of the majority of this court in Floor had been held by the House of Lords in Dawson to have been wrong and the dissenting judgment of Eveleigh LJ in Floor had been reaffirmed as correct. It was submitted to Peter Gibson J that the scheme employed by the Whites was exactly the same as that in Dawson and that, given the finding of the composite transaction by the commissioners, the court should hold that the only true reasonable conclusion, on the facts found by them, was that the transfer of the Queensferry shares to Millor had no commercial purpose other than the avoidance of tax. It was therefore submitted that, by virtue of the Ramsay principle, the real transaction was the sale by the Whites of their Queensferry shares to Jones for the moneys which they caused to be paid to Millor and that the taxpayers were liable to capital gains tax.

Counsel for the Crown submitted to Peter Gibson J, as he did before us, that the important characteristic of each step forming part of a 'composite transaction' is that it should be intended by the taxpayer to be one step in a series of steps. For this he particularly relied on Lord Wilberforce's words in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, [1982] AC 300 at 323:

'If it can be seen that a document or transaction was intended to have effect as part of a nexus or series of transactions, or as an ingredient of a wider transaction intended as a whole, there is nothing in the doctrine [of IRC v Duke of Westminster [1936] AC 1, [1935] All ER Rep 259] to prevent it being so regarded . . .'

However, in the next paragraph, Lord Wilberforce referred to the 'intentions of the parties' which, in Peter Gibson J's view, suggested that he may not have regarded the intentions of the taxpayer alone as sufficient for determining what the relevant transaction was (see [1985] 3 All ER 125 at 152, [1985] 1 WLR 1024 at 1031). Furthermore, Lord Wilberforce went on to say ([1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, [1982] AC 300 at 324) that the commissioners—

'are not, under the Duke of Westminster doctrine or any other authority, bound to consider individually each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole. This is particularly the case where (as in Rawling) it is proved that there was an accepted obligation, once a scheme is set in motion, to carry it through its successive steps. It may be so where (as in Ramsay or in Black Nominees Ltd v Nicol (Inspector of Taxes) [1975] STC 372) there is an expectation that it will be so carried through, and no likelihood in practice that it will not.'

'Lord Wilberforce in the passage cited refers to two classes of case to which the Ramsay principle has or may have application and which correspond to the contractual and non-contractual arrangements to which Lord Brightman referred in giving the rationale of the Ramsay principle. It is to be noted that to the non-contractual class of case Lord Wilberforce applies the description that it is where there is an expectation that the series of steps will be carried through once a scheme is set in motion and there is no likelihood that it will not. The practical certainty, to adopt the phrase of counsel for the taxpayers, that the series of steps will be completed once started is a feature of the rationale of the Ramsay principle as expounded by Lord Brightman and is well exemplified in all the cases in which the principle has been held to apply. The justification for equating the non-contractual arrangement with the contractual is that, looking at the realities of a preplanned tax-saving scheme where every step has been arranged, there is no distinction between the two: both will in practice be carried through to their intended conclusion. Contrast the case where in reality there is a distinct possibility that a

b Peter Gibson J ([1985] 3 All ER 125 at 153, [1985] 1 WLR 1024 at 1032) recognised that the commissioners had attempted to make a finding of a composite transaction for the purpose of the application of the Ramsay principle and that, having regard to what had been said in Dawson, this was a finding of fact which was reviewable on the principles of Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow [1955] 3 All ER 48, [1956] AC 14. Having referred to this and other findings of fact by the commissioners, he commented ([1985] 3 All ER 125 at 153-154, [1985] 1 WLR 1024 at 1033):

c 'It would appear from these findings that what the Special Commissioners regarded as the essential quality of a composite transaction was that the taxpayer (with his advisers) should at the time the first step in the composite transaction was taken have planned the steps in the series that made up the composite transaction, regardless of whether the means of achieving all the steps lay within the control of the taxpayer or of whether there was otherwise any practical certainty that all the planned steps would be completed. Thus, although I do not doubt that the Special Commissioners were attempting to make a finding of a composite transaction for the purpose of the application of the Ramsay principle, to my mind they have not directed themselves correctly in law. The case would have to be remitted to the Special Commissioners, as counsel for the Crown submitted it should, unless there was only one true and reasonable conclusion on the facts as found or there was some other point decisive of the appeals.'

e However, looking at the primary facts found by the commissioners, he concluded that, at the time when the July agreement was made, there was no 'practical certainty' that the sale to Jones would be completed; on the contrary there was a live possibility that it would not. In those circumstances, he concluded that it was impossible to say that the July agreement and the August agreement were parts of a composite transaction, so as to satisfy the first Ramsay condition. He considered that the commissioners had f misdirected themselves in law because they—

'regarded as the essential quality of a composite transaction . . . that the taxpayer (with his advisers) should at the time the first step in the composite transaction was taken have planned the steps in the series that made up the composite transaction, regardless of whether the means of achieving all the steps lay within the control of the taxpayer or of whether there was otherwise any practical certainty that all the planned steps would be completed.'

h As a second, further ground of his decision Peter Gibson J held that, in any event, the second Ramsay condition was not satisfied, because it could not properly be said that the July agreement had no commercial purpose other than the avoidance of a liability to tax (see [1985] 3 All ER 125 at 154, [1985] 1 WLR 1024 at 1034). He therefore held that the Ramsay principle, as formulated by the House of Lords, had no application to the case. It was common ground that if the July agreement did not fall to be disregarded the provisions of paras 4 and 6 of Sch 7 were applicable, so that the transfers of the ordinary shares in Queensferry by the taxpayers to Millor were to be treated as not being disposals for capital gains tax purposes. He therefore dismissed the Crown's appeals.

i In relation to the first of the two main grounds of Peter Gibson J's decision, counsel for the Crown submitted to us that the judge erred in holding that the commissioner's finding of a composite transaction was insupportable on Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v Bairstow principles. On the contrary, he contended, Peter Gibson J himself, in applying the 'practical certainty' test referred to above, applied the wrong test: he confused certainty as to the series of steps by which a particular commercial end is to be achieved with certainty as to the achievement of the end itself. It was irrelevant, in counsel's submission, that, at the time of the July agreement, there remained a possibility that the sale to the Whites would not ultimately be achieved: the crucial point was that, at that time, the taxpayers had a firm intention that, if a sale to the Whites should be achieved, it would be routed through the interposed company, Millor. a

In any event, even if contrary to his submission, the 'practical certainty' test were the correct one, counsel for the Crown suggested that it was satisfied on the facts. At the time of the first transfers of the shares in Queensferry on 19 July 1976, the negotiations for the ultimate sale had advanced a long way. The proposed purchaser, Jones, was identified. The approximate likely consideration (in excess of £2m) had been known since May 1976. From that time onwards, the taxpayers had been striving towards the object of an ultimate sale to Jones. These negotiations faltered between 17 and 21 June. However, from that time on they continued, according to the commissioners' findings, with increased purposefulness until the contract with Jones was finally concluded on 9 August; this contract had been in draft form since 25 June 1976. In counsel's submission, the fact that Jones may not have had any settled intention to purchase as at 19 July 1976 was irrelevant; Peter Gibson J erred in considering that the intentions of the contemplated purchaser are relevant in deciding whether or not there is one composite transaction in any given case: the intentions of the taxpayer are the only relevant intentions. b

As a matter of legal analysis, I would for my part prefer to express the first Ramsay condition by reference to the test suggested at the end of the first section of this judgment, rather than by reference to the 'practical certainty' test adumbrated and applied by Peter Gibson J. It seems to me, with respect, that the former test perhaps reflects more accurately both the wording of the phrase 'a preordained series of transactions, ie a single composite transaction' and the essential rationale which enables such a composite transaction to be regarded as involving a disposal by A to C, rather than a disposal by A to B for tax purposes. Nevertheless, both tests come to much the same thing. Unless, at the time when the first transaction in the series is effected, all the essential features of the second transaction have already been determined by persons who have the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of the second transaction, there will be no practical certainty that the second transaction will be effected. e

I agree with Peter Gibson J that, on the basis of the facts found by the commissioners, they could not in law properly have found that the July and August agreements constituted a single composite transaction so as to satisfy the first Ramsay condition. As at the date of the July agreement, the Whites, though hoping and intending that the sale to Jones would go through if they could achieve it, did not have the practical ability to ensure this result. Their ability to do so depended on what Jones might finally be willing to contract with Millor on terms which the Whites regarded as acceptable. (This, I think, is the relevance of Jones's intentions.) The final decision of Jones was still unpredictable. As is indicated by the 'stormy' meeting which took place on 9 August 1976, only at the last moment was there any practical certainty that the August agreement would be concluded. As the taxpayers' counsel cogently submitted in their skeleton argument: g

'Acceptance of the [Crown's] submission [that the first Ramsay condition was satisfied] would mean that the status of the share exchange with Millor could not be known on 19 July 1976, being contingently disregardable depending on whether a sale to Jones eventuated. Since the sale to Jones did take place on 9 August 1976, that period of uncertainty was only 21 days. But suppose the sale had not been concluded as quickly or possibly at all? The intention to create such uncertainty, especially in the context of taxation, should not be imputed to their Lordships.'

In my judgment, this appeal should fail because the first Ramsay condition is not satisfied. In these circumstances, it is unnecessary to reach any conclusion in regard to Peter Gibson J's view that the second Ramsay condition is not satisfied. I will only make

- these brief comments in this context. Though it is clear that the steps involving the interposition of Millor in the series of transactions had business effect, the relevant question is whether or not, on the commissioner's findings of fact, it could properly be said that the interposition of Millor had 'no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax'. Having studied these findings, I think that a proper reading of them indicates that the commissioners (a) regarded the primary purpose of both the acquisition of Millor and the subsequent transfer of the Queensferry shares to
- a Millor as being to avoid the tax which would otherwise have been immediately payable on the ultimate sale to Jones, if that sale were eventually to take place, (b) accepted that a subsidiary purpose of both that acquisition and that transfer was that Millor should act as a holding company of the Queensferry shares if a sale to Jones did not happen but a merger between Queensferry and Cee-N-Cee eventuated, (c) nevertheless, regarded the primary objective of the taxpayers at all material times as being to conclude a sale to
- b Jones.

- In these circumstances, I see the force of the submission made on behalf of the taxpayers that it cannot properly be said that the interposition of Millor had no commercial purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax. Nevertheless, I would find some difficulty in accepting that the mere existence of what may be described colloquially as a 'long-stop' purpose, such as mentioned in (b) above, can prevent the
- d second Ramsay condition from being satisfied in a case where the Ramsay principle would otherwise apply on the facts. Such a conclusion would at present appear to me contrary to the true intent of the Ramsay and Dawson decisions.

However, I find it unnecessary to express any concluded view on this point. For the reasons stated, relating to the first Ramsay condition, I would dismiss this appeal.

- e IRC v Bowater Property Developments Ltd

This appeal concerns the Development Land Tax Act 1976, which imposed new tax on the realisation of the development value of land. Section 1, so far as material, provided as follows:

- f '(1) A tax, to be called development land tax, shall be charged in accordance with the provisions of this Act in respect of the realisation of the development value of land in the United Kingdom.

- (2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person shall be chargeable to development land tax on the realised development value, determined in accordance with this Act, which accrues to him on the disposal by him on or after the appointed day of an interest in land in the United Kingdom . . .

- g Section 4(1) provided:

- 'Subject to the following provisions of this Act, the realised development value accruing to a person on the disposal by him of an interest in land shall be the amount (if any) by which the net proceeds of the disposal exceed the relevant base value of that interest.'

- h Section 4(3) defined 'the net proceeds of the disposal of an interest in land', and s 5 defined 'relevant base value'. Section 12, as amended, gave an exemption for the first £50,000 of development value. It provided, inter alia:

- i '(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, if the total amount of realised development value which accrues to any person in a financial year and on which, apart from this section, that person would be chargeable to development land tax does not exceed £50,000, development land tax shall not be chargeable on any of that realised development value.

- (2) If subsection (1) above does not apply to any person in respect of a financial year, then, subject to the following provisions of this section, the sum of £50,000 shall be deducted from the amount of realised development value on which, apart from this subsection, that person would be chargeable to development land tax in that financial year . . .'

Section 20(1) provided that a disposal of an interest in land by a member of a group of companies to another member of the group should be treated for the purposes of the 1976 Act as a disposal and acquisition for which no consideration was given.

The respondent to this appeal by the Crown is Bowater Property Developments Ltd (BPD), a company in the group of which Bowater Corp plc is the parent. Another of the subsidiaries in the Bowater group is Bowater United Kingdom Paper Co Ltd (BUKP). By November 1978 agreement had been reached between BUKP and a company outside the Bowater group, Milton Pipes Ltd (MPL), subject to contract, for the sale to MPL of 23 acres of land near Milton Regis in Kent, known as Crafts Marsh, for a sum of £202,500. In these negotiations, it had also been agreed that the contract would be conditional on planning permission being obtained for the uses to which MPL wished to put the land. On 7 March 1979 BPD exercised an option to purchase Crafts Marsh from BUKP and thus became its owner. At about that time, one of Bowater's taxation advisers lined up a number of Bowater subsidiaries willing to take undivided shares in Crafts Marsh, a fragmentation exercise designed to make maximum use of the exemption under s 12. At that date the exemption level stood at only £10,000 and no fewer than 18 subsidiaries were involved. Draft deeds were sent to MPL on 9 March 1979 which indicated that a disposal in favour of the 18 subsidiaries was contemplated as a prelude to the sale to MPL. However, by 25 March 1980, no contract had yet been concluded with MPL because of uncertainties relating to planning and other matters.

I now take up the story, more or less verbatim, from the judgment of Warner J ([1985] STC 783). On 25 March 1980 BPD contracted to sell Crafts Marsh for £180,000 to five other companies (the five companies) in the Bowater group as beneficial tenants in common in equal shares. It is not in dispute that that transaction (the first transaction) had no business purpose. The five companies were selected because none of them had used any part of its £50,000 exemption from development land tax under s 12 of the 1976 Act as amended. The sole object of the first transaction was to avoid the liability to development land tax which would otherwise fall on BPD if the sale to MPL went through. At the time of the first transaction there was, as the Special Commissioners found, a firm expectation on the Bowater side that that sale would go through, but the chances of MPL being willing to sign a contract on or about 25 March 1980 were nil.

On 22 May 1980 Mr Goodger, a group legal adviser in Bowater Corp's legal department, during the course of what the commissioners describe as 'a somewhat desultory correspondence' between himself and the solicitors acting for MPL, sent to them, to replace an earlier draft, a revised draft contract, conditional on MPL obtaining planning permission. In this draft the five companies were of course named as vendors. On 7 July 1980 MPL's solicitors wrote to Mr Goodger in these terms:

'Dear Sir,

Land at Crafts Marsh

We thank you for your letter of the 22nd May. We are sorry to tell you that the present economic situation with its direct effect on the concrete making industry has compelled our Clients to give up the proposal to purchase your Company's land. We enclose the various documents which you have sent us.'

It appeared to those concerned on the Bowater side that the sale had fallen through for good. During the ensuing months it remained their general policy to sell Crafts Marsh, but they had no other potential purchaser in mind and they did not actively seek one. Early in February 1981, circumstances having changed, particularly from the planning point of view, the solicitors who had been acting for MPL telephoned Bowater Corp's legal department to say that MPL was interested in Crafts Marsh again. Negotiations

- were thereupon reopened. They resulted in the exchange on 23 October 1981 of unconditional contracts for the sale of Crafts Marsh by the five companies to MPL for £259,750 (the second transaction). The sales were completed on 23 November 1981. On 13 February 1984 the Revenue, in reliance on the Ramsay principle, assessed BPD to development land tax on the footing that the second transaction should be treated for tax purposes as a disposal by BPD. The Special Commissioners held that, on the facts of this case, that principle did not apply and they discharged the assessment.
- b* In this case it was undisputed that the second Ramsay condition was satisfied. The submissions made before Warner J concerned the first Ramsay condition and are to be found summarised in his judgment (see [1985] STC 783 at 796–798). It will be seen that, following the lines of what I have called the Crown's basic contention, they involved a submission by its counsel that the Ramsay principle applies whenever it is found that a step has been taken with a view to avoiding tax in a certain event and that event actually occurs. Warner J said (at 796):

‘Thus, [counsel for the Crown] says, in the present case, what matters is the expectation or intention of those concerned on behalf of the Bowater group at the time of the first transaction. They at that time expected the sale of Crafts Marsh to go through and their purpose in causing the first transaction to take place was to avoid development land tax on that sale. Therefore, the Ramsay principle applies, and the break in the negotiations between the Bowater group and [MPL] that occurred from July 1980 to February 1981 was irrelevant.’

- d* Warner J rejected these submissions of the Crown. He expressed himself in entire agreement with the reasoning that led Peter Gibson J to hold in Craven v White that the first Ramsay condition was not satisfied. He expressed the ratio of his final conclusion as follows (at 800):

‘The crucial fact, to my mind—a fact of which the events of May and July 1980 are but evidence—is that it had not been preordained or prearranged, at the time of the first transaction, that the second transaction would follow. Applying the test suggested by Lord Wilberforce’s words, it could not be said at that time that there was “no likelihood in practice” that the second transaction would not follow. When it followed, 19 months later, it followed as an independent transaction.’

- f* The Revenue’s case on this appeal, as I see it, stands or falls on the Crown’s basic contention. For the reasons which I have given in the first section of this judgment, I think that that contention is not well founded and that the relevant test for the purpose of the first Ramsay condition is that which I have indicated in that section. On the facts of this case, that test is not satisfied. It cannot conceivably be said that, at the date of the first transaction (25 March 1980), all the essential features of the second transaction (which ultimately took place on 23 October 1981) had already been determined by a person who had the firm intention, and for practical purposes the ability, to procure the implementation of that second transaction. If the ‘practical certainty’ test is to be preferred, that test likewise is not satisfied.
- g*
- h*

- Further detailed reference to the facts is unnecessary, but I mention a few points drawn to our attention by counsel for BPD as illustrating the difficulties (to my mind insuperable) of holding that on 23 October 1981, either in substance or in reality, or within the meaning of the 1976 Act, there was a disposal of the land by BPD in favour of MPL. (1) At the time of the second transaction the five companies, not BPD, had been the legal and beneficial owners of the land for some 19 months. (2) BPD was not a party to the contract of sale of 23 October 1981. (3) BPD was not a party to the negotiations which led to that contract and did not receive any of the proceeds of sale. (4) BPD had no control over the land through the five companies. The Bowater group holding company controlled both BPD and the five companies, but BPD had no control, directly or indirectly, of the five companies.

It is common ground that the first transaction was effected without any commercial or business purpose, apart from a tax advantage. Nevertheless, on the facts found by them, I do not think it would have been open to the commissioners properly to find that the first and second transactions were one single composite transaction. Warner J, in my view, was plainly right in deciding that, when the second transaction followed, it did so as an 'independent' transaction in the sense of that phrase as used by Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, [1982] AC 300 at 324.

Various other matters were canvassed in the course of argument, in particular suggested possibilities of double taxation. I do not find it necessary to deal with these matters. More generally, I would, with respect, associate myself with the following observations of Warner J ([1985] STC 783 at 798):

'Counsel for the Crown argued that, unless his submissions were accepted, the application of the Ramsay principle in the "linear" or bilateral type of case would be haphazard. A well-advised taxpayer need never be affected by it, because he could always ensure that the tax avoiding transaction was carried out before any deal with the other party was clinched. That argument would be very convincing if it were legitimate to regard the Ramsay principle as a judge-made anti-tax-avoidance rule, which it was open to the courts to mould and develop in the light of their experience of tax avoidance devices. Indeed counsel for the Crown went so far as to suggest that I should so regard it. In my opinion, however, that would be nothing short of unconstitutional. Under our constitution the imposition of taxation is a matter for Parliament. Indeed within Parliament itself it is a matter in which the House of Commons has a predominant role. The only function of the courts in this sphere is to interpret and apply the legislation enacted by Parliament in accordance with relevant legal principles. Among the relevant legal principles is the principle that the courts are bound to seek to ascertain the true nature of a transaction and to give effect to it. That, to my mind, is the real basis of the Ramsay principle. (I choose the phrase "true nature", but other expressions such as "reality" or "substance"—in the sense in which I understand the latter term to have been used by Lord Bridge in Furniss v Dawson—will do just as well.)'

To call the true nature of the series of transactions in the present case a disposal made on 23 October 1981 in favour of MPL by BPD would appear to me to involve a travesty of the facts.

I would dismiss this appeal.

Baylis v Gregory, Baylis v Gregory and Weare

The decision of Vinelott J ([1986] 1 All ER 289, [1986] 1 WLR 624) which is under appeal by the Crown in this case was given on appeals by the Crown against two related decisions of the Special Commissioners. These decisions had discharged assessments to capital gains tax respectively on Mr R F Gregory and on Mr Gregory and Mr J B Weare (the trustees) jointly as trustees of the estate of Joseph Gregory deceased. They arose out of a transaction, or series of transactions, concerning the shares of a company called Planet Gloves (Industrial) Ltd (PGI) in which Mr Gregory and the trustees held shares. There were then other shareholders of PGI. All were members of Mr Gregory's family, trustees of family settlements or employees of PGI, except Mr Weare. He was the company's accountant and held a few shares in his own right. Appeals by the Crown against the discharge of assessments on the other shareholders had been held over pending Vinelott J's decision on the appeals before him.

Once again, I will gratefully adopt, more or less verbatim, the greater part of Vinelott J's summary of the facts found by the commissioners.

PGI carries on a clothing business. At all material times Mr Gregory was its managing director. He also, through his personal and trustee holdings, had voting control of PGI. In 1973 he negotiated, on behalf of all the shareholders, a sale of the entire issued share a capital of PGI to an investment company, Cannon Street Investments Ltd (Cannon). In the course of the negotiations it was suggested to Mr Gregory that liability to capital gains tax could be indefinitely deferred if the shares of PGI were exchanged for shares of a holding company incorporated in the Isle of Man, which would sell them on to Cannon thus, it was hoped, obtaining the benefit of the relief afforded by paras 6 and 4 of Sch 7 to the 1965 Act. It was also suggested that there would be no fiscal penalty if the proceeds of sale were later lent by the holding company to the shareholders rateably in proportion to their shareholdings. Mr Gregory arranged for a private unlimited company called PG Holdings (Holdings) to be incorporated in the Isle of Man. Early in 1974, before shares of PGI were exchanged for shares of Holdings, Cannon wrote to say that it could not proceed with the purchase. Mr Gregory and the other shareholders decided that they would none the less proceed with the share exchange. There was no disadvantage in doing so. The exchange would be carried out by means of the issue and renunciation of the holdings of bonus shares of PGI on which no stamp duty would be payable. The machinery would be there for use if a sale of the shares of PGI were subsequently negotiated. The exchange was duly completed on 11 March 1974 pursuant to an agreement made that same day.

b There matters rested for some time. Mr Gregory took no steps to find a purchaser. Then, in the late spring of 1975, he learnt by chance that another company, Hawtin Ltd (Hawtin), might be interested in acquiring the shares. Discussions in May and June 1975 came to nothing. However, in November 1975 Hawtin approached him again. The renewed negotiations bore fruit, and on 30 January 1976 an agreement was concluded between Holdings and Hawtin for the sale of all the shares of PGI for £1.75m to be satisfied by a down payment of £1m, a further payment of £550,000 on 31 December 1979 and an issue of convertible loan notes for the face value of £200,000. The agreement was completed on the same day in the Isle of Man.

c As a result of advice given by counsel the proposal that the proceeds of the sale should be lent to the shareholders of Holdings was deferred for a year save that £50,000 was lent to Mr Gregory. The commissioners found that 'a more general withdrawal of funds, to take place in March 1977, was in contemplation at the date of the Sale Agreement' (see [1986] 1 All ER 289 at 294). In the mean time the balance of the £1m was invested. In March loans totalling £945,000 were made. Further loans were made after the deferred consideration of £550,000 had been paid (the payment of this sum having been by agreement deferred for a further six months). Although the Crown at one time contended that the loans were gains accruing to the shareholders, that claim was not pursued before the commissioners.

f The question whether these transactions gave rise to a liability to capital gains tax was the subject of correspondence between a Mr Rothwell, district inspector of taxes for the Pontypridd district, and Mr Weare starting in 1978. In March 1980 Mr Rothwell arranged for assessments to be made on all the shareholders for the year 1973-74. In March 1982 Mr Rothwell decided that alternative assessments should be made for the year 1975-76. On 15 March 1982 he wrote to Mr Weare's firm to say that alternative assessments would be made for the year 1975-76.

g Mr Weare's firm was only concerned with the tax affairs of the trustees and one of the taxpayers. Alternative assessments for the year 1975-76 were against all the shareholders, including Mr Gregory personally, for that year; though Mr Rothwell had asked a subordinate to issue an assessment for 1975-76 to the trustees, the subordinate regrettably made an assessment (dated 15 March 1982) expressed to be for the fiscal year to 6 April 1974-5 April 1975. At the same time he issued a notice of assessment bearing the same date, also expressed to be for that fiscal year.

j Mr Weare's firm appealed against all the assessments. In the case of the trustees, their letter (dated 8 April 1982) read:

'We refer to Capital Gains Tax assessment dated 15th April 1982 marked 1974-

75. Please take this letter as formal appeal. Our appeal is based on Paragraph 6 of the 7th Schedule of the 1965 Finance Act. We are requesting full postponement of Tax.'

At this stage Mr Rothwell noticed the error. He also noticed that, as 5 April 1982 had passed, it was too late to make an assessment for the year 1975-76. So on 26 April 1982 he marked in his records on a standard form opposite the calculation of 'Total Chargeable Gains—(Estimated) £155,000', in the column headed 'Amendment' the words 'Vacated' and 'Raised in Error'. Then, opposite the calculation of the tax payable at 30% (£46,500) appear the words 'Tax discharged—£46,500', and at the foot the tax payable as amended is stated to be 'Nil'. Mr Rothwell notified the collector of taxes of this change but not Mr Weare.

When preparing the appeals to the commissioners the taxpayers' solicitors wrote to the inspector of taxes, Pontypridd, and enclosed a schedule of appeals (24 in all: two for each taxpayer). In that schedule two assessments are shown as made on the trustees, one for 1973-74 and one for 1975-76.

In substance, three issues have been argued on these appeals, namely: (A) since 26 April 1982, when the assessment made against the trustees expressed as an assessment for 1974-75 was 'vacated', has that assessment been capable of having any legal effect at all? (B) if the answer to question (A) is Yes, can the last-mentioned assessment be treated as a good assessment for the fiscal year 1975-76, either by virtue of s 114 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 or otherwise? (C) does the Ramsay principle entitle the Revenue to claim that there have been disposals by the trustees and by Mr Gregory personally in favour of Holdings? I will deal in turn with these issues, of which the first and second do not concern Mr Gregory in his personal capacity.

Issue A

The recent decision of this court in Honig v Sarsfield (Inspector of Taxes) [1986] STC 246 has established that, for the purpose of applying the time limit imposed by s 40(1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970, as amended, an assessment is made at the time when the inspector, authorised to make such an assessment, signs the certificate in the assessment book, not when notice of the assessment is served on the taxpayer.

By what he has suggested is parity of reasoning, counsel for the trustees has submitted that an inspector can effectively vacate or nullify an assessment merely by making an appropriate entry in his records, unilaterally and without any notice to the taxpayers. When Mr Rothwell marked in his records the words 'Vacated' and 'Raised in Error', this, it was submitted, ipso facto nullified the assessment made against the trustees.

Though for the purpose of the relevant time limits an assessment can be made in the privacy of the inspector's office, it will have little, if any, other effect until notice of it is served on the person assessed. Until such service, such person is under no liability to pay; nor does the right of appeal conferred by s 31 arise. However, once notice of the assessment has been served, the position entirely alters. The taxpayer can get rid of the assessment by means of a successful appeal under s 31. Section 50 provides for the reduction or increase of an assessment in the case of an appeal. Section 54 provides for the settling of appeals by agreement. Section 32(1) contains express provisions for the vacation of an assessment in specified circumstances. It reads:

'If on a claim made to the Board it appears to their satisfaction that a person has been assessed to tax more than once for the same cause and for the same chargeable period, they shall direct the whole, or such part of any assessment as appears to be an overcharge, to be vacated, and thereupon the same shall be vacated accordingly.'

However (and this, in my judgment, is the crucial point) the 1970 Act confers no general powers on an inspector to vacate an assessment. Significantly, s 29(6) specifically provides:

'After the notice of assessment has been served on the person assessed, the assessment shall not be altered except in accordance with the express provisions of the Taxes Acts.'

In the present case, therefore, s 29(6) would, in my opinion, have clearly precluded Mr Rothwell from altering the relevant assessment so as to reduce the sum assessed to a nominal sum. It is perhaps more debatable whether s 29(6) on its true construction would itself have prohibited him from withdrawing or vacating an assessment. Nevertheless, counsel for the Crown was, in my judgment, right in submitting that (a) the vacation of an assessment has to be effected properly if it is to be valid and (b) in the absence of any statutory authority for the purported 'vacation' by Mr Rothwell, his entry in the assessment book which purported to record a vacation was not properly made and had no legal effect.

In agreement with Vinelott J, I would therefore reject the trustees' contentions on issue A.

Issue B

As did Vinelott J, I regard the next issue as more difficult. In this context I should begin by dealing with what seems to have been a new line of argument raised by counsel for the Crown in this court and not canvassed in the court below. He pointed out that the assessment against the trustees related to capital gains tax, not income tax, and that, while income tax is payable in respect of income actually or notionally received over a period of time, capital gains tax is payable in respect of actual or notional disposals. In the latter case, as he put it, a particular time does not ordinarily have to be identified by the Revenue beyond identifying the year in which the event took place. In the present case there were only two possible relevant events, namely the share exchange which took place in the fiscal year 1973-74 (11 March 1974) and the sale to Hawtin which took place in the fiscal year 1975-76 (30 January 1976). Accordingly, there were only two fiscal years in which the relevant disposal could have taken place, that is to say 1973-74 or 1975-76. On 15 March 1982 Mr Rothwell had written to Mr Weare's firm to say that (following the assessments already made for the year 1973-74) alternative assessments would be made for the year 1975-76. On that same day the Revenue made an assessment against the trustees, which it marked with the year 1974-75, and sent out a notice of assessment marked with the same year. The notice was one of a bundle of 12 assessments all directed to the same transaction. The other assessments and notice of the assessments were duly marked with the year 1975-76. In these circumstances, counsel submitted, no one concerned believed that the assessment issued against the trustees and marked with the year 1974-75 was intended as anything other than an assessment for the year 1975-76. It was plainly intended to relate to the disposals which had taken place on 30 January 1976. In all the circumstances, it was submitted, the assessment was an assessment for the year 1975-76 and the Crown does not have to rely on s 114 of the 1970 Act.

I have some sympathy with this argument because it would seem to me that Mr Weare's firm (or their clients), on receipt of the notice of assessment marked 1974-75, could not in all the circumstances, after proper thought, have reasonably believed that either the notice of assessment, or the assessment to which it referred, was intended by the Revenue to relate to any year other than 1975-76. Nevertheless, apart from s 114, to which I will revert, I find it impossible to hold that the assessment either was or took effect as an assessment for 1975-76. Contrary to the submissions of counsel for the Crown, as I understood them, the year of assessment is of critical importance in relation to capital gains tax. This is illustrated by s 19(3) of the 1965 Act, which provided:

'... a tax, to be called capital gains tax, shall be assessed and charged for the year 1965-66 and for subsequent years of assessment in respect of chargeable gains accruing in those years ...'

Section 113(3) of the Taxes Management Act 1970 provides:

'Every assessment . . . [or] notice of assessment . . . required to be used in assessing, charging, collecting and levying tax shall be in accordance with the forms prescribed from time to time in that behalf by the Board . . .'

The printed prescribed form of notice of assessment, which was employed by the Revenue in the present case, predictably has a heading in the top left-hand corner: 'Capital gains tax. Year ending 5 April 19 . . '. The body of the notice begins with the words: 'This notice gives particulars of an assessment made on you for the year shown above' (the emphasis is mine). All these matters illustrate that the year of assessment is an essential element of the assessment itself. The assessment is what is written in the assessment book. Section 114 apart, I find it is impossible to say that an assessment for one specified fiscal year can ever be or take effect as an assessment for another fiscal year. Section 114 apart, the fact that the taxpayer may have appreciated that a mistake has been made on receiving the notice of assessment is, to my mind, irrelevant in this context.

I now turn to s 114, which provides:

'(1) An assessment, warrant or other proceeding which purports to be made in pursuance of any provision of the Taxes Acts shall not be quashed, or deemed to be void or voidable, for want of form, or be affected by reason of a mistake, defect or omission therein, if the same is in substance and effect in conformity with or according to the intent and meaning of the Taxes Acts, and if the person or property charged or intended to be charged or affected thereby is designated therein according to common intent and understanding.

(2) An assessment shall not be impeached or affected—(a) by reason of a mistake therein as to—(i) the name or surname of a person liable, or (ii) the description of any profits or property, or (iii) the amount of the tax charged, or (b) by reason of any variance between the notice and the assessment.'

Vinelott J took the view that s 114 will enable an assessment expressed to be for one year to be treated and take effect as an assessment for another year provided that the Crown can show that there was a genuine mistake and that in all the circumstances there was no real possibility that the taxpayer was in any way misled. While I again have some sympathy with this view (which was supported by counsel for the Crown in this court by way of alternative submission), I do not find myself able to concur in it, since I do not think it is warranted by the wording of the section.

Subsection (2) has no application to the facts of this case. The only words of sub-s (1) which can possibly be relied on by the Revenue are the following:

'An assessment . . . which purports to be made in pursuance of any provision of the Taxes Acts shall not . . . be affected by reason of a mistake . . . if the same is in substance and effect in conformity with or according to the intent and meaning of the Taxes Acts . . .'

The assessment in the present case, which the Crown asserts is 'not [to] be affected', is an assessment for 1974–75. Counsel for the trustees accepted and contended that, as an assessment for that fiscal year, it would not be affected by reason of a mistake if the other conditions specified in s 114(1) were satisfied. However, as he pointed out, the subsection does not provide for rectification of an assessment; it is not the equivalent of the 'slip rule'. The relevant fiscal year of assessment is an integral, fundamental part of the assessment itself. I, for my part, find it impossible to read the wording of s 114(1), wide though it is, as justifying in any circumstances the treatment of an assessment made for one fiscal year as an assessment made for another fiscal year. If the Revenue make an assessment for the wrong year, their proper course is to issue a new assessment for the correct year. It is pertinent to observe that s 29(6) of the 1970 Act would preclude them from themselves amending an assessment by substituting a reference to one fiscal year for another.

- a In the course of argument, three authorities relating to the effect of s 114 were cited: British Estate Investment Society Ltd v Jackson (Inspector of Taxes) (1956) 37 TC 79, Fleming (Inspector of Taxes) v London Produce Co Ltd [1968] 2 All ER 975, [1968] 1 WLR 1013 and Hart (Inspector of Taxes) v Briscoe [1978] 1 All ER 79, [1979] Ch 1. I did not derive any great assistance from these authorities, since the judgments in those cases were directed to facts very different from those of the present case. However, in a passage in his judgment in Fleming's case [1968] 2 All ER 975 at 987, [1968] 1 WLR 1013 at 1027 (which judgment primarily concerned the statutory predecessor of s 114(2)) Megarry J made the general observation that he would be slow to accept that the subsections 'provide an impervious coverlet for gross errors'. Vinelott J in the present case was not persuaded that gross error must be absent before what he described as the 'dispensing power in s 114' can be exercised (see [1986] 1 All ER 289 at 306, [1986] 1 WLR 624 at 629). I would merely make this comment. As I am sure Vinelott J appreciated, s 114, where it applies, does not strictly confer a 'dispensing power'. In a case where it applies, it gives the Revenue or the taxpayer, as the case may be, the statutory right to claim that the assessment, warrant or other proceeding in question shall not be affected by reason of a mistake etc. If, contrary to my view, this statutory right has any relevance in relation to an assessment which has been made for the wrong year, I think it unlikely that the legislature would have intended that it would be exercisable where the error was a gross one, as in the present case I think it must have been. To sum up, however, in my judgment, neither s 114 nor any other statutory provision provides an escape route for the Revenue if they issue an assessment for the wrong fiscal year. This is something they must get right.
- e For all these reasons, I think that the assessment made against the trustees cannot be treated as an assessment for the year 1975-76. It is common ground that, if it is to be regarded as an assessment for 1974-75, it can give rise to no legal liability on the part of the trustees.

Issue C

- f Even if my conclusion on issue (B) is correct, this does not dispose of the disputes relating to the assessment made against Mr Gregory personally. I must therefore proceed to consider issue (C).

The Crown's contention is that the exchange of the shares of PGI for the shares of Holdings and the subsequent sale of the PGI shares to Cannon constituted one single composite transaction which, on an application of the Ramsay principle, is to be treated for fiscal purposes as involving a disposal by the taxpayers of the PGI shares to the ultimate purchaser, Hawtin. I propose to deal with this contention very shortly, because I think that the reasons for which I would reject the Crown's similar claims in the two earlier appeals apply a fortiori on the facts of the present cases.

- h Attention, however, should be drawn to a few particularly significant facts. In these cases, as the commissioners found, by the time when the shares of PGI were exchanged for shares of Holdings on 11 March 1974, the previously contemplated sale to Cannon had fallen through. The commissioners found as facts that—

'The incorporation of Holdings and the share-exchange which followed . . . were . . . not made without an appreciation of the possible value of having taken those steps if, at some future date, the [taxpayers] decided to sell the PGI shares to an outside purchaser. But at that time an intention of selling (or of procuring a sale) was absent: it came into being not earlier than the summer of 1975.'

On these findings, the transfer of the PGI shares to Holdings (though, as the commissioners found, it passed the full legal beneficial interest to Holdings) was made solely by way of what has been referred to in the opening section of this judgment as 'strategic tax planning'. At that time no sale at all was in contemplation. The highest it could be put on behalf of the Crown is that the parties intended that the interposition of Holdings should serve as a convenient springboard (convenient for tax purposes) in case at some future date it might be desired to sell the shares in PGI.

There is no dispute that the second Ramsay condition is satisfied. In the circumstances, however, I agree with Vinelott J that it is impossible to say the same of the first Ramsay condition. The Revenue's case is again founded on the Crown's basic contention referred to in the opening section of this judgment. In the court below particular reliance appears to have been placed on Lord Wilberforce's reference in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, [1982] AC 300 at 323 to 'a transaction . . . intended to have effect as part of a nexus or series of transactions, or as an ingredient of a wider transaction intended as a whole'. The exchange of the PGI shares, it was postulated, could properly be regarded as a transaction so intended, within Lord Wilberforce's words. Therefore, it was submitted, the first Ramsay condition was satisfied. I much doubt the correctness of the premise of this submission. Even accepting the premise, however, I do not think the conclusion would follow. Lord Wilberforce's words now fall to be read in the light of what Lord Diplock subsequently said in Burmah and what Lord Brightman said in Dawson in the authoritative formulation of the first Ramsay condition. In my judgment, that condition does not come near to being satisfied on the facts of the present case. It cannot properly be said that the share exchange and the subsequent sale of the shares to Cannon were a preordained series of transactions or a single composite transaction because, at the date of the share exchange, so far from the essential features of a sale to Cannon or any other purchaser having already been determined, no one had the intention, still less the practical ability, to implement a sale to Cannon, or indeed to any other purchaser.

Vinelott J referred to the greater conceptual difficulties involved in treating the shareholders in PGI as if they had entered into a tripartite arrangement for the sale of the shares in PGI to Hawtin, in a case such as this, where the sale on by the interposed company, Holdings, had not been arranged at the time of the share exchange. He also made some cogent comments in relation to double taxation. I do not, however, find it necessary further to explore these points.

For the reasons which I have already stated, I would dismiss these appeals.

PARKER LJ. For the purposes of this judgment I shall first state the essential facts of the three appeals in the shortest possible form and indicate how the issues for determination arise.

Craven v Stephen White, Craven v Brian White

On 19 July 1976 Stephen, Brian and Archibald White, who at that time owned 100% of the shares in S White & Sons (Queensferry) Ltd (Queensferry), exchanged such shares for shares in Millor Investments Ltd (Millor). Millor thereby acquired control of Queensferry.

But for the provisions of paras 4 to 6 of Sch 7 to the Finance Act 1965, this would undoubtedly have been a disposal by the Whites of their shares in Queensferry, not least because s 22(3) of the Act, Pt III of which creates capital gains tax, provides:

'Subject to subsection (6) of this section, and to the exceptions in this Part of this Act, there is for the purposes of this Part of this Act a disposal of assets by their owner where any capital sum is derived from assets . . .'

Subsection (9) of s 22 provides that in that section 'capital sum' means any money or money's worth.

As a result the Whites would, by virtue of ss 19(1) and (3) and 20 of the Act, have been chargeable to capital gains tax in respect of any chargeable gains accruing to them on such disposal.

a By virtue of the provisions of paras 4 and 6 of Sch 7 to the Act, however, such an exchange is not to be treated as a disposal of the Queensferry shares or an acquisition of the Millor shares.

This being so, the Whites were not chargeable to capital gains tax in respect of that transaction viewed alone. They would, however, of course, be chargeable in respect of a subsequent disposal of the Millor shares.

b Three weeks later, Millor, the owner of the Queensferry shares, sold them to Morris & David Jones Ltd (Jones) for £2.2m subject to adjustment. Viewed alone, this was plainly a disposal of the Queensferry shares by their owner, Millor, from which Millor derived a capital sum.

The Crown, however, contends that, for fiscal purposes, the share exchange should be ignored and that the two transactions together constitute a disposal by the Whites of their shares in Queensferry to Jones from which the purchase price accrues to the Whites.

c On the face of it, this contention is somewhat remarkable. By s 19(1) capital gains tax is to be charged in respect of chargeable gains accruing to a person on the disposal of assets, and it is clear from s 22(3) that the person chargeable is their owner. In law the only disposal of assets by the Whites was when they exchanged shares but this is not to be treated as a disposal. Thereafter, Millor disposed of the shares of which it was the legal and beneficial owner and derived a capital sum from the disposal, but the Whites did not.

d The contention is, however, advanced on the basis (1) that the sole purpose of the share exchange, which for present purposes I shall assume is correct, was to avoid, or more strictly to defer, the payment of capital gains tax which, but for the schedule, would have resulted had the Whites sold the Queensferry shares to Jones and (2) that, this being so, the combined result of W T Ramsay Ltd v IRC [1981] 1 All ER 865, [1982] AC 300 (Ramsay), IRC v Burmah Oil Co Ltd [1982] STC 30 (Burmah) and Furniss (Inspector of Taxes) v Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530, [1984] AC 474 (Dawson) is that the Whites are chargeable on the basis that the capital sum derived by Millor from the sale to Jones accrued to them.

f The basic facts are very similar save as to the dates. In this case the share exchange was effected on 11 March 1974, ie in the 1973-74 year of assessment, and the sale on to a purchaser 22 months later in the 1975-76 year of assessment. The Crown's contention is the same. In this case it is even more remarkable. Mr Gregory and Mr Weare are thus said to have disposed in 1976 of shares in which they had had no legal or beneficial interest since March 1974.

g Before turning to the remaining appeal, I pause to observe that, in each of the foregoing cases, the question is whether, on the true construction of the relevant provisions of the Finance Act 1965, there was, on the facts, a disposal resulting in a chargeable gain accruing to the taxpayer. This observation may appear to be entirely superfluous but I make it because it seemed to me, during the course of the arguments presented to us on the scope and effect of the Ramsay principle, that it has been to some extent overlooked.

h It is of importance to bear it in mind. This is because taxing Acts must be construed according to well-known principles by which this court is bound no less than it is bound by the decisions of the House of Lords in Ramsay, Burmah and Dawson.

j In this case the asset concerned was land and not shares and the relevant statute is the Development Land Tax Act 1976.

On 25 March 1980 Bowater Property Developments Ltd (BPD), which was a subsidiary of Bowater Corp plc, sold to each of five other subsidiaries of the corporation a one-fifth undivided share in 23 acres of land known as Crafts Marsh for £180,000. By virtue of s 20(1) of the 1976 Act each of these five sales is to be treated as a disposal and acquisition for which no consideration was given. There was thus on any one of these transactions no question of any charge to development land tax arising. The transfers would, however, have the result that, if, as was contemplated, the land were thereafter sold by the five companies to a purchaser outside the group, each would have available the free allowance provided for by s 12. a

None of the five purchaser companies was controlled by BPD. The sales to them occurred in the 1979–80 year of assessment. Nineteen months later in the next year of assessment the five companies joined together in selling the land to a company outside the group for a total purchase price of £259,000. Viewed alone, this was clearly a disposal by them of their interests in Crafts Marsh. b

At that date the land was neither legally nor beneficially owned by BPD, the five companies were not controlled by BPD and no part of the proceeds of sale accrued legally, beneficially or 'really' to BPD.

The Crown, however, again contends that the two transactions should be treated as one and regarded as a disposal by BPD resulting in realised development value accruing to BPD. c

This contention is even more remarkable than the contention in the other two appeals. Again, the question is one of construction of a taxing Act.

I turn therefore to the basic statutory provisions. d

The Finance Act 1965

'19.—(1) Tax shall be charged in accordance with this Act in respect of capital gains, that is to say chargeable gains computed in accordance with this Act and accruing to a person on the disposal of assets . . .

(3) Subject to the said provisions, a tax, to be called capital gains tax, shall be assessed and charged for the year 1965–66 and for subsequent years of assessment in respect of chargeable gains accruing in those years, and shall be so charged in accordance with the following provisions of this Part of this Act. e

20.—(1) Subject to any exceptions provided by this Act, a person shall be chargeable to capital gains tax in respect of chargeable gains accruing to him in a year of assessment during any part of which he is resident in the United Kingdom, or during which he is ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom . . . f

22 . . . (3) Subject to subsection (6) of this section, and to the exceptions in this Part of this Act, there is for the purposes of this Part of this Act a disposal of assets by their owner where any capital sum is derived from assets notwithstanding that no asset is acquired by the person paying the capital sum, and this subsection applies in particular to—(a) capital sums received by way of compensation for any kind of damage or injury to assets or for the loss, destruction or dissipation of assets or for any depreciation or risk of depreciation of an asset, (b) capital sums received under a policy of insurance of the risk of any kind of damage or injury to, or the loss or depreciation of, assets, (c) capital sums received in return for forfeiture or surrender of rights, or for refraining from exercising rights, and (d) capital sums received as consideration for use or exploitation of assets . . . g

(9) The amount of the gains accruing on the disposal of assets shall be computed in accordance with Part I of Schedule 6 to this Act, and subject to the further provisions in Schedules 7 and 8 to this Act, and in this section "capital sum" means any money or money's worth which is not excluded from the consideration taken into account in the computation under the said Part I of Schedule 6 to this Act. h

(10) Every gain accruing after 6th April 1965 shall, except so far as otherwise expressly provided by this Part of this Act, be a chargeable gain, but subject to the provisions of Part II of Schedule 6 to this Act (which restricts the amount of chargeable gains accruing on the disposal of assets owned on 6th April 1965). i

- There is no definition of 'disposal' in the definition section but this is not surprising.
- a Subsection (3) of s 22 which I have set out, the other subsections of that section, in particular sub-s (5), and the provisions of Schs 6, 7 and 8 contain detailed provisions as to what is and what is not to be regarded as a disposal and as to what persons are or are not to be treated as making a disposal. It would have been quite impossible to embody these detailed provisions in any paragraph which began 'For the purposes of this Part of this Act "disposal" means . . .' What, as it seems to me, Parliament has plainly done is to create
- b a very detailed and elaborate set of provisions to make it clear what transactions were or were not to be disposals and who was to be chargeable. Section 22(5) is a good example of making chargeable a person beneficially entitled albeit the disposal was made by the legal owner, and s 22(6) and paras 4 and 6 of Sch 7 provide examples of cases which are not to be regarded as disposals.

c The Development Land Tax Act 1976

'1.—(1) A tax, to be called development land tax, shall be charged in accordance with the provisions of this Act in respect of the realisation of the development value of land in the United Kingdom.

- d (2) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person shall be chargeable to development land tax on the realised development value, determined in accordance with this Act, which accrues to him on the disposal by him on or after the appointed day of an interest in land in the United Kingdom, and shall be so chargeable whether or not he is resident (for purposes of income tax or otherwise) in the United Kingdom . . .

- e 4.—(1) Subject to the following provisions of this Act, the realised development value accruing to a person on the disposal by him of an interest in land shall be the amount (if any) by which the net proceeds of the disposal exceed the relevant base value of that interest.

(2) In this Act, in relation to a disposal of an interest in land, "the chargeable person" means the person making the disposal.

- f (3) References in this Act to the net proceeds of the disposal of an interest in land are references to the consideration for the disposal, less the incidental costs to the chargeable person of making the disposal . . .

Again, disposal is not defined but, again, there are elaborate and detailed provisions as to what is and is not to be treated as a disposal and as to the persons to be chargeable. I give as examples ss 2, 20 and 28 and Pt I of Sch 1.

- g In one sense, the question to be determined here is, in two cases, whether the taxpayer disposed of shares to the ultimate purchaser and whether, thereby, a chargeable gain accrued to him within ss 19 and 20 of the 1965 Act. In the other case, it is whether the taxpayer disposed of Crafts Marsh to the ultimate purchaser and whether, thereby, realised development value accrued to it within ss 1 and 2 of the 1976 Act. This, however, is, in my view, a gross over-simplification. The true question is, in each case, whether, on
- h the true construction of any of the other provisions of the respective Acts, the taxpayer is, on the facts, brought within the charging sections.

- i In searching for the answer to this question I shall deal first with well-settled principles before I examine in any detail the three decisions which together form the Ramsay principle. Lest it be thought that in so doing I am reluctant to escape from the ghosts or shackles of the past, I should perhaps make it clear that I do so because they were reiterated by Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay and because Lord Diplock stated in Burmah that the new approach in Ramsay did not involve overruling previous decisions of their Lordships' House. Since in Ramsay Lord Russell, Lord Roskill and Lord Bridge agreed with Lord Wilberforce, and since in Burmah Lord Scarman, Lord Roskill and Lord Brandon agreed with Lord Diplock, I regard myself as bound to do so.

I take those principles from the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 870-871, [1982] AC 300 at 323-324. a

Principle no 1

'A subject is only to be taxed on clear words, not on "intendment" or on the "equity" of an Act. Any taxing Act of Parliament is to be construed in accordance with this principle.' b

'What are "clear words" is to be ascertained on normal principles; these do not confine the courts to literal interpretation. There may, indeed should, be considered the context and scheme of the relevant Act as a whole, and its purpose may, indeed should, be regarded: see Inland Revenue Comrs v Wesleyan and General Assurance Society [1946] 2 All ER 749 at 751 per Lord Greene MR and Mangin v Inland Revenue Comr [1971] 1 All ER 179 at 182, [1971] AC 739 at 746 per Lord Donovan. The relevant Act in these cases is the Finance Act 1965, the purpose of which is to impose a tax on gains, less allowable losses, arising from disposals.' c

It is not entirely clear at first sight how, if intendment is to be excluded, 'purpose' is to be included. I can myself derive no assistance on the point from Lord Greene MR's judgment, for his observations on construction related to the construction of a document. He did, however, on the same page make some general observations of relevance to the present appeals. He said: d

'In dealing with income tax questions it frequently happens that there are two methods at least of achieving a particular financial result. If one of those methods is adopted, tax will be payable. If the other method is adopted, tax will not be payable. It is sufficient to refer to the common case where property is sold for a lump sum payable by instalments. If a piece of property is sold for £1,000 and the purchase price is to be paid in ten instalments of £100 each, no tax is payable. If, on the other hand, the property is sold in consideration of an annuity of £100 a year for ten years, tax is payable. The net result, from the financial point of view, is precisely the same in each case, but one method of achieving it attracts tax and the other method does not. There have been cases in the past where what has been called "the substance of the transaction" has been thought to enable the court to construe a document in such a way as to attract tax. That doctrine was, I hope, finally exploded by the decision of the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Westminster (Duke) ([1936] AC 1, [1935] All ER Rep 259).' e

On the particular point Lord Donovan's judgment in Mangin v IR Comr does not assist either, but again it is of value on the general ambit of Principle no 1. Lord Donovan said ([1971] 1 All ER 179 at 182, [1971] AC 739 at 746): f

"... one has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment. There is no equity about a tax. There is no presumption as to tax. Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used." (Per Rowlatt J in Cape Brandy Syndicate v Inland Revenue Comrs [1921] 1 KB 64 at 71, approved by Viscount Simons LC in Canadian Eagle Oil Co Ltd v Regem [1945] 2 All ER 499 at 507, [1946] AC 119 at 140). Thirdly, the object of the construction of a statute being to ascertain the will of the legislature, it may be presumed that neither injustice nor absurdity was intended. If therefore a literal interpretation would produce such a result, and the language admits of an interpretation which would avoid it, then such an interpretation may be adopted. Fourthly, the history of an enactment and the reasons which led to its being passed may be used as an aid to its construction.' (My emphasis.) g

In connection with the first principle I cite two further passages from speeches in their Lordships' House. In Partington v A-G (1869) LR 4 HL 100 at 122 Lord Cairns said:

'... as I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation, it is this: If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be admissible, in any statute, what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute.'

And in Tennant v Smith (Surveyor of Taxes) [1892] AC 150 at 154 Lord Halsbury LC said:

'In various cases the principle of construction of a taxing Act has been referred to in various forms, but I believe they may be all reduced to this, that inasmuch as you have no right to assume that there is any governing object which a taxing Act is intended to attain other than that which it has expressed by making such and such objects the intended subject for taxation, you must see whether a tax is expressly imposed.' (My emphasis.)

When Lord Wilberforce referred to the purpose of the 1965 Act being to impose a tax on gains less allowable losses, arising from disposals, he was, as it seems to me, stating the 'purpose' within those limits mentioned by Lord Halsbury LC.

In this limited sense the purpose does not appear to be of any assistance in the present appeal, for the detailed and elaborate provisions of the Act make it clear that the purpose was to tax some people and not others in respect of certain transactions and not others, and one can only determine which people and which transactions by looking at the words of the sections.

'A subject is entitled to arrange his affairs so as to reduce his liability to tax. The fact that the motive for a transaction may be to avoid tax does not invalidate it unless a particular enactment so provides. It must be considered according to its legal effect.'

This principle is stated by Lord Wilberforce without qualification. The first sentence is a paraphrase of what Lord Tomlin said in IRC v Duke of Westminster [1936] AC 1 at 19, [1935] All ER Rep 259 at 267. The remainder appears to me to summarise the effect of the rest of Lord Tomlin's speech but, in view of later developments, it is desirable that Lord Tomlin's statements should be seen in context. He said ([1936] AC 1 at 19-20, [1935] All ER Rep 259 at 267-268):

'... it is said that in revenue cases there is a doctrine that the Court may ignore the legal position and regard what is called "the substance of the matter," ... This supposed doctrine (upon which the Commissioners apparently acted) seems to rest for its support upon a misunderstanding of language used in some earlier cases. The sooner this misunderstanding is dispelled, and the supposed doctrine given its quietus, the better it will be for all concerned, for the doctrine seems to involve substituting "the uncertain and crooked cord of discretion" for "the golden and straight metwand of the law." (4 Co Inst 41.) Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be. If he succeeds in ordering them so as to secure this result, then, however unappreciative the Commissioners of Inland Revenue or his fellow taxpayers may be of his ingenuity, he cannot be compelled to pay an increased tax. This so-called doctrine of "the substance" seems to me to be nothing more than an attempt to make a man pay notwithstanding that he has so ordered his affairs that the amount of tax sought from him is not legally claimable . . . The matter was put accurately by my noble and learned friend Lord Warrington of Clyffe when as Warrington L.J. in In re Hinckes, Dashwood v. Hinckes ([1921] 1 Ch 475 at 489, [1921] All ER Rep 558 at 565) he used these words: "It is said we must go behind the form and look at the substance . . . but, in order to ascertain the substance, I must look at the legal effect of the bargain which the parties have entered into." (My emphasis.)

'It is for the fact-finding commissioners to find whether a document, or a transaction, is genuine or a sham. In this context, to say that a document or transaction is a "sham" means that, while professing to be one thing, it is in fact something different. To say that a document or transaction is genuine, means that, in law, it is what it professes to be, and it does not mean anything more than that.' (My emphasis.)

Principle no 4

'Given that a document or transaction is genuine, the court cannot go behind it to some supposed underlying substance.'

As to this principle Lord Wilberforce said ([1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, [1982] AC 300 at 323-324):

'This is a cardinal principle but it must not be overstated or over-extended. While obliging the court to accept documents or transactions, found to be genuine, as such, it does not compel the court to look at a document or a transaction in blinkers, isolated from any context to which it properly belongs. If it can be seen that a document or transaction was intended to have effect as part of a nexus or series of transactions, or as an ingredient of a wider transaction intended as a whole, there is nothing in the doctrine to prevent it being so regarded; to do so is not to prefer form to substance, or substance to form. It is the task of the court to ascertain the legal nature of any transaction to which it is sought to attach a tax or a tax consequence and if that emerges from a series or combination of transactions, intended to operate as such, it is that series or combination which may be regarded. For this there is authority in the law relating to income tax and capital gains tax: see Chinn v Collins (Inspector of Taxes) [1981] 1 All ER 189, [1981] AC 533 and Inland Revenue Comrs v Plummer [1979] 3 All ER 775, [1980] AC 896. For the commissioners considering a particular case it is wrong, and an unnecessary self-limitation, to regard themselves as precluded by their own finding that documents or transactions are not "shams" from considering what, as evidenced by the documents themselves or by the manifested intentions of the parties, the relevant transaction is. They are not, under the Duke of Westminster doctrine or any other authority, bound to consider individually each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole. This is particularly the case where (as in Rawling) it is proved that there was an accepted obligation, once a scheme is set in motion, to carry it through its successive steps. It may be so where (as in Ramsay or in Black Nominees Ltd v Nicol (Inspector of Taxes) [1975] STC 372) there is an expectation that it will be so carried through, and no likelihood in practice that it will not. In such cases (which may vary in emphasis) the commissioners should find the facts and then decide as a matter (reviewable) of law whether what is in issue is a composite transaction or a number of independent transactions.' (My emphasis.)

a that the legal nature of a series of transactions is something which in law it is not. It appears to me that this is preferring substance to form and this certainly appears to have been the view of both Lord Roskill and Lord Bridge in their speeches in Dawson. I shall return to this question later. First I shall consider whether, on any construction of any provision of either of the two Acts here in question, it can be said, within the four principles, that the taxpayers disposed of their shares or their land to the ultimate purchaser and thereby made a chargeable gain or realised development value. In my view, the answer must plainly be No. It would only be possible to arrive at such a result by implying some elaborate proviso in para 6 of Sch 7 to the 1965 Act and s 20 of the 1976 Act.

b In the one case such a proviso would have to be on the following lines: 'Provided that, if the sole purpose of the exchange is to avoid the tax which would have resulted had the original holding been sold to a third party and the shares are thereafter sold to a third party, then the sale to the third party shall be treated as if it were a disposal by the original owner to the third party and the proceeds of sale shall be treated as a capital sum derived from the disposal by the original owner.'

c The implication could not, however, stop there, or so it seems to me. The original owner would still be possessed of the new holding and provision would need to be made as to what was to happen if and when he disposed of the new holding, for, in the absence of such a provision, the position of the new holding is unascertainable. If one is to ignore the exchange, does one also ignore the acquisition and the subsequent disposal of the new holding?

d In the third case also there would have to be some provision, equally elaborate, to achieve the result contended for by the Crown. The contention is only made because the fragmentation resulted in the five companies having greater free allowances than the original owner. What then must be read in? There are clearly many possibilities, none of them being expressed. Whatever solution were adopted it would seem to involve elaborate implication. If Lord Donovan in Mangin v IRC [1971] 1 All ER 179 at 182, [1971] AC 739 at 746 was right, nothing is to be implied. If intentment and equity are excluded, there is, in any event, no warrant for reading in anything. If motive does not invalidate, the share exchanges and the fragmentation stand. If the legal results of genuine documents are looked at there is no question of the taxpayers being chargeable. If the parliamentary purpose is looked at it appears to be clear. In the two share cases it was that there should be no tax on the disposal constituted by the change but tax on a subsequent disposal of the new holding by the original owner. In the development land case it was similar.

e Unless, therefore, the Ramsay principle is wide enough to override, but without overruling, the four principles, the Crown's case must fail.

f I turn, therefore, to this aspect of the case. In Ramsay and in Burmah the question was whether the taxpayers had succeeded in creating an allowable loss and it was held that they had not.

I find it unnecessary to examine further the speeches in that case, for in Burmah the House of Lords defined the ratio of the case and it is with that that this court is concerned.

h Lord Fraser, with whose speech all other members of the House agreed, said ([1982] STC 30 at 37-38):

i 'The ratio of the decision in Ramsay is to be found in the speech of Lord Wilberforce ([1981] 1 All ER 865 at 873, [1982] AC 300 at 326) where he said this: "The capital gains tax was created to operate in the real world, not that of make-belief. As I said in Aberdeen Construction Group Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs [1978] 1 All ER 962 at 996, [1978] AC 885 at 893, it is a tax on gains (or I might have added gains less losses), it is not a tax on arithmetical differences. To say that a loss (or gain) which appears to arise at one stage in an indivisible process, and which is intended to be and is cancelled out by a later stage, so that [at] the end of what was bought as,

and planned as, a single continuous operation, [there] is not such a loss (or gain) as the legislation is dealing with, is in my opinion well and indeed essentially within the judicial function.” In the same case I said with reference to the cases of IRC v Plummer [1979] 3 All ER 775, [1980] AC 896 and Chinn v Collins (Inspector of Taxes): “The essential feature of both schemes was that, when they were completely carried out, they did not result in any actual loss to the taxpayer. The apparently magic result of creating a tax loss that would not be a real loss was to be brought about by arranging that the scheme included a loss which was allowable for tax purposes and a matching gain which was not chargeable.” (See [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 881, [1982] AC 300 at 337.) The question in this part of the appeal is whether the present scheme, when completely carried out, did or did not result in a loss such as the legislation is dealing with, which I may call for short, a real loss. In my opinion it did not.’ (All emphasis is mine.)

Apart from defining the ratio of Ramsay, Burmah is, in my view, principally of importance for a passage in the speech of Lord Diplock, with whose speech Lord Scarman, Lord Roskill and Lord Brandon agreed. Lord Diplock said ([1982] STC 30 at 32):

‘It would be disingenuous to suggest, and dangerous on the part of those who advise on elaborate tax-avoidance schemes to assume, that Ramsay’s case did not mark a significant change in the approach adopted by this House in its judicial role to a pre-ordained series of transactions (whether or not they include the achievement of a legitimate commercial end) into which there are inserted steps that have no commercial purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax which in the absence of those particular steps would have been payable. The difference is in approach. It does not necessitate the overruling of any earlier decisions of this House; but it does involve recognising that Lord Tomlin’s oft-quoted dictum in IRC v Duke of Westminster [1936] AC 1 at 19, [1935] All ER Rep 259 at 267, “Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be”, tells us little or nothing as to what methods of ordering one’s affairs will be recognised by the courts as effective to lessen the tax that would attach to them if business transactions were conducted in a straightforward way.’ (My emphasis.)

This passage is of importance for three reasons: (i) it defines the subject matter to which the significant new approach in Ramsay is to be applied; (ii) it states that the difference in approach does not involve overruling any earlier decisions of the House of Lords; (iii) it accepts specifically Lord Tomlin’s dictum in IRC v Duke of Westminster but states that the new approach does involve recognising that the dictum is silent or at least nearly silent as to its scope or ambit.

As to the first of these matters, the definition goes further than Ramsay because it includes cases where the series of transactions includes the achievement of a legitimate commercial end. It is, however, much more specific than Ramsay, for it appears to limit the cases to which the new approach is to be applied to those in which there are (i) a series of transactions, which (ii) are preordained, and into which (iii) there are inserted steps which have no commercial purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax which, in the absence of those particular steps, would have been payable.

It is important to realise that Lord Diplock is not saying that, given these elements, the tax which the inserted steps are designed to avoid is payable. He is saying only that, given those elements, it is a proper case for the new approach. That approach is one in which one must look for the real loss or gain.

In my view, he could not have been going further than I have indicated, for ultimately the question is one of construction of a taxing Act and, previous decisions not being overruled, they as well as the Ramsay principle must be applied. He cannot, therefore, have been saying that, given the elements mentioned, the result follows whatever the language.

a I now come to Dawson, which clearly extended the Ramsay principle. The facts were very different. The transactions were only two in number, were not self-cancelling or circular and included the achievement of a legitimate commercial end. In essence, those transactions consisted in the transfer from A to B Ltd of shares in X Ltd in exchange for shares in B Ltd and the sale by B Ltd of the shares in X Ltd to C.

b The transactions, as transactions, were, therefore, in essence the same as the transactions here under consideration, although the fiscal advantages sought were different. Here in the two share exchanges the advantage was, as in Dawson, sought by the taxpayers themselves by way of tax deferment. In the case of the Crafts Marsh transactions, however, the advantage was a group advantage in the availability of the five companies' free allowances. Although the Dawson transactions were the same, the nature of the operation was markedly different in that case to the operations in the present cases.

c Lord Brightman described the Dawson operation thus ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 537-538, [1984] AC 474 at 520):

d "There are very full minutes of the board meeting of one of the operating companies and similar minutes exist in the case of the other company. These show that the whole process was planned and executed with faultless precision. The meetings began at 12.45 pm on 20 December, at which time the shareholdings of the operating companies were still owned by the Dawsons unaffected by any contract for sale. They ended with the shareholdings in the ownership of Wood Bastow. The minutes do not disclose when the meeting ended, but perhaps it was all over in time for lunch.' (My emphasis.)

e And Lord Bridge said that the purpose of the scheme was to ensure that for a 'scintilla temporis' the beneficial interest in the shares was held by Greenjacket (B Ltd) (see [1984] 1 All ER 530 at 536, [1984] AC 474 at 518).

f The two transactions were thus carried out within a very short space of time, they were plainly preordained and the purpose of the first was solely to defer payment of tax which would have been payable on a direct sale.

I have ventured to say a little about the facts in Dawson before investigating the legal effect of the decision, for it is, in the present appeals, important to bear them in mind. To ascertain the legal effect requires, I fear, an examination in some detail of the speeches delivered by their Lordships. I take them in the order in which they were delivered.

g Lord Fraser, who had in Burmah identified the ratio of Ramsay, now identified its principle. He said ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 532, [1984] AC 474 at 512-513):

h "The true principle of the decision in Ramsay was that the fiscal consequences of a preordained series of transactions, intended to operate as such [my emphasis], are generally to be ascertained by considering the result of the series as a whole, and not by dissecting the scheme and considering each individual transaction separately. The principle was stated in the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Ramsay [1981] 1 All ER 865 at 871, [1982] AC 300 at 324 especially where his Lordship said: "For the commissioners considering a particular case it is wrong, and an unnecessary self-limitation, to regard themselves as precluded by their own finding that documents or transactions are not "shams" from considering what, as evidenced by the documents themselves or by the manifested intentions of the parties, the relevant transaction is [Lord Fraser's emphasis]. They are not, under the Duke of Westminster doctrine . . . or any other authority, bound to consider individually each separate step in a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole." . . . The series of two transactions in the present case was planned as a single scheme, and I am clearly of opinion that it should be viewed as a whole [my emphasis]. The relevant transaction, if I may borrow the expression used by Lord Wilberforce, consists of the two transactions or stages taken together. It was a disposal by the taxpayers of the shares in the operating company for cash to Wood Bastow Holdings Ltd. I would allow the appeals.' a

The acceptance of the Duke of Westminster doctrine is to be noted, as also Lord Fraser's reference to 'the fiscal consequences of a preordained series of transactions, intended to operate as such'.

Lord Scarman made some observations which deal with the general approach but also accepted the Duke of Westminster principle. He said ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 533, [1984] AC 474 at 513-514): b

'What has been established with certainty by the House in Ramsay's case is that the determination of what does, and what does not, constitute unacceptable tax evasion is a subject suited to development by judicial process. The best chart that we have for the way forward appears to me, with great respect to all engaged on the map-making process, to be the words of Lord Diplock in IRC v Burmah Oil Co Ltd [1982] STC 30 at 32 which my noble and learned friend Lord Brightman quotes in his speech. These words leave space in the law for the principle enunciated by Lord Tomlin in IRC v Duke of Westminster [1936] AC 1 at 19, [1935] All ER Rep 253 at 267 that every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as to diminish the burden of tax. The limits within which this principle is to operate remain to be probed and determined judicially. Difficult though the task may be for judges, it is one which is beyond the power of the blunt instrument of legislation. Whatever a statute may provide, it has to be interpreted and applied by the courts; and ultimately it will prove to be in this area of judge-made law that our elusive journey's end will be found.' c

I pause to observe that I find some difficulty in reconciling this approach with the well-established principle that the subject is only to be taxed by clear words. d

By contrast with those who had gone before him, Lord Roskill, referring to IRC v Duke of Westminster, said ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 533-534, [1984] AC 474 at 515): e

'1936, a bare half century ago, cannot be described as part of the Middle Ages but the ghost of the Duke of Westminster and of his transaction, be it noted a single and not a composite transaction, with his gardener and with other members of his staff has haunted the administration of this branch of the law for too long. I confess that I had hoped that that ghost might have found quietude with the decisions in Ramsay and in Burmah. Unhappily it has not. Perhaps the decision of this House in these appeals will now suffice as exorcism.' (My emphasis.) f

Lord Bridge appears to have taken the view that the Duke of Westminster doctrine is only applicable in the case of a single transaction. He said ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 535, [1984] AC 474 at 516-517): g

'Of course, the judiciary must never lose sight of the basic premise expressed in the celebrated dictum of Lord Tomlin in IRC v Duke of Westminster [1936] AC 1 at 19, [1935] All ER Rep 259 at 267, that— "Every man is entitled if he can to order his affairs so as that the tax attaching under the appropriate Acts is less than it otherwise would be." . . . The strong dislike expressed by the majority in the Westminster case [1936] AC 1 at 19, [1935] All ER Rep 259 at 267 for what Lord Tomlin described as the "doctrine that the Court may ignore the legal position and regard what is 'called the substance of the matter'" is not in the least surprising when one remembers that the only transaction in question was the duke's covenant in favour of his gardener and the bona fides of that transaction was never for a moment impugned. When one moves, however, from a single transaction to a series of interdependent transactions designed to produce a given result, it is, in my opinion, perfectly legitimate to draw a distinction between the substance and the h a form of the composite transaction without in any way suggesting that any of the single transactions which make up the whole are other than genuine. This has been the approach of the United States federal courts enabling them to develop a doctrine whereby the tax consequences of the composite transaction are dependent on its substance not its form. I shall not attempt to review the American authorities, nor do I propose a wholesale importation of the American doctrine in all its ramifications into English law. But I do suggest that the distinction between form and substance is one which can usefully be drawn in determining the tax consequences of composite transactions and one which will help to free the courts from the shackles which have for so long been thought to be imposed on them by the Westminster case. I shall attempt no exhaustive exposition of all the criteria by which, for the purpose I suggest, form and substance are to be distinguished. Once a basic doctrine of form and substance is accepted, the drawing of precise boundaries will need to be worked out on a case by case basis.'

c I come finally to the speech of Lord Brightman, with which all other members of the House agreed. Having examined in some detail the judgments in Floor v Davis (Inspector of Taxes) [1978] 2 All ER 1079, [1978] Ch 295 and the judgments both at first instance and in this court in Dawson itself (see [1982] STC 267; [1984] AC 474 at 477), gently chiding those who delivered them for what appeared to him to be a determination to resist any inroads into the principles of the Duke of Westminster case, he said ([1984] 1 All ER 530 at 543, [1984] AC 474 at 527):

e 'The formulation by Lord Diplock in Burmah expresses the limitations of the Ramsay principle. First, there must be a preordained series of transactions, or, if one likes, one single composite transaction. This composite transaction may or may not include the achievement of a legitimate commercial (ie business) end. The composite transaction does, in the instant case: it achieved a sale of the shares in the operating companies by the Dawsons to Wood Bastow. It did not in Ramsay. Secondly, there must be steps inserted which have no commercial (business) purpose apart from the avoidance of a liability to tax, not "no business effect". If those two ingredients exist, the inserted steps are to be disregarded for fiscal purposes. The court must then look at the end result. Precisely how the end result will be taxed will depend on the terms of the taxing statute sought to be applied.' (Lord Brightman's emphasis.)

This last quotation, in my view, embodies the limits of the Ramsay principle. The limitations of the principle therein stated are such that, in my view, the Crown must fail in the present cases, for in none of them can the ultimate transaction be considered as part of a preordained series, but in my view Dawson leaves many questions unanswered. Taking the last two sentences of the quotation, the question arises as to the consequences of disregarding the share exchanges and land fragmentation for fiscal purposes when the effect of the transactions has already been stated by Parliament to have no immediate fiscal results. What happens when the new holdings are ultimately sold? What would have happened on the land fragmentation if it had resulted in realised development value not offset by BPD's free allowance? How can one look at the end result and then see how the end result is to be taxed when the terms of the taxing statute do not apply to the real legal result unless IRC v Duke of Westminster and indeed the four principles are overruled? How does one reconcile the fact that what finally attracted tax, according to the Crown, was the sale to the ultimate purchaser which neither legally, beneficially nor in reality was made by the taxpayer? I would find it easier to follow if the result were said to be that the taxpayer lost the advantage of the share exchange or the fragmentation as the case may be, but this would be to give it fiscal consequences, not to deny it such consequences. The merit would, however, be that one would not be left in a situation where, in the share cases, the taxpayer has in his hands the new holdings which would attract tax if there were a gain on disposal.

More generally, if it is to remain the case that the subject is chargeable only by statute and only by clear and express words, how can it be right to say that taxing the subject is not suitable to be dealt with by the blunt instrument of statute but must be probed and developed by judicial decision? a

All these questions will no doubt be answered by their Lordships when they deal, as it seems inevitable that they will, with appeals from this court. For myself, I am unable to answer them and am thankful that it is unnecessary for me to do so. One way or another it appears to me that the ghost of the pre-Duke of Westminster doctrine which that case sought to lay to rest would, if the present appeals are to succeed, have to be resurrected. At present, I am of the clear view (1) that the Crown's contention in these cases is, to borrow Lord Tomlin's words, 'nothing more than an attempt to make a man pay notwithstanding that he has so ordered his affairs that the amount of tax sought from him is not legally claimable' (see [1936] AC 1 at 20, [1935] All ER Rep 259 at 267-268), (2) that to extend the Ramsay principle to the present cases would involve substituting "the uncertain and crooked cord of discretion" for "the golden and straight metwand of the law" (see [1936] AC 1 at 19, [1935] All ER Rep 259 at 267) and (3) that for the commissioners to determine the fiscal end result of a series of transactions and then apply the statute is a process which involves determining that a taxable transaction has occurred before looking at the language of the statute instead of seeing whether any and which words of the statute can fairly be read as applying to what has taken place. Where every step is artificial as in Ramsay and Burmah I find no difficulty in understanding that the statute cannot be read as covering the so-called loss thereby created. Where, as in Dawson, the transactions are conducted so that the first survives only for a 'scintilla temporis', I find it less easy to understand but do not need to, for I am bound by the decision in Dawson. It may be that Dawson can be further extended but I do not think that this court can extend it to cover these cases. The House of Lords can, of course, do so but, as presently advised, I cannot see how it can be done without overruling, at least to some extent, many of its previous decisions. b

On the detailed analysis of the facts and all other points I agree with and have nothing to add to the judgments of Slade and Mustill LJ, which I have had the opportunity to read in draft. f

I too would dismiss the appeals.

MUSTILL LJ. I also agree that these appeals should be dismissed. A study of the speeches delivered in W T Ramsay Ltd v IRC, Eilbeck (Inspector of Taxes) v Rawling [1981] 1 All ER 865, [1982] AC 300 (Ramsay), IRC v Burmah Oil Co Ltd [1982] STC 30 (Burmah) and Furniss (Inspector of Taxes) v Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530, [1984] AC 474 (Dawson) would appear to warrant the following propositions. g

(1) The fiscal consequences of a transaction or group of transactions are to be determined by applying the words of the taxing statute to the facts of the individual case. If the outcome of the transaction, properly understood, falls within the words of the statute, also properly understood, the appropriate fiscal consequence will follow. Otherwise it will not. h

(2) When considering the application of the statute to the facts of the individual case the court must view both the language of the statute and the components of the transaction in a broad fiscal perspective, and must not confine itself to the narrower focus which would be appropriate if the purpose was to elucidate and enforce the private rights created by the documents in which the transaction is embodied. i

(3) Nevertheless, the determining factor will always be the language of the statute. The subject is not to be taxed on the intentment or the equity of the Act.

(4) Unless the enactment specifically so provides, a transaction which falls properly into one fiscal category is not to be transferred to another simply because the motive or one of the motives for embarking on it is to obtain a fiscal advantage.

a (5) A document is not to be treated as a sham unless it is intended to convey to third parties or the court the appearance of creating between the parties legal rights and obligations different from the actual legal rights and obligations which the parties intend to create.

b (6) If the transaction under scrutiny consists of a single element the court will look behind the language of the relevant document only for the purpose of considering whether or not it is a sham. If it is not, its fiscal consequences will be ascertained solely by reference to its legal effect.

c (7) If, however, it is contended that the relationship between the taxpayer and the other relevant parties is of a composite nature consisting of a number of linked transactions, the inquiry does not end at the point when the fact-finding tribunal has concluded that none of the documents which embody the relevant elements can be discarded as a sham. The court must, it is true, recognise that these documents may have lasting legal consequences in the sense (for example) that they create enforceable contractual rights, or effect a transfer of title, or alter the capital structure of a company. But the process of matching the facts to the words of the statute is not necessarily confined to an examination of these consequences. The fact-finding body must also look to see whether there stands behind the legal relationships a unitary business relationship by reference to which the application of the fiscal statute ought to be determined.

d (8) A business relationship may be regarded as unitary notwithstanding that the performance of all its stages was not assured by contractual obligations already in existence when the first of the steps was put in train.

e (9) If it is found that the individual elements did together create a unitary business relationship, and if it is necessary to decide what account should be taken of this relationship when applying the taxing statute, it is material to consider whether any of the individual elements which are said to make it up was taken with a view to the avoidance of tax, and without any other business purpose.

f (10) The question to be considered when applying the last-stated proposition is whether the step in question had a business purpose. The inquiry is not limited to whether it had any enduring business or legal consequence.

g The problem raised by the present group of appeals is to determine the breadth of the concept which, in the propositions just stated, has for the moment been indicated by the word 'unitary'. (I have made use of this word to avoid begging any of the questions which may be raised by concentrating on a single one of the expressions which are found in the reported cases.) Do the principles of Ramsay and Dawson extend to a case where the multiple transactions take the same general shape as was intended when the first step was embarked on, but where there is an unforeseen interruption in the execution of the series, or where the later stages are carried through in different terms, or with different parties, from what had originally been planned? If the tests for the application of the principle are satisfied, is the outcome in a fiscal sense limited to the disregarding of the steps which have no business purpose, or are there other consequences? What is the status of the steps which are ultimately disregarded, at a time when the plan is in suspense or is being reformulated?

h Understandably, much of the argument before this court concentrated on the expression 'a preordained series of transactions' and 'a single composite transaction', for these and other closely related formulations are stamped with authority by the speeches in the three leading cases. I believe, however, that this direct approach must be adopted with some caution. On one side, there may be an inclination to read the various formulae as if they formed part of the taxing statute itself. Too minute a scrutiny of the bare words may cause their context to be overlooked. Thus, at one stage of the argument, it was proposed that there should be recourse to a dictionary, to ascertain the precise meaning of 'preordained'. This cannot be the right method. On the other hand, if too much regard is paid to the context, the reader may be led to believe that the new principles apply only to situations on a par with those discussed in Ramsay and Dawson. The speeches delivered in Dawson make it plain how misguided this would be. In these circumstances I believe that it is useful to begin by looking at the way in which the law has arrived at its present state, and then going on to consider the practicability of applying one reading rather than another to transactions, different from those under examination in Ramsay and Dawson, which may commonly arise in practice. a

Accordingly, I think it appropriate to begin by identifying the steps by which the doctrine has evolved. In Ramsay itself the chain of relevant dealings began at a time when a transaction had already been concluded in 'the real world' with consequences which were fiscal as well as contractual, namely the taxpayers had made a chargeable gain. Nothing in what followed was designed to modify this transaction in any way. Instead, the intention was to conjure up a new situation in which the taxpayers would, without in reality making a gain or suffering a loss, have attributed to them a loss which could for fiscal purposes be set against the existing chargeable gain. Since the two aspects were entirely separate, it was possible for the House of Lords to concentrate on the later dealings (which alone were carried out with tax avoidance in mind), to view them in the round, and to recognise that, because their elements nullified each other, they were entirely sterile in the result, even if possessing transient legal effects when viewed in isolation. This feature made it possible for the House to disregard the second group of transactions in their entirety, so far as their fiscal consequences were concerned. b

The position in Burmah was in one important respect the same, namely that before the tax avoidance manoeuvres were set in train there had been anterior transactions with real fiscal as well as contractual consequences. In fact, there had been two such transactions. In one the taxpayers had realised gains which were assessable to corporation tax. In the other they had suffered a loss in the shape of a bad debt owed by Holdings, which was not allowable against the liability for corporation tax. The difference between this case and Ramsay was that, whereas in the latter the self-cancelling tax avoidance transactions were entirely distinct from the dealing which had brought about the gain, the scheme in Burmah was intended to convert the fiscal outcome of the second anterior transaction from a bad debt owed by Holdings into an allowable loss on the realisation of the taxpayer's shares in Holdings. Notwithstanding this difference, it was possible to focus on the later group of transactions, and to recognise that, when viewed in the round, they did not lead to any disposal of the real asset (the BP shares) or any real loss in the sense contemplated by the statute. The essence of the decision was that the tax avoidance dealing could be disregarded for fiscal purposes, and it is, in my view, significant that Lord Diplock referred to the intermediate circular book entries as being 'ignored' (see [1982] STC 30 at 33). c

When the House came to consider Dawson it was faced with a very different situation. No longer was there a free-standing anterior transaction which could remain intact once the tax-avoidance dealings had been stripped away. Instead, the integrated plan had a genuine commercial object, namely the disposition of the asset by the taxpayer (A) and its acquisition by a third party buyer (C). The tax avoidance element was introduced, not after the genuine transaction was complete, but by the interpolation into the planned future transaction of a commercially superfluous party, in the shape of Greenjacket Investments Ltd (B). These two elements were knitted together in the scheme, so that the nullification of the artificial tax avoidance aspects, with the consequent exposure of its true fiscal implications, could not be achieved simply by treating the redundant dealings as if they had never occurred; for, if the transfers from A to B, and thence from B to C were ignored, there would be nothing left to bridge the gap between A and C. The process of reasoning in Dawson was therefore different from that of the two earlier cases. Instead of merely subtracting the commercially meaningless steps by ignoring them, the court had to give effect to an additional underlying fiscal reality which was not reflected in the documents actually executed, viz a direct transfer from A to C, for which the consideration was furnished by C to B, at the request of A. Dawson demonstrates that, in what has been called a 'linear' as distinct from a 'circular' transaction, the court must d

a form part of a single transaction; (ii) consider whether any of the steps have no commercial purpose; (iii) discard those that have no such purpose; (iv) identify what Lord Brightman called the end result of the single transaction. Precisely how the end result is to be taxed will then depend on the terms of the taxing statute which it is sought to apply.

It is against this background of a developing doctrine that the tests formulated in b Ramsay and Burmah, and reiterated in Dawson, must properly be understood. In Dawson, as in the other two cases, the documents creating the inserted steps were not a sham. It follows that they did have real legal effects. They created obligations which were enforceable in law; they effected transfers of legal or equitable interests which were valid as against third parties; they brought about real changes in the capital structure of the various companies. Moreover, their nature was such that, at least when considered in c isolation, they were capable of having fiscal consequences of their own. Yet they had to coexist with another underlying transaction which gave rise to different fiscal consequences. This caused no practical problems in Dawson. The scheme went through in a short space of time exactly as planned. A precisely specified outcome had been contemplated at the outset, and precisely this outcome had been achieved by the end. No d lasting rights were created by the intermediate dealings. Moreover, any fiscal consequences which may have theoretically flowed from these dealings were so transient that they could have caused no problems in practice. Their replacement by the fiscal consequences of taxing A as on a direct transfer to C took place so quickly that the problem of the way in which the dispositions from A to B and B to C should be taxed could never directly arise.

The same ready solution is not, however, available when in timing or execution there e is a discontinuity between the stages by which the end result is reached. Here, the earlier steps may possess in the real world fiscal as well as legal consequences of their own, which are not so easily disregarded when the later stages come to be performed. It seems to me that an understanding of the language used in Ramsay, Burmah and Dawson must take account of the apparent tension between the two or more sets of legal and fiscal f consequences, and that the words of the speeches should not be read as extending the principle to situations where these consequences cannot genuinely coexist.

By way of illustration, one may take a hypothetical case much pressed in argument. Imagine that the taxpayer (A) envisages that on some future occasion he may wish to dispose of an asset, or engage in some other commercial transaction, with an independent third party, of whose identity he has at present no idea. He recognises that, if the g transaction ever does take place, there will be a fiscal advantage if it is channelled through an intermediary (B). Against this contingency he decides to carry out the transaction with B straight away, and does so, with consequences which are reflected by entries in registers of title or shares, and by appropriate debits and credits in the accounts of the two companies. Assume also that the dealing with B has a fiscal consequence so far as A h is concerned, whether by way of chargeable gain, or allowable loss, or in some other manner. At this stage, there can be no ground on which the Revenue could abstain from assessing, or the taxpayer from paying, the relevant kind of tax by reference to the transaction as actually carried out. Ex hypothesi the transaction is not a sham. Nor, consistently with the principles set out by Lord Wilberforce, could the argument for the Crown be carried to the length of suggesting that (in the absence of express statutory warrant) the existence of an ulterior motive could be a ground for taking the transaction
j fiscally otherwise than at its face value. Unless it falls into an exempted category, the outcome of the transaction will fall to be brought into account as loss or gain, or in some other way, when A's overall tax position is computed. Indeed, if the interval of time is long enough, his liability may be actually assessed and paid. Let it now be assumed that, after a substantial interval, A decides to implement the original scheme by causing B to carry out with C a transaction of the type which A had contemplated from the outset. In their argument on the present appeal, the Crown asserted that the Ramsay/Dawson principle requires A to be retaxed on the basis of a direct disposition from himself to C. But, if this is so, what is to be the fiscal status of the concluded transaction between A and B, and of the crystallised version of A's overall tax position founded on it? Counsel for the Crown suggested that the fiscal position might be reconstituted by means of an appeal by one party or the other against the original assessment. But an appeal could succeed only if the original tax return by A and the assessment based on it could properly be treated as erroneous, and apt for correction. Yet there seems no sense in which it is possible to say that the return and assessment were wrong when made, and counsel was unable to cite any authority in support of the notion that they could be retrospectively invalidated when the transaction with C went through. As an alternative, counsel suggested that the whole matter could be disentangled by reworking A's accounts for the current and earlier years on the basis that the transaction with B had never taken place, and then by extra-statutory concession giving credit for any tax actually paid in respect of the transaction in earlier years against the assessment which brings into account a notional transfer direct from A to C. With due respect to the resourceful arguments of counsel for the Crown, this expedient seems to me only to paper over the intellectual difficulties which arise from trying to force this situation into the mould of a doctrine conceived by the House of Lords in quite different circumstances. The only link between the two dealings is the common fiscal purpose. It is, however, quite plain from the authorities that this alone is not enough. It must also be possible to treat the dealings as part of a single transaction. In the example stated there are, to my mind, two transactions, not one.

Another example may be given. Imagine that the plan made by A contemplates that the sale by B to C will be made on terms which may be labelled X. After the transaction between A and B has been completed, a difficulty is encountered, as a result of which it is possible to complete the second stage only if its terms are changed to Y. If it is held that, in the real world, there is a triangular transaction between A, C and B, what are its terms? The transfer away from A was never on terms Y; the transfer to C was never on terms X. So also if the example is varied to make the breakdown in the plan relate to the identity of the purchase, rather than the terms on which he buys; the essence of the problem is the same.

I must emphasise that the purpose of these examples, and they are only examples, is not to repeat the argument over double taxation which was disposed of by Lord Brightman in Dawson. The problems arising from the Crown's argument on the present appeals are of a different nature. Still less is there any intention to hint that the clock should be set back to where it was before Ramsay. The principle is firmly established and, if its application within its necessary limits gives rise to problems, these must be solved. It is, however, legitimate to recognise that such limits do exist. The House has entrusted to the courts the task of elaborating this doctrine, which is still in a state of evolution. When considering its thrust and effect, and working out how to apply it in new situations, an examination of the circumstances in which the House has held that it can successfully be applied, and of the practical difficulties of applying it in other circumstances, must surely help to arrive at an understanding of what the speeches were intended to convey.

Approaching the matter in this way, I would conclude that the doctrine cannot have been intended to have the wide compass for which the Crown contends. This is indeed the opinion which I would have formed simply by reading the language used by their Lordships in what would seem to be its natural sense. Given the importance of the issue, it may be permissible to set out at a little length the expressions actually used. Taking the speeches in the order in which they were delivered, we find: 'a nexus or series of transactions'; 'a series or combination of transactions, intended to operate as such'; 'a composite transaction intended to be carried through as a whole'; 'a composite transaction'; 'an indivisible process'; '[a scheme] planned as a single continuous operation'; 'each step . . . so closely associated with other steps with which it formed part of a single

a scheme'; 'a complete prearranged scheme'; 'a complete scheme'; 'inter-connected transactions'; '[a transaction] planned as a single scheme'; 'a series of interdependent transactions'; 'interlocking, interdependent and predetermined transactions'; 'one single composite transaction'. In view of the weight of argument directed to the precise meaning of 'preordained' in the authoritative formulation by Lord Brightman in Dawson [1984] 1 All ER 530 at 543, [1984] AC 474 at 527, it is important to register that his Lordship treats the expression 'a preordained series of transactions' as interchangeable with 'a single composite transaction'.

b It is, of course, essential to avoid the mistake of confusing a description of the case before the court with a definition of the principle to be applied in future cases, but I confess that, quite apart from the practical considerations already mentioned, I can see nothing in any of the speeches to sustain the Crown's proposition that the Ramsay principle extends to all cases where an initial step is taken with an ultimate tax advantage in mind, and there is subsequently, after whatever interval and in whatever precise form, another step of the kind originally envisaged.

c Against this background I turn to the individual appeals. These have already been discussed in detail by Slade LJ, and I may therefore deal with them very shortly. In each case the start and finish must be the words of the statute. I believe that a valuable touchstone was furnished by Lord Diplock and Lord Fraser in Burmah [1982] STC 30 at d 33, 38–39 when they spoke of 'the real' loss and by Lord Scarman when he spoke of the need to determine 'where the profit, gain, or loss is really to be found' (at 39). Of the three appeals, Craven v Stephen White offers the most scope for debate, since at the time when the first stage of the transaction was carried out a sale by Millor to Jones was on the cards, and such a sale did take place, within a relatively short time-span on terms which were, at least as to price, not dissimilar to those originally contemplated. Nevertheless, e I cannot find in the events leading up to the sale any ground for holding that 'the real disposal' by the taxpayers was to Jones rather than Millor. At the time when the shares ceased to be the property of the taxpayers they were destined for Millor and nowhere else; there was then no formulated plan fixing the identity of the ultimate recipient, or the terms on which the shares would be transferred; nor any settled intention on the part f of Oriel or Jones that the latter should participate in a triangular dealing such as was revealed by the House in Dawson. Whatever the precise boundaries of the word 'preordained', it cannot, in my view, be stretched to cover a series of dealings so intermittent in execution and so unformed at the outset. In my judgment, there was not here a single composite transaction or operation, but two distinct transactions, and the fiscal implications of the two stages ought to be ascertained by reference to the legal effect g of the contracts from which they sprang.

I have reached the same conclusion in relation to IRC v Bowater Property Developments Ltd. As subsequent events demonstrated, there was a hope and an expectation, at the time when the land was transferred to the five companies, but there was in no sense a practical certainty, that an onward sale would be made to Milton Pipes on the terms negotiated a few months previously by BUKP. In the event, the sale did ultimately go through, but h on different terms, and after a lapse of 20 months. This discontinuity must, in my view, rule out any treatment of the dealings as an indivisible whole, or the treatment of the sale by BPD to their affiliates as if (in a fiscal sense) it had never happened. So far from being preordained, the transaction might well have never happened at all, or, if it had happened, might have been concluded between different parties, if another buyer had come forward before the change of mind by Milton Pipes.

i For my part, I would regard the Baylis v Gregory cases as the plainest of the three appeals, so far as concerns the issue which is common to all. On 11 March 1974, when the exchange with PG Holdings took place, not only was Hawtin Ltd not visible on the horizon as a potential purchaser, but there was no sale to anyone presently in contemplation. For the reasons already stated, I cannot follow how, on any understanding of what was said in the three leading cases, events which occurred nearly two years later could retrospectively convert the share exchange into one element in a composite transaction of which the timing, terms, parties and even existence were at that stage quite unpredictable. Ramsay and its successors demand that dealings which have none but a fiscal purpose should not be allowed to camouflage an underlying transaction which exists in the real world, but this is no warrant for compressing into a supposed unity two transactions which are in truth distinct. In my judgment, the disposal was to Holdings, and to Holdings alone. It is true, as was emphasised in argument, that this opinion carries with it the consequence that an operation performed for reasons of what has been called 'strategic tax planning', by which the first stage of a linear series of transactions is carried out in isolation in the expectation that it may prove useful in the future, will escape the taxation net if it is followed at some later stage by a dealing of the type envisaged. Certainly the Ramsay principle is open to elaboration: its frontiers are not yet determined. But I would regard the argument advanced by the Revenue as involving not simply an expansion of the principle, but a striking-out into a whole new field of judicial legislation in a manner inconsistent with the constraints announced at the time when the doctrine itself was being propounded.

As to the other two issues arising on the appeal from the decision of Vinelott J, I have nothing to add to what has been said by Slade LJ, with whose conclusions I respectfully agree.

For these reasons, therefore, I also would dismiss all these appeals.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

DILLON, NICHOLLS LJ AND SIR FREDERICK LAWTON

The plaintiff, an experienced farmer, asked the defendants, who were suppliers of agricultural products, to recommend a weedkiller which would be effective at a late stage in the growing season to destroy the wild oats infesting his crop of winter wheat. The defendants recommended a particular herbicide which the plaintiff then purchased from the defendants. The instructions on the cans of herbicide stated, under 'Time of application', that the herbicide should only be applied to winter wheat within specified growth stages of the crop and that if it was applied later the wheat might be damaged. The instructions did not say anything about the effectiveness of the herbicide if it was applied after the specified growth stage but they did state that 'SPRAYING AFTER THESE . . . GROWTH STAGES IS NOT RECOMMENDED'. The plaintiff understood the instructions to mean that the only risk from late application of the herbicide would be possible damage to his wheat crop, a risk which he was prepared to take, and he assumed that late application of the herbicide would still be fully effective to destroy the wild oats. The plaintiff's application of the herbicide, which was made after the specified growth stage, proved to be ineffective to destroy the wild oats. He brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for breach of the term implied by s 14(3)^a of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 that the herbicide would be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was supplied, namely to destroy the wild oats. The judge upheld the plaintiff's claim on the ground that the herbicide was unfit for the purpose for which it was supplied because the instructions were misleading since they could reasonably be understood to mean that late application of the herbicide would still be effective to destroy wild oats. The defendants appealed.

Since the instructions on the cans contained a clear warning that spraying after the specified time was not recommended they put the plaintiff on notice not to use the herbicide after that time and he could not complain that his own misunderstanding of the consequences of ignoring the warning had rendered

The defendants, RHM Agriculture (East) Ltd, appealed from the judgment of Piers Ashworth QC sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court on 6 December 1985 ([1986] 1 All ER 769) whereby he gave judgment for the plaintiff, Peter Roydon Wormell, for the sum of £12,936.91 in his action against the defendants for breach of contract in respect of the sale by the defendants to the plaintiff in March and April 1983 of a quantity of 'Commando' weedkiller, on the ground that the weedkiller was not of merchantable quality or alternatively was not fit for the purpose for which it was supplied. The facts are set out in the judgment of Dillon LJ.

Anthony Hidden QC and Richard Rundell for the plaintiff.

DILLON LJ. This is an appeal by the defendants in the action, RHM Agriculture (East) Ltd, against a judgment in the sum of £12,900-odd awarded to the plaintiff at the trial of the action by Piers Ashworth QC sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court ([1986] 1 All ER 769). The sum awarded represented damages and interest thereon under s 14(3) of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 in respect of a sale by the defendants to the plaintiff of some weedkiller known as Commando.

Section 14(3) provides that where a seller sells goods in the course of a business and the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller (and then there is an alternative which is not relevant) any particular purpose for which the goods are being bought there is an implied condition that goods supplied under the contract are reasonably fit for that purpose, whether or not that is a purpose for which such goods are commonly supplied. It is not in doubt that the plaintiff, as buyer, did rely on the skill or judgment of the defendants as sellers.

The plaintiff put forward an alternative claim under s 14(2) of the 1979 Act, to the effect that the goods supplied were not of merchantable quality, but it was conceded in the court below, as in this court, that if the plaintiff could not succeed under sub-s (3), he could not succeed under sub-s (2), and accordingly we have not heard any argument under sub-s (2).

It is as well to have in mind that the claim to damages is not founded on misrepresentation; nor is it founded on the tort of negligence. It is founded on s 14(3) of the 1979 Act.

The defendants were the suppliers of the goods. They have been backed throughout this litigation by the manufacturers, Shell Chemicals. In fact, nothing in this appeal turns on any distinction between supplier and manufacturer.

The plaintiff is an experienced farmer. He has been farming land at Abberton, east of Colchester in Essex, for some 25 years and more. That is heavy clay land, London clay, a prone to be cold and wet in winter. For that reason he often sowed winter wheat rather than seeking to rely on spring sowing, and in the autumn of 1982, which is the beginning of the time with which we are concerned, he had sowed nearly 600 acres of his land with winter wheat. He was concerned to control the weed known as wild oats, which he had found infested his land, and in the early part of 1983 he was concerned to see what could be done about the wild oats. This would have been in the middle of March, when it was already apparent that there was a cold and wet season, and spring was likely to be late. By b that time he knew that it was too late for him to use certain well-known wild oat weedkillers; accordingly he spoke to a Mr Fuller, who was the manager of the defendants' depot at Whittlesford. Mr Fuller had been known to the plaintiff for some ten years; Mr Fuller also knew the nature of the plaintiff's land, which he had on occasion visited.

c The evidence which the plaintiff gave of his conversation with Mr Fuller, which was by telephone, was to the effect that he asked Mr Fuller what there was on the market which he, the plaintiff, could still use at that relatively late stage for wild oats in that season, and Mr Fuller's reply was, 'There's only one thing left, and that's Commando.' In the upshot the plaintiff bought a consignment of Commando from the defendants; it was delivered on 24 March 1983 and, after a second telephone conversation with Mr Fuller, the plaintiff bought a second, and larger, consignment which was delivered on 15 April.

d Unfortunately the spring of 1983 continued to be cold and wet. The plaintiff sprayed two fields, amounting to about 80 acres, with the Commando on 5 and 11 May. It did not do any good, probably because the land was still too wet and cold. He sprayed the rest of his land with the Commando in fine and warm weather over some four or five days starting on 3 June 1983. Unfortunately, it did virtually no good.

e The plaintiff accordingly puts forward his claim that the goods were not reasonably fit for the purpose of controlling the wild oats on his land, which he had made known to the defendants.

f These are goods which both Mr Fuller and the plaintiff knew would be supplied with detailed instructions, and both of them expected that the plaintiff would read the instructions. Plainly the instructions have to be taken into account in considering whether the goods were fit for the purpose. The plaintiff cannot simply say that the weedkiller was not reasonably fit for its purpose of killing wild oats if it would have been fit for that purpose if used in accordance with the instructions. If the plaintiff says that it did not work, then prima facie at any rate, it is an answer in such a case as this for the defendants to say, 'Oh, but you didn't follow the instructions; if you had, it would have worked.'

g The judge's finding of fact was that there was nothing wrong with this batch of weedkiller, and it would indeed have been fit for its purpose if used in the conditions envisaged by the instructions and at the stage of plant growth specified in the instructions, that is to say with winter wheat at the stage between leaf sheath erection and the fourth node becoming detectable.

h As it happened, the spring of 1983 was so cold and wet that there never was a time that spring when the weather was warm enough, and the land dry enough, for the weedkiller to be used before the crop growth had passed the latter limit. But the weather conditions cannot, by themselves, render the weedkiller not reasonably fit for its purpose. To take an instance put forward by Sir Frederick Lawton in the course of argument, if a customer buys a packet of runner bean seeds knowing that there will be instructions on the packet, and sees that the instructions on the packet say that the seed is to be planted on open ground during the last fortnight in May, the seed is not rendered unfit for its purpose if it turns out that the last fortnight in May is so continuously wet that it is quite impossible to plant bean seeds in the ground.

j Effectively, the plaintiff has not sought just to rely on the weather: he has relied also on a provision in the instructions. The instructions are printed on the canister in which the Commando weedkiller is supplied. The front of the canister sets out the name

'COMMANDO FOR THE CONTROL OF WILD OATS IN WHEAT AND BARLEY', and describes it as a 'weedkiller'; it gives its contents, and says that it is 'FOR USE ONLY AS AN AGRICULTURAL HERBICIDE'. There are instructions on both the sides and on the back of the canister; they go into considerable detail on many points, and I do not need to read anything like all of them. On the right-hand side as you look at the canister, under the name 'COMMANDO' printed on a diagonal, this is said: a

'Do not apply to wheat or barley crops beyond the recommended crop growth stage. Damage may occur to crops sprayed after the recommended growth stage. Damage may result unless all recommendations are followed. Do not spray crops which for any reason whatsoever are under stress . . .'

That is followed by a few more sentences which I need not read.

On the back, in the centre column there is a reference to 'COMPATIBILITY' in relation to the sequential application of Commando and broad-leaved weedkillers. This sets out that there is evidence that applying Commando and some broad-leaved weedkillers without the interval specified in the instructions reduces the activity of Commando against wild oats; it then goes on to say what intervals should be allowed where a broad-leaved weedkiller is being used in the spraying programme. c

In the right-hand column there is a reference to 'Growth regulators for wheat'; it says: d

'It is recommended that growth regulators be tank mixed with COMMANDO but where growth regulators are applied at early crop growth stages the sequential use of COMMANDO may result in some loss of wild oat control.'

In the left-hand column, under the heading 'Rate of application' certain quantities per hectare are given, in a specified water dilution, and it is said that— e

'Vigorous growth and crop competition is essential for optimum control . . . Where there is less vigorous growth or crop competition . . . the rate of application should be increased . . .'

Further down the left-hand column, under the heading 'Time of application', the following is set out: f

'The best control of wild oats will be achieved when both the crop and wild oats are growing strongly under optimum conditions, i.e. a period of fine, warm moist growing weather, not for instance a series of sunny days interspersed with cold/wet or frosty nights resulting in low soil/air temperatures. Do not apply COMMANDO where the crop and wild oats are not growing actively due to adverse conditions as stated above or in situations of mineral deficiency, waterlogging, drought, etc.'

I interpose to say that it was probably because of the unsatisfactory nature of the conditions as there indicated that the May applications were unsuccessful. h

The instructions go on:

'Application timing is dictated by crop growth stages and not by the size of wild oat. Provided crop growth stages allow, COMMANDO will give the best level of wild oat control at the later stages of application consistent with application during the above good growing conditions which are more likely to occur at this time.'

Then, for winter wheat, the instructions are: i

Stop Spraying Before fourth node detectable.'*

a There is then a comment that some wheat varieties may not produce four nodes and that therefore spraying should stop before flag leaf ligule is visible. Then, in capital letters at the foot of the column is stated: 'SPRAYING AFTER THESE LATTER GROWTH STAGES IS NOT RECOMMENDED.'

The judge conveniently set out in his judgment how Commando works, and I gratefully adopt his description. He said ([1986] 1 All ER 769 at 771-772):

b 'When sprayed over the crop, which includes both the wheat and the wild oats, Commando has an effect on the wild oats, stopping the upward growth within 24 hours, but the wheat or barley continues to grow. This additional plant growth is an important part of the control of the wild oats, as the leaves of the crop reduce the amount of light reaching the wild oats, in effect the plant smothers the wild oats. The active ingredient in Commando is converted by the wild oat plant into an active acid which inhibits growth and kills the cells in the growing points of the plant. This conversion from the ester into an active acid is most rapid when there is good, active, upward growth of both wild oat and crop. Under poor growing conditions the production of acid is slower, resulting in only partial destruction of the plant. In wheat and barley the ester is only converted into the active acid at a very slow rate which is easily broken down by the plant, leaving it unaffected. If Commando is applied when there is little further crop growth to be achieved, the crop will not compete with the wild oat, and the herbicide treatment will be substantially less effective.'

In his pleadings the plaintiff contended that he had applied the Commando in strict accordance with the growth stages recommended or prescribed by the instructions and before the fourth node was detectable. But the judge found as a fact (indeed it seems to have been virtually accepted by the end of the trial) that in truth when he carried out his main spraying in the first week of June, the plaintiff's crop had got beyond the crop growth stages referred to in the instructions; it had passed the 'stop spraying' point. The plaintiff says, however, that he deduced from the instructions that even if he sprayed after the instructions said 'stop spraying', the weedkiller would still work. He deduced that he would be running a risk of damaging his crop, but not a risk that the weedkiller would not work. He made these deductions from the passage which I have read from the side of the canister, in particular the two sentences:

'Do not apply to wheat or barley crops beyond the recommended crop growth stage. Damage may occur to crops sprayed after the recommended growth stage.'

g He deduced that the only reason why Commando should not be applied beyond the recommended crop growth stage was that damage might occur to the crops, and he decided that he was prepared to take the risk of damage to his crops because he wanted to destroy the wild oats, and in particular to avoid the possibility that wild oats would seed over his land and infest his crop in the following year.

h The evidence given by the Shell representative, Mr Richardson, explained the statement in the sentences to which I have just referred, namely that damage may occur to crops sprayed after the recommended growth stage; he said:

i 'If one applies Commando when the head is coming up in the crop, in boot, you are liable to shorten that last bit of stalk, which can leave the head partly trapped in the sheath, which then stops it from ripening properly. This varies from variety to variety and growth conditions pertaining at the time. That is why we talk about damage.'

But a little earlier in his evidence Mr Richardson had said this in relation to the warnings on the side of the canister; he was asked: 'What would happen to the crop if you spray late?', and his answer was: 'It varies.' But then he said:

'First of all, I would like to make it clear that we do not recommend not spraying later than the recommended stages for damage alone, by any means. We have plenty of proof to prove that the wild oat control drops off dramatically because competition no longer exists between the two crops.'

The competition no longer exists because the growth of the crop slows down and thus the crop stops offering the competition to the wild oat which the Commando takes advantage of in killing the wild oat. The plaintiff says that although Mr Richardson says that the efficacy of the Commando drops off dramatically, they, neither the defendants nor Shell, ever told him in the instructions that after what were called the recommended stages the Commando would not work.

So be it; the plaintiff did deduce that. So be it also that, as the judge found, it was a reasonable deduction for a man to make, if he was not a scientist and did not know how the chemical worked. But in my judgment it is not what the instructions told him. They say very clearly on the side: 'Do not apply to wheat or barley crops beyond the recommended crop growth stage.' On the back they say:

'Provided crop growth stages allow, COMMANDO will give the best level of wild oat control at the later stages of application consistent with application during the above good growing conditions . . .'

The final stage for spraying is described as 'Stop Spraying', and then it says in capitals: 'SPRAYING AFTER THESE LATTER GROWTH STAGES IS NOT RECOMMENDED.' The evidence is that even if there was late spraying there could be some benefit, in that the lower panicles of the wild oat might be killed and the amount of seed might thus be reduced. But in the plaintiff's case that benefit was minimal.

The judge found the instructions to be misleading (see [1986] 1 All ER 769 at 779). He accordingly held the defendants liable on the footing that they and Shell were under a duty to warn anyone who bought Commando, ie to explain that it would not work after reaching the 'stop spraying' stage, when the fourth node had become detectable. Duty to warn has been mentioned in some of the cases to which we have been referred; they were cases in which the facts were a considerable distance away from the facts of the present case. But I think it important to have in mind that the cause of action relied on is not a cause of action in negligence and is not founded on a duty of care. It is about whether the goods are reasonably fit for a specified purpose. The warning comes in merely in this respect, that, if a clear warning is given, a customer who ignores it has no basis for complaining. But in the present case the instructions set out in clear terms the period within which spraying should take place; nobody would suppose that with a sophisticated weedkiller you could reasonably expect to be able to go on spraying at any season of the year. For my part, I do not see that the manufacturers are required to spell out in greater detail why it is not recommended that spraying should take place after the 'stop spraying' growth stages have been reached, or to explain how the chemical works, or to give any further warning of the reasons why the direction is given not to apply Commando to wheat or barley crops beyond the recommended crop growth stage. The plaintiff chose to take a chance; that is a matter for him. But he cannot say that the weedkiller was not reasonably fit for its purpose, when it would have been had weather conditions allowed it to be used within the limits and in the conditions prescribed by the instructions. For that, had the season not been so adverse (and that was not the defendants' fault), there would have been ample time after the weedkiller had been supplied to the plaintiff by the defendants.

Accordingly, I would allow this appeal and set aside the judgment which was awarded by the judge.

a A separate point was raised on the matter of costs, in that the judge allowed the plaintiff, on the footing of his success, 90% of the costs of the action. The reason why he did not get the whole of his costs was that a good deal of time had been directed to the originally pleaded case, that the plaintiff had carried out his June spraying within the permitted spraying period under the instructions, and on that the plaintiff was wrong. It was argued for the defendants that the reduction in costs, a mere 10%, was so much too little that the exercise of the judge's discretion was flawed. On the basis, however, that b we are setting aside the judgment which was awarded, it is unnecessary to express any further view on this point as to costs.

NICHOLLS LJ. I agree.

c The manufacturers of Commando have printed on the back of the can in which they supply the product what they describe as 'RECOMMENDATIONS FOR USE'. In the first column, under the paragraph bearing the bold heading 'Time of application', these instructions state explicitly the crop growth stages within which alone application of Commando is recommended. Against the reference to 'WINTER WHEAT', in the column headed 'Commence Spraying', appear the words 'At leaf sheath erection', and in the next column, headed 'Stop Spraying', there appear the words 'Before fourth node detectable'. Below the table there

d appear in capital letters the words 'SPRAYING AFTER THESE LATTER GROWTH STAGES IS NOT RECOMMENDED'.

The latter growth stage had not been reached when the second of the two quantities of weedkiller that are in question in the present case was ordered by the plaintiff and supplied to him. Another month, or thereabouts, remained before the 'stop spraying' stage would be reached with the plaintiff's crop of winter wheat. In the event, May 1983

e was wet, and most of the plaintiff's fields could not be worked until about early June. By then the winter wheat had got just beyond the recommended growth stage. The judge found that in the main the weedkiller was applied by the plaintiff when his wheat had probably gone slightly beyond the recommended stage of growth for application, or at the very best the crop was on the borderline.

f In consequence, the application of the weedkiller on the oats did not produce a satisfactory result. The weedkiller had some effect, but only a limited effect. The judge found that the probable reason why the Commando did not work very well on the plaintiff's crops was that it was applied too late.

So what is the basis on which the plaintiff has mounted his claim that Commando was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was supplied? The main thrust of the plaintiff's argument was that the instructions on the can were misleading, because the recommendation regarding the time of application, which appears on the back of the can, is naturally to be read, or could reasonably be read, in conjunction with the warning printed on one side of the can. There, immediately following the warning 'Do not apply to wheat or barley crops beyond the recommended crop growth stage' there appear the sentences: 'Damage may occur to crops sprayed after the recommended growth stage.'

h Damage may result unless all recommendations are followed'.

Therefore, it was submitted, a farmer who reads these instructions as a whole would understand, or might reasonably understand, that the only drawback in applying Commando outside the recommended period would be that this might damage his crops. He would not understand that late application would be unsatisfactory in killing the wild oats. Indeed, this farmer read the instructions in that way; so did his expert, and j so did the judge. The judge concluded that the instructions were positively misleading (see [1986] 1 All ER 769 at 779).

With great respect to the judge, I am unable to accept this. The wording on the can might have been expressed more clearly, but any reasonable farmer reading these instructions would know, as did the plaintiff, that spraying winter wheat after the fourth node was detectable was outside the period recommended by the manufacturers. He would know that if he sprayed at that time he would not be wholly following the manufacturers' instructions. The instructions, or recommendations, put the user on notice not to use the product at that time. a

In my view the defendants, who are supported in this action by the manufacturers, are entitled to treat that as the clear starting point in these instructions. The starting point is that unsatisfactory results following from, and caused by, the use of a product otherwise than in accordance with the manufacturers' recommendations are not, without more, results which should surprise a user, or results of which he can reasonably complain. b

From there one comes to the express warning of the risk of crop damage, which appears on one side of the can in close juxtaposition to the warning not to apply the weedkiller beyond the recommended growth stage. In my view, the existence of the specific warning of possible damage to crops if the weedkiller is applied late does not entitle a user to assume that the weedkiller will still be as effective for its intended purpose, namely to kill the wild oats, if it is applied outside the recommended period, as it would be if applied within the recommended period; or even, if not as effective, that it would at least still be reasonably effective to kill the wild oats. If a farmer proposes to spray outside the recommended times, being prepared to take the risk of damage to his crops, but not being prepared to take the risk of the weedkiller being ineffective, it must be for him to check first with the supplier that the product will still produce a reasonable result if applied late. c

I too would allow this appeal. d

SIR FREDERICK LAWTON. I too would allow the appeal, for the reasons that have been given by Dillon and Nicholls LJ. e

- b* Company – Voluntary winding up – Disclaimer of onerous property – Lease – Vesting order – Lease of business premises to company for term of 25 years – Surety agreeing to take lease of premises if lease disclaimed by company – Company underleasing premises at same rent and subject to same covenants – Underlessee depositing security for performance of covenant – Company going into liquidation and liquidator disclaiming lease – Lessor calling on surety to take lease of property – Surety applying for vesting order of lease and underlease together with benefit of agreement between company and underlessee – Whether court should make vesting order – Companies Act 1985, ss 618, 619, Sch 20.

d In 1982 the landlord's predecessor in title granted a lease of the ground and first floor of an office block to the tenant. The lease was for 25 years and payment of the rent was guaranteed by a company (the surety) which also executed the lease and covenanted that if the lease was disclaimed by the tenant it would be required by the landlord to take a lease of the premises for the unexpired term of the lease. In 1984 the tenant leased the premises to an underlessee for ten years, the underlease containing the same covenants as in the lease. As part of the underleasing arrangement, the underlessee deposited with the tenant's solicitors the sum of £25,000 as security for the performance by the underlessee of the covenants in the underlease. The freehold of the property was subsequently transferred to the landlord. In June 1985 the tenant went into liquidation and the liquidator obtained leave under s 618^a of the Companies Act 1985 to disclaim the lease originally entered into with the landlord's predecessor in title. The landlord thereupon called on the surety to take a new lease of the property under its covenant to do so. The surety applied under s 619^b of and para 4^c of Sch 20 to the 1985 Act for an order that the existing lease along with the underlease between the tenant and the underlessee be vested in it, together with the benefit of the agreement whereby the underlessee had deposited £25,000 as security for performance of the covenants. The underlessee did not wish to take a vesting order and was anxious to vacate the premises.

- g* a Section 618(1) provides: 'Where any part of the property of a company which is being wound up consists of land (of any tenure) burdened with onerous covenants, of shares or stock in companies, of unprofitable contracts, or of any other property that is unsaleable, or not readily saleable, by reason of its binding its possessor to the performance of any onerous act or to the payment of any sum of money, the liquidator may, with the leave of the court and subject to the provisions of this section and the next, disclaim the property.'

- h* b Section 619, so far as material, provides:
'... (5) The court may, on an application by a person who either claims an interest in disclaimed property or is under a liability not discharged by this Act in respect of disclaimed property, and on hearing any such persons as it thinks fit, make an order for the vesting of the property in or its delivery to any persons entitled to it, or to whom it may seem just that the property should be delivered by way of compensation for such liability, or a trustee for him, and on such terms as the court thinks just.'

- j* (6) On such a vesting order being made, the property comprised in it vests accordingly in the person named in that behalf in the order, without conveyance or assignment for that purpose...

- c* Paragraph 4 provides: 'If there is no person claiming under the company who is willing to accept an order [under s 619]... the court has power to vest the company's estate and interest in the property in any person liable (either personally or in a representative character, and either alone or jointly with the company) to perform the lessee's covenants in the lease, freed and discharged from all estates, incumbrances and interests created therein by the company.'

Held – If an underlessee did not apply under s 619 of the 1985 Act for a vesting order with respect to property which a company in liquidation had been allowed to disclaim under s 618 but an application for a vesting order was made by other parties entitled to do so under that section, the underlessee, if he was before the court, would be put to his election either to apply for a vesting order himself or to accept exclusion from all interest in the property. If following an election by him to be excluded from all interest in the property a vesting order was made in favour of someone other than the underlessee, the order destroyed the underlessee's interest in the property so that he no longer had any right of occupation and was not obliged to pay the rent or perform any of the covenants. It followed therefore that, since the underlessee had indicated that he did not wish to have the lease vested in him, the only effect of an order vesting the property in the surety would be to destroy the interest of the underlessee, ie his right to remain in occupation. A vesting order would therefore achieve nothing that would not be achieved by the grant of a new lease to the surety and if a vesting order were made the surety would not take subject to the benefit of the underlease. The surety's application for a vesting order would therefore be dismissed (see p 92 c to f and p 94 a, post).

c VINELOTT J. This application gives rise to a short but important question concerning the effect of the disclaimer of a lease on an underlease granted by the lessee.

The facts can be shortly stated. On 24 February 1982 Bell International Ltd (which I will call 'Bell') granted a lease of the ground and first floor of a new office building in Haywards Heath to a company then called Air Exchange (UK) Ltd. That company is now called AE Realisations (1985) Ltd (I will refer to it as 'Realisations'). It went into a members' voluntary winding up in June 1985. The members' voluntary winding up was d later superseded by a creditors' voluntary winding up.

The lease was for a term of 25 years from 25 December 1981 at a rent, subject to upwards only review, of £13,000. Another company, then called Ellerman Travel and Leisure Ltd, which has since changed its name to Gold Case Travel Ltd (and which I will call 'Gold Case'), joined in the lease as surety. It covenanted that Realisations would pay the rent reserved by the lease and perform and observe its covenants under the lease and e that, in the event of default by Realisations, it would pay and make good on demand all loss and damage thereby arising. It also agreed that in the event of the lease being disclaimed by Realisations, under any statutory or other power, it would take from the landlord (if so required by the landlord by written notice to the surety within three months after such disclaimer) a grant of another lease of the demised premises for the residue of the term unexpired at the date of such disclaimer, at the same rent as was f payable thereunder at the date of such disclaimer, and subject to the like covenants and provisos as were therein contained, and, at the expense of the surety, on the execution of such further lease to execute and to deliver to the landlord a counterpart thereof.

The reason for requiring Gold Case to enter into an obligation to take a direct lease in substitution for the lease granted to Realisations in the event of the disclaimer of that g lease in the winding up of Realisations is to be found in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Stacey v Hill [1901] 1 KB 660, where it was held that the disclaimer of a lease by the trustee of a bankrupt lessee under s 55 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 brought to an end the obligations of a surety for the payment of rent and the performance of the other covenants entered into by the lessee.

By an underlease dated 24 February 1984 Realisations demised the same premises to h one Roy Thomas Ward for a term of ten years from 27 January 1984 at the same rent, subject to upward review on the same dates as in the lease (so far as falling within the term granted by the underlease). The covenants on the part of the underlessee were the same as those entered into by Realisations in the lease. Both the lease and the underlease contained the usual covenant for quiet enjoyment. The underlease also contained a covenant by Realisations to enforce certain covenants on the part of Bell to insure and j repair the premises and a covenant that Realisations would itself observe and perform the covenants in the lease to pay the rent thereby reserved and perform all other covenants and conditions on its part contained in the lease. That is all I need to say about the lease and the underlease.

Shortly before the underlease was executed, an agreement under hand, dated 28 January 1984, was entered into between Realisations and Mr Ward. It recited that the underlease was about to be entered into. It was agreed that a sum of £25,000, paid by Mr Ward to Realisations (the receipt of which Realisations acknowledged), would be held by Realisations' solicitors as security for the due performance by Mr Ward of the covenants in the underlease, and that, if anything should become due from Mr Ward to Realisations by way of rent or in respect of any breach of covenant, Realisations might pay the sums due out of the £25,000 (which I will call 'the deposit'). The deposit was to be repaid at the expiry of the fifth year of the term, save for a sum equal to six months' rent. The deposit was to be kept in a deposit account and the interest paid annually to Mr Ward. He agreed to pay any further sums necessary to maintain the deposit at £25,000. It was to be repaid to Mr Ward if he should assign the benefit of the underlease. The agreement was expressed to be made between 'the lessor' and 'the lessee', which expressions were defined as in the lease and the underlease to include the successors in title of the companies or persons so described.

Finally, Bell transferred its freehold title to the office block to the present lessor, English National Investment Co plc (which I will call 'English National'). It seems that at some stage the deposit was repaid to Mr Ward. However, in October 1985 that sum was repaid to the solicitors acting for the liquidator of Realisations. They undertook not to pay it to the liquidator, except with the consent of Mr Ward or unless the security should become due under the agreement.

On 7 March 1986 the liquidator applied for leave to disclaim the lease. In his affidavit in support he said the lease was not a profitable one. On 21 May 1986 the registrar made an order giving the liquidator leave to disclaim. Notice of disclaimer was given on 21 August 1986.

On 3 September 1986 English National's solicitors gave Gold Case notice calling on it to take a lease of the demised premises. Following that notice, on 30 September 1986 Gold Case issued the application for a vesting order which is now before me.

Evidence has been filed on behalf of Gold Case to the effect that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to relet the demised premises at the same rent as that reserved by the lease. That is not accepted by Mr Ward, but I do not think that anything turns on the point. It was accepted by the registrar that the lease was onerous property when he gave the liquidator leave to disclaim and that order is not challenged.

The question raised by Gold Case's application is, on the face of it, whether the court can, and if it can whether it should, make an order vesting firstly the lease and secondly the benefit of the agreement in Gold Case. However, the underlying question is whether, if an order is made vesting the lease in Gold Case, Gold Case will be placed in the same position as Realisations was before the disclaimer, that is that Gold Case will take subject to and with the benefit of the underlease in just the same way as if the lease had been assigned to it immediately before the disclaimer. If a vesting order would not have that effect, that is if the effect of the disclaimer was to destroy the underlease, the vesting order would achieve nothing that would not be achieved by the grant of a new lease. On the other hand, it is not in dispute that, if a vesting order would operate as, in effect, a statutory assignment of the lease, the court would have power, on making the vesting order, to make an ancillary order vesting the benefit of the agreement in Gold Case.

At the time when this application was made, the disclaimer of onerous property by the liquidator of a company and the power of the court to make a vesting order were governed by ss 618 and 619 of and Sch 20 to the Companies Act 1985. They are now, or will shortly be, governed by ss 178 to 182 of the Insolvency Act 1986. The 1985 Act was a consolidating Act. Sections 618 and 619 and Sch 20 re-enacted s 323 of the Companies Act 1948; s 618 re-enacted sub-ss (1) and (2) of s 323 and s 619 re-enacted sub-ss (3) to (7) of s 323 except the proviso to sub-s (6), which was set out separately in Sch 20. Section 323 in turn re-enacted s 267 of the Companies Act 1929. The 1929 Act introduced provisions for the disclaimer of onerous property into the winding up of a company for the first time. It was modelled on and reproduced with immaterial modifications the provisions in s 54 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 which in turn re-enacted s 55 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883. Decisions on the 1883 Act and on the 1914 Acts are therefore of direct authority on the construction of s 267 of the 1929 Act and its successors. However, in order to understand the machinery introduced by s 55, it is necessary to go back one further stage to the Bankruptcy Act 1869 (see s 23).

Vaughan Williams LJ explained the change introduced in 1869 in Re Carter and Ellis, ex p Savill Bros [1905] 1 KB 735 at 743 in this way:

'Now at common law, if there were a lease and a sub-lease, and for any reason whatever the lease became extinguished, the sub-lease also disappeared: the branch fell with the tree. But the Legislature stepped in to some extent I think, although I am not quite sure about it, in the reign of George IV.; but, at all events, by s. 9 of the [Real Property Act 1845], provision was made for preserving the rights of the sub-lessee in cases in which a voluntary surrender of the lease had been accepted by the lessor. By the Bankruptcy Acts prior to 1869 no particular provision was made for disclaimer. The assignee in bankruptcy was not bound to accept a damnosa hereditas, and leases were left outside the property which passed to the representative of the creditors. This led to a great deal of complication and difficulty and litigation, and by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, further provision was made for the disclaimer of leases by the trustee in a bankruptcy. To put it shortly, the disclaimer was by s. 23 of that Act expressly made to operate as if there had been a voluntary surrender of the lease on the date of the order of adjudication.'

The opening words of s 55 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 were similar to the opening words of s 23. However, s 23, unlike s 55 (1), provided that, in the event of disclaimer, a lease should 'be deemed to have been surrendered on' the date of the disclaimer. Section 9 of the Real Property Act 1845 (which is reproduced in s 139 (1) of the Law of Property Act 1925), provided that on the surrender of a lease the next estate conferring a vested right to the land should be deemed the reversion of the lease for the purpose of preserving the incidents and obligations affecting the reversion that had been surrendered. It soon became apparent that, on a literal construction, s 23 in conjunction with s 9 would work grave injustice.

In Smalley v Harding (1881) 7 QBD 524, [1881-5] All ER Rep 734 a lessee who had granted a sublease became bankrupt and his trustee disclaimed the lease. The lessor sought to recover possession. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the disclaimer operated in the same way as a voluntary surrender and that accordingly the reversion expectant on the lease 'became the reversion expectant upon the under-lease for the purpose of preserving the incidents and obligations annexed to it' (see 7 QBD 524 at 528 per Baggallay LJ). That case was decided on 31 March 1881.

Some three months later, on 12 May 1881, Ex p Walton, re Levy 17 Ch D 746, [1881-5] All ER Rep 548 came before the Court of Appeal. The facts were as follows. Lessors demised property to two lessees for ten years from 25 December 1878 at a rent of £70. On 29 August 1879 the lessees granted a sublease for 9½ years less seven days, from 24 June 1879 at a premium of £100 and at a rent of £55. The lessees became bankrupt and the master gave leave to disclaim. The lessors appealed from that decision. The ground of the appeal was that on a literal construction of s 23 the effect of a disclaimer and a consequent deemed surrender would be to impose on the landlord a lease, the underlease, at a rent of £55 in place of a lease at a rent of £70. That this result would be, in the words of James LJ, 'the most grievous injustice, and the most revolting absurdity' (see 17 Ch D 746 at 757, [1881-5] All ER Rep 548 at 553) is readily apparent if, in place of the underlease of £55, is put the common mortgage by sub-demise at a peppercorn rent, the sub-demise containing no covenant to repair. The Court of Appeal, while upholding the decision of the master, avoided this injustice by construing s 23 as meaning no more than—

'that the property is to be disclaimed inter se, so as not to interfere with the rights of third parties, and only for the benefit of the bankrupt and his estate; so far, that is, as respects any rights and liabilities in relation to it as between the trustee and the person who is entitled to the benefit of those obligations which attach to the property; so far only as is necessary in order to relieve the bankrupt and his estate and the trustee from liability.' a

(See 17 Ch D 746 at 754; cf [1881-5] All ER Rep 548 at 551-552 per Jessel MR.) James LJ stated the effect of s 23 in a passage which has often been cited and which I should, I think, read in full (17 Ch D 746 at 756-757, [1881-5] All ER Rep 548 at 553):

'When a statute enacts that something shall be deemed to have been done, which in fact and truth was not done, the Court is entitled and bound to ascertain for what purposes and between what persons the statutory fiction is to be resorted to. Now, the bankruptcy law is a special law, having for its object the distribution of an insolvent's assets equitably amongst his creditors and persons to whom he is under liability, and, upon this cessio bonorum, to release him under certain conditions from future liability in respect of his debts and obligations. That being the sole object of the statute, it appears to me to be legitimate to say, that, when the statute says that a lease, which was never surrendered in fact (a true surrender requiring the consent of both parties, the one giving up and the other taking), is to be deemed to have been surrendered, it must be understood as saying so with the following qualification, which is absolutely necessary to prevent the most grievous injustice, and the most revolting absurdity, "shall, as between the lessor on the one hand, and the bankrupt, his trustee and estate, on the other hand, be deemed to have been surrendered."' b

Lush LJ, who was one of the Lords Justices who had heard the appeal in Smalley v Hardinge, alone referred to that decision and he said (17 Ch D 746 at 758; cf [1881-5] All ER Rep 548 at 553-554):

'The point was whether the disclaimer of the trustee had the effect of destroying the property of the underlessee, and no doubt some expressions may be found in our judgments treating the disclaimer as having the same effect as an actual surrender of the lease. But the point which has now arisen was not then present to our minds at all. Now, however, that it has arisen, we should still decide Smalley v Hardinge in the same way as we did then.' e

The two decisions are clearly not in conflict although, as Lush LJ recognised, the ground of the decision in Smalley v Hardinge is too widely expressed.

The position under the 1869 Act as interpreted in Ex p Walton, re Levy was simply this. As between the lessor and the bankrupt lessee, the disclaimer operated as a surrender. As between the lessor and the underlessee, the lease was to be treated as still in existence. As the lease was to be treated as still in existence, the underlessee was entitled to remain in possession during the term of the underlease. However, the lessee retained his rights in rem, that is his rights to distrain for rent due under the lease and to forfeit for non-payment of rent or for breach of covenant. If the right to forfeit for non-payment of rent became exercisable, then (subject to the statutory power for the court to relieve against forfeiture) the underlease and the underlessee's right to continue in possession fell with it. g

Counsel for Gold Case submitted that the proposition that, under s 23 of the 1869 Act, a disclaimer was to be treated as a surrender only so far as necessary to relieve the bankrupt and his estate from liability and did not affect the rights or liabilities of third parties had the consequence that the rights and liabilities of the underlessee were to be treated as unaffected and that the lessor was therefore to be treated as bound by and entitled to the benefit of the underlease. j

That result, in my judgment, is clearly inconsistent with the reasoning of the Court of Appeal. The relief of the bankrupt and his estate from liability clearly required the destruction of the underlease as between the bankrupt and the underlessee. There is no privity of estate or of contract between a lessor and an underlessee and the notional a existence of the lease as between lessor and underlessee prevented s 9 from having any operation. Thus, the effect of the deemed surrender of the lease was that the underlease no longer bound the lessee and did not become binding on the lessor; it remained in existence only so far as necessary to support the underlessee's right to remain in possession during the term granted by the underlease and so long as the lease did not become liable to forfeiture.

b In Hill v East and West India Dock Co (1884) 9 App Cas 448 the assignee of a lease became bankrupt and the trustee disclaimed the lease. The question was whether the lessee remained liable under his covenant to pay rent which accrued after the disclaimer. The case thus raised in substance the same question as arose in Ex p Walton, re Levy whether the deemed surrender under s 23 was to be treated as having the same consequences as regards third party (underlessee or surety) as an actual surrender would have had. The House of Lords approved and followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ex p Walton, re Levy. Earl Cairns cited and approved the passage in the speech of James LJ which I have cited. Hill v East and West India Dock was decided after the Bankruptcy Act 1883 had become law. Earl Cairns referred to that Act as substituting an 'enactment of a very different and much more explicit kind upon this part of the bankruptcy law' (see 9 App Cas 448 at 453).

c To that Act I now turn. Section 55(2) provided:

d 'The disclaimer shall operate to determine, as from the date of disclaimer, the rights, interests, and liabilities of the bankrupt and his property in or in respect of the property disclaimed, and shall also discharge the trustee from all personal liability in respect of the property disclaimed as from the date when the property vested in him, but shall not, except so far as is necessary for the purpose of releasing the bankrupt and his property and the trustee from liability, affect the rights or liabilities of any other person.'

e Section 618(4) of the Companies Act 1985 is in substantially the same terms. Subsection (6) of s 55 of the 1883 Act was in the following terms:

f 'The Court may, on application by any person either claiming any interest in any disclaimed property, or under any liability not discharged by this Act in respect of any disclaimed property, and on hearing such persons as it thinks fit, make an order for the vesting of the property in or delivery thereof to any person entitled thereto, or to whom it may seem just that the same should be delivered by way of compensation for such liability as aforesaid, or a trustee for him, and on such terms as the Court thinks just; and on any such vesting order being made, the property g comprised therein shall vest accordingly in the person therein named in that behalf without any conveyance or assignment for the purpose. Provided always, that where the property disclaimed is of a leasehold nature, the court shall not make a vesting order in favour of any person claiming under the bankrupt, whether as under-lessee or as mortgagee by demise except upon the terms of making such person subject to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the lease in h respect of the property at the date when the bankruptcy petition was filed, and any mortgagee or under-lessee declining to accept a vesting order upon such terms shall be excluded from all interest in and security upon the property, and if there shall be no person claiming under the bankrupt who is willing to accept an order upon such terms, the court shall have power to vest the bankrupt's estate and interest in the property in any person liable either personally or in a representative character, and i either alone or jointly with the bankrupt to perform the lessee's covenants in such lease, freed and discharged from all estates, incumbrances, and interests created therein by the bankrupt.'

The proviso was later amended by s 13 of the Bankruptcy Act 1890 to enable the court to vest the leasehold property in an applicant, subject only to the same liabilities and obligations as if the lease had been assigned to him at the date of the petition. Subsections (5) and (6) of s 619 of the Companies Act 1985 reproduce the body of sub-s (6) of s 55 and Sch 20 of the 1985 Act reproduces the proviso (as amended in 1890). a

In Re Cock, ex Shilson (1887) 20 QBD 343, a decision of the Divisional Court in bankruptcy, a lessee mortgaged property by a sub-demise and his trustee disclaimed the lease. The question was whether the lessor was a 'person . . . claiming [an] interest in [the] disclaimed property' within sub-s (6) and, if he was, whether he was entitled to apply, under the proviso to sub-s (6), for an order that the mortgagee be put to his election either to accept an order vesting the lease in him or to be excluded from all interest in or security on the property. In holding that he was entitled to an order in these terms, Cave J explained the operation of the proviso to sub-s (6) in the following terms (at 348-349): b

'Let us see how the case will work out in practice. A. grants a lease for ninety-nine years at 100l. a year to B., who assigns to C., who in consideration of an advance of 2000l. demises to D. for the residue of the term, except three days, at a peppercorn. C. becomes bankrupt, and his trustee wishing to disclaim brings A., B., and D. before the Court. A. cannot apply for a vesting order because he is not entitled to the property, nor can B. so long as D. is willing to take a vesting order. B. therefore applies that D. may be put to his election, and if he declines to take a vesting order that he may be excluded, and a vesting order made in favour of him, B. The same thing occurs where C. is the lessee and B. is only a surety for him. Where there is no person liable, either jointly with the bankrupt or alone, to perform the lessee's covenants we are of opinion that, notwithstanding the doubt expressed in Re Parker and Parker, ex parte Turquand ((1884) 14 QBD 405), the landlord may apply that the sub-lessee may be put to his election. If he elects to take a vesting order he gets one. If he declines the landlord may ask for an order excluding the sub-lessee from all interest in and security upon the property, and vesting the property in him, the landlord, discharged from the sub-lease, because, by virtue of the disclaimer and of the exclusion of the sub-lessee he has become the party entitled. This course appears to us to be warranted by the language of the Act, and to carry out its provisions. Until the sub-lessee has declined to take a vesting order the Court has no power to make a vesting order either in favour of the original lessee or of the surety for the bankrupt, if there is one, and consequently, if the power could only be exercised upon an application by a sub-lessee it would remain a dead letter, for the sub-lessee never would have any interest in making such an application, and the person liable jointly with the bankrupt, or alone, could not get a vesting order until the sub-lessee had declined. Where all the parties are before the Court upon an application for leave to disclaim, the vesting order may at once be offered to the sub-lessee, and on his refusal may be granted to the surety or original lessee, or if there is no person liable alone or jointly with the bankrupt, an order for a vesting order and for delivery of possession, or for a vesting order only, as the circumstances may require, may be made in favour of the lessor. Where no leave to disclaim is required, and consequently the parties interested in the property disclaimed or liable to perform the covenants of the lease are not brought before the Court by the trustee, we are of opinion that the person liable to perform the covenants, or, in the absence of such person, the lessor, may bring the sub-lessee before the Court, and ask for an order for his exclusion and for a vesting order, or for delivery of the property, if the sub-lessee refuses himself to take a vesting order.' c

That decision was approved and followed by the Court of Appeal in Re Finley, ex p Clothworkers' Co (1888) 21 QBD 475. That was an appeal against a decision of a registrar who had made an order that the mortgagee by sub-demise be excluded from all interest in a lease which had been disclaimed by the trustee in bankruptcy of the lessee unless he j a should within 14 days apply for and take a vesting order. Lindley LJ, having pointed out that property in s 55 was sometimes used to denote the bankrupt's interest in the thing and sometimes to denote the thing itself, went on to explain the effect of sub-ss (2) and (6) where a lessee who had created a sub-lease became bankrupt in a passage which I think I should cite in full. He said (at 485–487):

b 'Next we must consider the more complicated case of the original lessee becoming bankrupt, and we must consider it, first, as between him and his lessor. As between them the consequences will be the same if there were no sub-lease. As between the lessee and the sub-lessee the consequences will apparently be these. The lessee's rights and interests and liabilities are determined under sub-s. 2, and the extinction of his rights involves the extinction of the liability of the sub-lessee under his covenants. We must next consider the case as between the original lessor and the sub-lessee. Now their rights and liabilities are preserved by sub-s. 2, and, subject to the effect of a vesting order, whatever that may be, the case will stand in this way—
c the sub-lessee, although freed from his covenants to his own immediate lessor, must perform the covenants of the original lease or he will be liable to be distrained upon and to be ejected by the original lessor. That is obviously his position, and that was the position in which a lessee found himself, on the disclaimer of the lease by the trustee in the bankruptcy of his assignee, in Hill v. East and West India Dock Co. ((1884) 9 App Cas 448), under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. That is by no means an enviable position, and it is a strange position in which to leave him. But the present Bankruptcy Act goes further. It does not stop with sub-s. 2, but sub-s. 6 has also to be considered. The sub-lessee can evidently apply under sub-s. 6 for an order vesting the lease in him; there is no controversy about that. But the question is, whether the lessor can apply for an order vesting the lease in the sub-lessee? It appears to us, for the reasons which I have already stated, having regard, that is, to the meaning of the word "property" and of the words "person claiming any interest in the disclaimed property," that the lessor can apply for such an order. But, whether the application is made by the sub-lessee or by the original lessor, in either case the vesting order can only be made in favour of the sub-lessee, subject to the covenants and conditions of the original lease, and, if the sub-lessee will not take the property on those terms, which, of course, he need not do, then these consequences appear to follow: First, the sub-lessee will be excluded from all interest in the disclaimed property. Whether the latter part of the proviso in clause 6 will apply will depend upon whether there is any such person as is there referred to. There may or may not be. If no vesting order is made, the lease will be determined under sub-s. 2, the sub-lease will be determined under sub-s. 6, and the lessor will take the property freed from both lease and sub-lease. This appears to us to be the logical consequence of the Act, and it is impossible not to see that it is a very startling result. It will very seriously affect the old practice of taking securities on leasehold property by way of sub-demise, the whole object of which was to prevent the mortgagee from becoming liable to the rent and to the covenants and obligations of the original lease. If the decision of the Divisional Court in Re Cock, ex parte Shilson ((1887) 20 QBD 343) is right, as we think it is, this anomaly will be introduced into the practice of conveyancing in the event of the bankruptcy of a mortgagee of leasehold property by sub-demise.'

j That analysis of sub-ss (2) and (6) is, in my judgment, conclusive against the contentions advanced on behalf of Gold Case in the instant case. Subsection (2) of s 55 of the 1883 Act avoided the use of the word 'surrendered', which had given rise to difficulty under the 1869 Act, and made it clear that the determination of the interest of the bankrupt was not to affect the rights of third parties. However, pending an application for a vesting order, the position of an underlessee was the same as under the 1869 Act. The determination of the bankrupt's rights, interests and liabilities necessarily involved the extinction of his liability under the underlease (in the instant case the covenants given on the part of the underlessee included a covenant to pay the rent reserved by and to perform and observe the covenants on the part of the lessee contained in the lease) and the extinction of those liabilities necessarily involved the extinction of the liabilities of the underlessee. The underlessee did not become bound by any privity of contract or of estate to the lessor but was entitled to remain in possession of the property during the term of the underlease and so long as the lease would, apart from the forfeiture, have remained in existence. That position Lindley LJ thought to be unenviable and unsatisfactory, no doubt because neither the lessor nor the underlessee could enforce directly the covenants of the lease. The purpose of sub-s (6) was to remedy this state of affairs by enabling the underlessee to apply for a vesting order and the lessor to compel the underlessee to take a vesting order or be excluded from all interest in the property. Looked at in that context it is, I think, clear that what is contemplated by sub-s (6) is that an application for a vesting order may be made, firstly, by a person claiming under the bankrupt as underlessee or mortgagee (and, if more than one, in the order of priority of their respective interests inter se), secondly, if none is willing to take a vesting order by any person 'liable either personally or in a representative character, and either alone or jointly with the bankrupt to perform the lessee's covenants' and, thirdly, by 'any person claiming [an] interest in [the lease] or under any liability not discharged by' it. If an underlessee or mortgagee is before the court and an application for a vesting order is made by a person in the second or third categories, the underlessee or mortgagee is put to his election, either himself to apply for a vesting order or to be excluded from all interest in the property. No order formally putting him to his election is needed where, as in the instant case, the underlessee has made it plain that he does not want to take a vesting order and is anxious to vacate the property.

In my judgment, therefore, the disclaimer destroyed the underlease and the only effect of a vesting order, if made, would be to destroy the interest of the underlessee, that is his right to remain in occupation, paying the rent reserved by and performing the covenants contained in the lease during the term created by the underlease. A vesting order would therefore achieve nothing that would not be achieved by the grant of a new lease by the present lessor to Gold Case.

Counsel for Gold Case submitted that this analysis is inconsistent with the decision of Uthwatt J in Re Thompson and Cottrell's Contract [1943] Ch 97 and reported more fully in [1943] 1 All ER 169. That case did not arise in the course of bankruptcy proceedings. It arose in the following circumstances. By a contract dated 15 October 1941 a purchaser agreed to buy an underlease of a house, held for a term of 99 years from 29 September 1928 less the last three days at a rent of £5. Under the contract the purchaser was not entitled to make any requisitions as to the title of the reversion. An assignment was duly prepared and executed in escrow and the purchaser was allowed to take possession. The vendor's solicitors then sent to the purchaser's solicitors a completion statement. With the completion statement was included a notice of disclaimer dated 5 June 1937 by the intermediate lessor. He had become bankrupt a year before. The report in the All England Law Reports states that the headlease comprised some 14 properties and reserved the rent of £70 pa; and in respect of it subleases had been granted off, each at a rent of £5 pa (see [1943] 1 All ER 169 at 170-171). The date of the lease is not given but it is, I think, a reasonable inference that the term granted by the lease was 99 years from 29 September 1928. In Warnford Investments Ltd v Duckworth [1978] 2 All ER 517 at 523, [1979] Ch 127 at 135 Megarry V-C referred to the underlease as 'vested in an assignee'. As Keane J pointed out in a recent case in the High Court of Ireland, Maurice Tempamy v Royal Liver Trustees Ltd [1984] BCLC 568 at 581, there is nothing in Re Thompson and Cottrell's Contract to indicate that the vendor was not the original lessee. However, nothing turns on this point. The plaintiff's solicitors initially contended that the vendor had not shown a good title and should perfect her title by applying for a vesting order.

a The vendor took out a vendor and purchaser's summons for a declaration that she had sufficiently answered the purchaser's requisitions and had shown a good title. The argument advanced on behalf of the purchaser was that—

b 'The vendor is trying to force the purchaser to accept something which she cannot be forced to accept. She is entitled to a property in which she can live without danger of eviction and which she can sell with a good title. Therefore, the vendor ought to put the matter right by applying for an order vesting the head lease in herself.'

Uthwatt J observed ([1943] Ch 97 at 99; cf [1943] 1 All ER 169 at 171):

c 'It is quite clear that a disclaimer does not determine the lease and all interests carved out of it by way of sub-lease or otherwise and that it is limited to determining the rights, interests and liabilities of the bankrupt in respect of the property. The rights of third parties remain on foot, except so far as it is necessary to release the bankrupt and his estate.'

e 'For my part, all I wish to emphasize is that it certainly is not the case that a lease disappears for ever simply because it has been disclaimed. Apart from any vesting order, a disclaimed lease is operative in the sense that failure to pay the rent reserved by it will justify distress, failure to perform the covenants contained in it will justify re-entry, and, as the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, itself recognizes, it can be vested in some person by an order under that Act. In my judgment, where there is an interest in land in circumstances in which these qualities subsist, the case cannot be treated as if the lease did not exist. The lease is there, to a certain extent, as something like a dormant volcano. It may break out into active operation at any time. In those circumstances, is it accurate to describe as an underlease the interest which has been carved out of the head lease while it was active although no vesting order has been made in respect of the head lease? For myself, I do not see what other name could be given to it. To call it a lease would clearly be to misdescribe it, and, in my judgment, if an underlease be an interest in land taking effect out of a validly created leasehold interest, the interest agreed to be sold, and described, in the present case, as an underlease, was in fact an underlease.'

g I do not think that there is anything in that judgment which lends any support to the view that the underlease remained in existence (as Megarry V-C expressed it in Warnford Investments Ltd v Duckworth [1978] 2 All ER 517 at 523, [1979] Ch 127 at 135 in relation to a disclaimed lease) in a cataleptic state capable of being brought to life if a vesting order was made. It was the lease and not the underlease which Uthwatt J described as a dormant volcano. The question was whether the bundle of rights which the vendor had (the right to remain in possession of the house during the term created by the underlease, so long as the lease did not become liable to forfeiture and subject to the lessor's right of distraint and to apply to have the lease so far as it effected the house comprised in the underlease vested in her at an apportioned rent) was properly described as an underlease. It would have been inaccurate to describe this bundle of rights as a lease unless and until a vesting order was made since there was no privity of contract or of estate between the headlessor and the vendor; and, given that the rent under the underlease was one-fourteenth of the rent payable under the lease (for the 14 properties comprised in it), that the lease and the underlease were for terms of 99 years and 99 years less three days respectively, and that it was unlikely that the lease would have contained any onerous covenants not repeated in the underlease, the position of the vendor was not materially different than it would have been if the lease had not been forfeited. a

In my judgment, therefore, if a vesting order were made, Gold Case would not take subject to the benefit of the underlease.

Application for vesting order dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR, LLOYD AND BALCOMBE LJJ

2, 3 JUNE 1987 d

Costs – Order for costs – Jurisdiction – Order for costs to follow the event – Follow the event – Jurisdiction to make order as to costs before end of trial – Large number of plaintiffs bringing actions for personal injuries against defendants – Judge giving interlocutory directions for trial of certain preliminary issues in selected lead actions – Judge ordering that costs of lead actions to be borne rateably by all plaintiffs on per capita basis – Whether jurisdiction to make order before end of trial of actions – Whether ‘costs to follow the event’ referring to manner in which or time when court’s discretion to be exercised – Supreme Court Act 1981, s 51(1) – RSC Ord 62, r 3(3). e

Practice – Related claims – Procedure – Related claims made by many plaintiffs against same defendants – Court procedures to be applied and adapted flexibly so as to reach quick and economical decisions. f

The plaintiffs, of whom there were some 1,500, began actions against the defendants claiming damages for personal injuries arising out of their use of a drug manufactured by the defendants. It was arranged between the parties that certain actions should be selected as ‘lead actions’ for the purpose of deciding certain preliminary issues, and the question arose as to how the costs of such actions should be borne. The judge, in giving directions, ordered that as from a specified date all the plaintiffs should contribute rateably on a per capita basis to pay the costs incurred by those plaintiffs, either personally or through the legal aid fund, who were selected to pursue the lead actions and to meet any liability to pay the defendants’ costs. He further gave all parties liberty to apply to vary the order to take account of changed circumstances. Under s 51(1)^a of the Supreme Court Act 1981 the costs of and incidental to all proceedings in the High Court were in the discretion of the court, which had full power to determine by whom and to what extent the costs were to be paid, but RSC Ord 62, r 3(3)^b provided that where the court in the exercise of its discretion saw fit to make a costs order it should order ‘the costs to follow the event’ except when it appeared to the court that in the particular circumstances some other order should be made. One of the plaintiffs appealed against the judge’s order, contending, inter alia, that there was no jurisdiction to make the order as to costs since the words ‘to follow the event’ meant that no order as to costs could be made before the end of the trial. g

- Held – Section 51(1) of the 1981 Act gave the court a wide discretion as to costs which was unrestricted except and in so far as rules of court had that effect, and accordingly the court could make an order as to costs against persons even if they were not themselves parties to the proceedings. Moreover, on its true construction RSC Ord 62, r 3(3) dealt with the manner in which the court's discretion was to be exercised and not with the time when an order could be made. The words 'costs to follow the event' did not have temporal significance but were directed to the result of the trial. Accordingly, although costs would normally be awarded at the end of a trial, r 3(3) did not prohibit an order being made earlier, if the interests of justice so demanded. In any event (per Balcombe LJ), in the circumstances the judge's direction was not an order of the sort contemplated by r 3(3) since it was an order for the apportionment, not the payment, of such costs as might be ordered against, or might fall to be borne by, any plaintiff. It followed that the judge had had jurisdiction to make the order. The appeal would accordingly be dismissed (see p 99 d e g to j, p 100 d, p 101 b c and p 102 e to h, post).

Aiden Shipping Co Ltd v Interbulk Ltd, The Vimeira [1986] 2 All ER 409 considered.

- Per Sir John Donaldson MR. In cases where large numbers of plaintiffs are making related claims against the same defendants the courts should apply and adapt existing procedures as flexibly as possible so as to reach decisions quickly and economically. The appropriate authorities should consider whether the concept of the 'class action' has anything to offer and, if it does, to introduce the necessary procedural rules (see p 96 h, post).

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR. The Opren cases need no introduction, but some features need to be emphasised since it is said, probably rightly, that taken together they give this dispute a character which is unique in English legal history.

(1) The number of plaintiffs. There are already some 1,500 plaintiffs, although due to the time limits governing claims this number is unlikely to rise appreciably.

(2) The average age of the plaintiffs. Opren was prescribed in cases of arthritis, which is more usually encountered in the elderly rather than the young, and accordingly the average age of the plaintiffs is higher than would otherwise be the case. By contrast, as we were told, the main Thalidomide claimants were all children. This has the three following consequences.

(a) The need for speed. If elderly plaintiffs are to be compensated by an award of damages, they need to receive that money at a time when they can still make use of it.

(b) The size of individual claims. The same continuing disability suffered by two people, one older and one younger, will necessarily cause a greater loss, and give rise to a larger award of damages, in the case of the younger claimant, who will have to endure it for longer. Other things being equal, the Opren claimants cannot expect to receive awards which are very large as compared with awards in other cases primarily involving children.

(c) The availability of legal aid. Older claimants are more likely to have disposal capital or income which will take them outside the scope of the legal aid scheme or, if this does not happen, will lead to their having to make a significant contribution to their own costs and, if they fail, to those incurred by the defendants. By contrast we are told that in the Thalidomide cases every major claimant, being a child, was legally aided, mostly with a nil contribution.

(3) The cost of the litigation. This will be extremely high both for the plaintiffs and for the defendants. No individual plaintiff going it alone, even if successful, could expect to derive any benefit because the irrecoverable costs would exceed the amount of the damages which he would be awarded. There is of course another side to this coin in that the defendants, even if successful, could never expect even to begin to recover the costs which they had incurred in defending an isolated claim.

(4) The diversity of the side effects. Although the plaintiffs do not allege 1,500 different side effects, there is a considerable diversity in the complaints and each will require some degree of separate investigation. Furthermore, even where two or more plaintiffs allege the same symptoms, each might, and being elderly probably will, have had significantly different medical histories. Accordingly, in theory at least, despite similar symptoms one might and one might not have a valid claim.

(5) The concept of the 'class action' is as yet unknown to the English courts. In some jurisdictions, notably in the United States, where large numbers of plaintiffs are making related claims against the same defendants, there are special procedures laid down enabling all the claims to be disposed of in a single action. Clearly this is something which should be looked at by the appropriate authorities with a view to seeing whether it has anything to offer and, if so, introducing the necessary procedural rules. Meanwhile, the courts must be as flexible and adaptable as possible in the application of existing procedures with a view to reaching decisions quickly and economically.

At an early stage it was realised that one essential requirement for achieving this result was that a nominated judge should take charge of all the interlocutory applications which are necessary before the actions can be tried, and Hirst J was nominated for this purpose. With his assistance and under his guidance considerable progress has been made. Thus, for example, a system of 'master pleadings' has been evolved, as a result of which individual plaintiffs do not have to incur the expense of pleading those aspects of their

a claim which are common to others. Again arrangements have been made for 'lead actions' to be selected which raise common issues and for these actions to be heard first, thus settling those issues for the benefit of all.

b It was in the course of dealing with such matters that the problem arose with which this appeal is concerned. Very naturally no individual plaintiff wanted to undertake the burden, including the costs, of a lead action. So unfair would this burden be that consideration was given to how, within the powers and procedures of the court, the costs of the lead actions could be taken off the shoulders of the plaintiffs in whose names they were being brought.

c One thought, which seems to have occurred to many people, including commentators who are not directly involved, was that the lead action should be chosen with an eye to the plaintiffs concerned being those who not only had the advantage of legal aid, but whose means were such that they had not been required to make any contribution. In this way it was thought that the whole cost of the lead actions, which might well be a very significant part of the cost of the whole proceedings, could be transferred to the broad shoulders of the state in the form of the legal aid fund. Such an approach has very considerable merit, at least from the point of view of the plaintiffs, and I do not criticise those who have espoused it. Unfortunately it betrays a woeful misunderstanding of how the legal aid scheme works. This is a point of general importance and the basis of the scheme deserves to be better known.

d Put simply, but for present purposes wholly accurately, legal aid helps those who lose cases, not those who win them. Legal aid makes 'out and out' grants to those who lose cases. It only makes loans to those who win them. This is the way it works. Mr X has a claim which, looked at from his point of view, looks reasonable. He applies for legal aid. His means are assessed, and if they are sufficiently small he will be given legal aid. e According to how small his means are, he may have to make some contribution to the legal aid fund, although there are many whose contributions are assessed as nil. Subject to his paying those contributions, which are never very large, the legal aid fund pays the whole of his costs of the litigation.

f If at the end of the case he loses, he may be ordered to pay a small sum to the successful defendant, but, unless there has been a dramatic change in his circumstances (he has had a major win on the pools or something of that sort), this is the extent of his liability. His own costs of fighting the action will be borne by the legal aid fund and the defendant will be left to pay all the costs incurred by him in successfully defending the claim. In other words, the unsuccessful plaintiff has received an out and out grant from the state.

g But suppose the plaintiff wins, as the legal aid fund claims that he does more often than not. Then a very different picture emerges. As the successful party, he does not have to pay the defendant's costs and usually the defendant will be ordered to pay his. Let him not celebrate too soon. He may find that the defendant has no money or the legal aid fund may have to incur further expense in making the defendant pay. Furthermore, and this is very important, the defendant will, at best, only be ordered to pay the plaintiff's 'taxed costs', and this is almost always less than the costs which have been incurred by the h plaintiff in prosecuting his case to a successful conclusion. So there will always be a shortfall, which may be very large if the defendant cannot meet the order for costs or if the plaintiff failed on some subsidiary issue and has been ordered to pay the defendant's costs in fighting that issue.

j 'Why worry?' says the successful plaintiff to himself. 'I have my damages, I have paid my contribution to the legal aid fund and that fund has met all the costs which I have incurred.' Unfortunately for the temporarily happy plaintiff, Parliament has required the defendant to pay the damages not to him but to the legal aid fund. That fund is required to use his damages to pay itself back every penny of the costs which it has incurred in assisting him to fight his case. It is only if after this has been done that anything which is left will be paid to him. It may be that nothing will be left or it may only be relatively small change.

In other words, for the successful plaintiff the legal aid fund provides a loan, not a grant, at least to the extent that his damages are sufficient to repay the loan. Put slightly differently, every legally-aided plaintiff should realise that if he succeeds in recovering more by way of damages, costs and interest than it has cost to recover them, if the money actually paid by the defendant in respect of damages, costs and interest exceeds his own costs, which after all is what he expected, he will be in no better position than an unassisted litigant. a

So let us look again at the scheme whereby the plaintiffs involved in the lead actions should be chosen from those who are legally assisted with nil contributions. None of them would ever get a penny piece by way of compensation. Anything which the defendants were ordered to pay in respect of damages, costs and interest would be totally absorbed in paying their own costs. This would be a grossly unfair situation and the judge rightly refused to agree to it. b

There was in fact a further technical obstacle. Section 7(6) of the Legal Aid Act 1974 provides that the fact that a person is receiving legal aid 'shall not affect . . . the principles on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally exercised'. No doubt the intention was that legally-assisted parties should not be treated as second-class citizens, but the subsection also prevents them from being treated differently from other citizens in any respect not expressly authorised by the 1974 Act. Using them to fight lead cases just because they were legally assisted would breach this statutory rule. All this is now common ground and not the subject of an appeal. c

In these circumstances the judge decided to make a wholly novel order. In its detail it is of some complexity, but for present purposes it is only necessary to summarise its general effect. This was that, as from 8 June 1987, where particular plaintiffs incurred costs either personally or through the legal aid fund in pursuing lead actions, or thereby became liable to pay costs to the defendants, every other plaintiff should contribute rateably on a per capita basis. Those who have practised in the Commercial Court, of which Hirst J is one of the judges, will recognise the age old respectability of such an order, based as it clearly is on the Rhodian Law, the Rolls of Oleron and the maritime law of general average. But antiquity, respectability and indeed fundamental fairness is one thing: the power to make such an order is quite another. And here we come to the nub of this appeal. d

Before coming to that issue I should add that the judge recognised that in the months that lie ahead before a settlement or a final hearing circumstances might change. Thus some of the plaintiffs might decide to abandon their claims, so that instead of each plaintiff having to contribute 66p for every £1,000 of the costs of the lead plaintiffs (on the basis of 1,500 plaintiffs), the contribution might rise significantly. And other unforeseeable eventualities might arise making this order unfair or unduly burdensome. He therefore gave all the parties liberty to apply to vary the order if circumstances changed. Finally he rightly stressed that his order in no way fettered the discretion of the trial judge to make special orders as to costs between the plaintiffs or individual plaintiffs and the defendants or individual defendants. In essence what he was doing was providing for contribution as between plaintiffs in respect of costs incurred by them or liability for costs imposed on them, subject always to retaining a right to vary that order if justice so required. He also recognised that some plaintiffs might not wish to accept even this very small percentage of what in total could be a very considerable liability and he therefore ordered that any plaintiff who wished to abandon his action could do so, each party bearing its own costs of that discontinuance if he did so before 8 June 1987. e

Such an order would have been impossible before 1986, when the law was changed by a decision of the House of Lords in Aiden Shipping Co Ltd v Interbulk Ltd, The Vimeira [1986] 2 All ER 409, [1986] AC 965 to the effect that s 51 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 gave the court the widest possible discretion to order anyone to pay costs incurred in proceedings, even if they were not themselves parties to those proceedings. f

This was subject to two provisos. The first proviso was that the order was fair and g

a The second was that there was nothing in the Rules of the Supreme Court which prevented such an order being made. It is on this second proviso that counsel for the plaintiff relies. It is no obstacle in his way, since the House of Lords was not concerned with the precise point on which he relies, that Lord Goff, giving the leading opinion, said ([1986] 2 All ER 409 at 416, [1986] AC 965 at 980):

b 'If two separate sets of proceedings are heard together, because they have common features, it may be a matter of pure chance whether the expense of presenting an argument or evidence relevant to the common feature falls within one or other of the two sets of proceedings. Sometimes, indeed, it may be very difficult to attribute costs to one set of proceedings rather than the other. It is surely consistent with the interests of justice that, in such a case, the court's jurisdiction to make a global order c for costs relating to both sets of proceedings should not be fettered by the imposition of an implied limitation on that jurisdiction.'

Substituting 1,500 sets of proceedings for two sets, that is virtually this case, and it was no doubt for that reason that before Hirst J the judge's jurisdiction to make the order was not challenged.

d In this court counsel for the plaintiff, who did not of course appear before Hirst J, directs our attention to RSC Ord 62, r 3(3), which, in his submission, prohibits a court from making an order in relation to costs not yet incurred. A judge has, he says, a complete discretion once the costs have been incurred and at a much earlier stage he may give audible warning of approach; he may then say what, subject to further argument, e he would be minded to do if and when the costs have been incurred. But he must never make an actual order, even if he reserves the right to vary it in the light of a change of circumstances and further argument. To reach a provisional decision now and affirm it later is all right. To reach a firm decision now, whilst saying that you reserve the right to alter it later, will not do. If this is right, the law is indeed an ass.

In fact, in my judgment it is not right. RSC Ord 62, r 3(3) provides:

f 'If the Court in the exercise of its discretion sees fit to make any order as to the costs of any proceedings, the Court shall order the costs to follow the event, except when it appears to the Court that in the circumstances of the case some other order should be made as to the whole or any part of the costs.'

Counsel for the plaintiff almost accepts that the rule viewed in isolation means no more than that the normal order for costs is that he who wins has his costs paid by the other side. This is what 'follow the event' means. But he says that if you trace the origin
g of the rule back over a century you find that in 1875 (the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, Sch 1, Ord LV) it read:

h '... where any action or issue is tried by a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless upon application made at the trial for good cause shown the Judge before whom such action or issue is tried or the Court shall otherwise order.'

Under that rule clearly an application for an order for costs, and thus the order itself, could not be made before the beginning of the trial, and counsel for the plaintiff says that this reveals the true meaning of 'costs shall follow the event'. This argument is, if I may say so, as ingenious as it is wholly unsound. In both rules the words 'follow the event' have the same meaning, namely 'according to who wins'. The difference between the j wording and the effect of the two rules lies in the fact that the 1875 rule, unlike the current rule, which came into force in 1986, refers to an application made at the trial, although not, incidentally, 'at the conclusion of the trial'.

In my judgment not only can the order of the judge not be faulted, but he is to be congratulated on producing a very fair and workable order in a novel and highly complex situation. If he had given no indication of his thinking on costs and had refused to make any order at this stage, no plaintiff could have made any assessment of his potential liability in respect of costs. If he had merely given an indication of his thinking, the plaintiffs would have been in much the same position as they are under the order, save that they would have had no order which they could appeal. As it is, they have been able to appeal his order and know where they stand. Furthermore, if circumstances change, they can go back to the judge.

The real problem here is that in relation to any claim it can happen that it will cost too much to enforce it: the costs will be out of proportion to any benefit which is likely to be obtained. Maybe the perfect legal system would get over this problem, but our system has not yet done so. Trying 1,500 cases together is much cheaper than trying 1,500 cases separately, so the plaintiffs as a group can spend more before they reach the economic limit. But however you arrange things and whether there are 1,500 plaintiffs or only one, there is always some economic limit. That is the long and the short of the problem. Whether the limit will be reached in the present cases is not for me to say, but I see no grounds for thinking that these cases are an exception to the general rule that settling genuine disputes by agreement between the parties is almost always in the interests of all parties.

LLOYD LJ. I agree. It is common ground between all the parties in this litigation that certain actions should be selected as the lead actions. The judge, who has overall control of all the actions, has already given certain directions as to the selection of the lead actions in his master directions given on 11 July 1986 as amended on 14 January 1987. In his order under appeal, dated 8 May 1987, he directed that the issues raised in the lead actions, when selected, should be decided as preliminary issues in all the actions. That suggestion, which was originally put forward by counsel appearing as amicus curiae, found favour with the judge. It seems to me, if I may say so, eminently sensible for all sorts of reasons, which I need not mention, since there is no appeal from that part of the judge's order.

Nor is there any criticism of the exercise of the judge's discretion in this case. Although it was put forward as one of the grounds of appeal that the judge's discretion was wrongly exercised for the four reasons set out in the notice of appeal, that ground of appeal was not developed by counsel for the plaintiff. So with regard to the exercise of the judge's discretion it is sufficient to say that the solution which the judge proposed for the unique problems presented by the present case, namely that, subject to any further order of the court, the costs which may be ordered to be paid or to be borne by the plaintiffs in the lead actions should be borne by all the plaintiffs equally, is the fairest that could be devised: fair not only to the defendants, who support the order, but fair also to the plaintiffs, both assisted and unassisted. Indeed, it seems to me that some such order was inevitable, granted the need for a method of selection which does not infringe the provisions of s 7(6)(b) of the Legal Aid Act 1974.

But counsel for the plaintiff submits that the judge had no jurisdiction to make the order. Support for that submission is, he says, to be found in the language of RSC Ord 62, r 3(3). He accepts that s 51(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 confers a wide discretion on the court in the matter of costs. The decision of the House of Lords in Aiden Shipping Co Ltd v Interbulk Ltd, The Vimeira ([1986] 2 All ER 409, [1986] AC 965 shows that costs may be ordered to be paid by a person who is not party to the proceedings. Counsel for the plaintiff therefore concedes that if, at the end of the trial, the court were to order that any costs payable by the plaintiffs in the lead actions should be shared equally between all the plaintiffs the court would have jurisdiction to make that order.

But he says that s 51 must be read along with Ord 62, to which it is expressly made subject. Although there would be jurisdiction to make the order I have mentioned at the end of the trial, he submits that there is no jurisdiction to make that order in advance. He relies on the words of Ord 62, r 3(3) that 'the Court shall order the costs to follow the event'. Any order for costs before the event is, he says, premature, and one which the court has no power to make. There can be no such thing as a valid anticipatory order for costs.

I cannot accept the submission of counsel for the plaintiff. When one reads Ord 62, r 3(3) as a whole, it is clear to my mind that it is dealing with the manner in which the discretion to order costs is to be exercised, if the court sees fit to make any order at all, not the time at which that discretion is to be exercised. In the normal way, of course, the discretion is exercised at the conclusion of the proceedings, whether final or interlocutory. But there is nothing in the language of Ord 62, r 3(3) to prohibit the exercise of the discretion at an earlier stage where the interests of justice so require. The reference to 'costs following the event' means no more, as Sir John Donaldson MR has said, than 'according to who wins'. They have no temporal significance. I would therefore reject the main argument of counsel for the plaintiff that the judge had no jurisdiction to make the order.

Counsel for the plaintiff also relied on Re Barnato (decd), Joel v Sanges [1949] 1 All ER 515, [1949] Ch 258 in support of the proposition that the court never decides hypothetical or academic questions. No doubt that is true. But there is nothing hypothetical or academic about the question in the present case. It is essential, as the judge well said, to resolve the problem of costs now, subject to any further order the court may make, in order that the parties and the court can sensibly embark on the selection of lead cases as anticipated in July.

I too would dismiss the appeal.

BALCOMBE LJ. About 1,500 persons claim to have suffered damage through taking the drug Opren and have started actions claiming damages for personal injuries against the same defendants. Of these 1,500 plaintiffs some 1,000 are legally aided. Very sensibly the parties have sought to save expense by canalising the actions into a number of 'lead' actions. From time to time applications for directions have come before Hirst J, and on one such application he made an order for directions on 8 May 1987, with a view to the selection of the lead actions. Among the directions he then gave was the following:

'With effect from 8th June 1987 the following provision as to costs shall apply:— Unless otherwise ordered, in the case of any costs incurred and/or Summons brought in and/or any hearing in respect of any action within the co-ordinated arrangements, and at the final trial or other disposal of actions selected under the co-ordinated arrangements, any costs which are ordered to be paid by, or which fall to be borne by, any Plaintiff shall be paid or borne proportionately by each of the Plaintiffs whose action is either a "Schedule Action" or "Group B Action" (including those Plaintiffs who are legally-aided) so that each such Plaintiff shall bear an equal part thereof.'

It is against this direction that the plaintiff now appeals, and the sole ground of his appeal as argued before us is that the judge had no jurisdiction to deal in advance with the apportionment of costs, a point which was not taken below.

The court's jurisdiction to deal with costs in civil proceedings is conferred by s 51(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, which is in the following terms:

'Subject to the provisions of this or any other Act and to rules of court, the costs of and incidental to all proceedings in the civil division of the Court of Appeal and in the High Court, including the administration of estates and trusts, shall be in the discretion of the court, and the court shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent the costs are to be paid.'

The wide discretion conferred by this section is not to be restricted except and in so far as rules of court have that effect (see the decision of the House of Lords in Aiden Shipping Co Ltd v Interbulk Ltd, The Vimeira [1986] 2 All ER 409, [1986] AC 965).

The rule on which the plaintiff relies in support of his submission is RSC Ord 62, r 3(3) which in its present form came into force on 28 April 1986. That paragraph provides: a

‘If the Court in the exercise of its discretion sees fit to make any order as to the costs of any proceedings, the Court shall order the costs to follow the event, except when it appears to the Court that in the circumstances of the case some other order should be made as to the whole or any part of the costs.’

Counsel for the plaintiff submits that the words ‘to follow the event’ mean that no order as to costs can be made until after the event has taken place. In support of that submission he prays in aid the historical derivation of the rule, which can be traced back to Ord LV of the rules set out in Sch 1 to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875. That rule is in the following terms: b

‘Subject to the provisions of the Act, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the High Court shall be in the discretion of the Court; but nothing herein contained shall deprive a trustee, mortgagee, or other person of any right to costs out of a particular estate or fund to which he would be entitled according to the rules hitherto acted upon in Courts of Equity: Provided, that where any action or issue is tried by a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless upon application made at the trial for good cause shown the Judge before whom such action or issue is tried or the Court shall otherwise order.’ c

In that rule the reference to costs following the event is contained in a proviso, and relates to an action or issue tried by a jury. So, submits counsel for the plaintiffs, in such a case the power to order costs could only arise after the verdict of the jury, and since 1934, when trial by judge alone was substituted for trial by jury in most civil actions, after judgment. d

I cannot accept this submission. In my judgment there is substance in the contention of counsel appearing as amicus curiae that the direction given by Hirst J is not such an order as is contemplated by Ord 62, r 3(3), being an order, not for the payment of costs, but for the apportionment of such costs as may be ordered to be paid by, or which fall to be borne by, any plaintiff. But in any event the ‘event’ to which Ord 62, r 3(3) is directed is the result of the proceedings, and does not limit the operation of the rule to any particular point of time. Whatever may have been the position under the 1875 Act, I am satisfied that the modern Ord 62, r 3(3) is not concerned with the time when an order as to costs may be made, but only with the way in which the discretion should be exercised, and that meaning is supported by the provisions of Ord 62, r 6, dealing with those cases where costs do not follow the event. e

Since this alleged lack of jurisdiction was the only basis on which the appeal was argued, and since I am satisfied that the judge had jurisdiction to make the order which he did, that is sufficient to dispose of this appeal. No attack was made on the manner in which the judge exercised his discretion and I need say no more than to agree with Sir John Donaldson MR that his order cannot be faulted. f

I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. g

Appeal dismissed. Plaintiff to pay costs of all defendants; order for costs not to be enforced without further order of Hirst J or the judge having conduct of the proceedings. h

- c The appellant was a member of a gang who, to his knowledge, used loaded firearms to carry out robberies on sub-post offices. During one such robbery in which the appellant took part, the leader of the gang shot and killed the sub-postmaster. The appellant was charged with murder. At his trial he put forward the defence of duress, claiming that although he did not wish to take part in the robbery when he realised that loaded firearms were going to be used the leader of the gang had pointed a gun at him and threatened to blow his head off if he did not participate. The trial judge held that the defence of duress
- d was not open to him because he had voluntarily joined the gang knowing they used firearms. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter. He appealed, contending that the judge's ruling was wrong.

- Held – Where a person had voluntarily, and with knowledge of its nature, joined a criminal organisation or gang which he knew might bring pressure on him to commit an offence and was an active member when he was put under such pressure, he was not entitled to rely on duress as a defence to an offence committed as a member of the gang. The trial judge had therefore been right to rule that the defence of duress was not open to the appellant and the appeal would accordingly be dismissed (see p 108 c d and p 109 d, post).

Appeal against conviction

David Bruce Sharp appealed against his conviction on 21 May 1985 in the Crown Court at Reading before Kenneth Jones J and a jury of manslaughter (count 4). He pleaded guilty to attempted robbery (count 2) and robbery (count 3). He was sentenced to concurrent terms of 15 years' imprisonment on count 2 and to 16 years' imprisonment on counts 3 and 4. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. a Nigel Mylne QC and Stephen Smyth (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant.

Daniel Hollis QC and Anthony Longden for the Crown.

LORD LANE CJ delivered the following judgment of the court. On 21 May 1985 in the Crown Court at Reading before Kenneth Jones J and a jury the appellant was charged with murder. He was eventually convicted of manslaughter. Then he pleaded guilty to the remaining counts in the indictment against him. He was sentenced as follows. In respect of count 2, which was an attempted robbery at Hounslow, he was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment. On count 3, robbery, to which he pleaded guilty (that was a robbery at Wraysbury) he was sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment. On the manslaughter to which I have referred, which arose from the same incident at Wraysbury, he was sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment, all those sentences to run concurrently. He was jointly charged with two other men: Alderson and Hussey. Hussey was convicted of murder in respect of the Wraysbury offence. b

The appellant now appeals against conviction by leave of the single judge.

The circumstances which gave rise to the charge of murder were the culmination of what was in effect a series of armed robberies committed on sub-post offices. They culminated in the Wraysbury offence which resulted in the death of the sub-postmaster at that place. c

Count 2, the Hounslow robbery, to which this appellant pleaded guilty, concerned the following facts, and they are of relevance to the main issue. At about midday on 23 August 1984 Alderson and Hussey, both of whom were armed with sawn-off shotguns, in the company of the appellant, held up a sub-post office in Hounslow. They wore wigs. Hussey threatened the wife of the postmaster, whereupon the postmaster pressed the alarm. All three then ran off to the getaway car empty-handed, because they had not had time, after the sounding of the alarm, to take any of the money which they had covered. Hussey tried to fire his gun in the air in order to discourage anyone who was minded to pursue them. His first attempt to fire the gun failed, but his second attempt succeeded, and a pellet from that gun in fact hit Alderson, one of the other miscreants, in the ear. d

The importance of that incident is this, that both Alderson and the appellant as a result of that knew the sort of man with whom they were associating in the commission of these offences and the predeliction which Hussey had for loaded weapons. They must have known also that any attempt in the future by an unlucky postmaster to press the alarm button would be viewed by Hussey with disfavour to say the least. e

On 14 September 1984 the sub-post office at Wraysbury, near Staines, was the subject of a reconnaissance by the appellant and the two other men. Then they determined to attack the office. Alderson and Hussey once again carried loaded sawn-off shotguns. A further weapon (a pump-action shotgun) was left in the getaway car. Hussey's gun was loaded with a particular venomous sort of shot, namely buckshot. The appellant was responsible for locking the post office door after the three of them had entered. f

Alderson moved towards the wife of the sub-postmaster and Hussey went to the post office area of this little shop. Hussey then shot the sub-postmaster in the head at close range: the ballistic expert thought about two or three feet. The unfortunate postmaster died instantly. As he fell, so money was scattered. Alderson took the opportunity to hit the sub-postmaster's wife on the head with his gun three times. That was in order to try to stop her screaming, which, not surprisingly, she had started to do. Once outside, Alderson shot at the tyre of a parked vehicle which belonged to the sub-postmaster in order plainly to impede anyone who might be minded to pursue them. g

Hussey, as already stated, was convicted of murder. The jury, not unnaturally, rejected his contention that the gun may have been discharged by accident. Alderson at first h denied that he had taken part in the matter at all, but eventually went on to admit his part in the affair and he was in due course convicted of manslaughter.

The appellant put forward the contention that he had been invited indeed to take part in these robberies and had willingly acceded to the invitation. He was the 'bagman', as he put it, the man carrying the bag in which the loot, if any, would be contained. He regarded Hussey, in the vernacular, as a 'nutcase'. The appellant did not wish any weapons to be used, so he said. He said that he panicked when he saw the guns being loaded into the car. He thought they were blanks, so he said. He wanted to pull out, but he lost his nerve and he carried on despite his wish to withdraw from the conspiracy, because Hussey pointed a gun at him and threatened to blow his head off if he did not carry on with the plan to rob the post office. The appellant did not carry a gun. He said he had thought of sabotaging either the gun or the ammunition by using some salt, but he did not get the opportunity.

So stood the case. Counsel for the appellant, who appeared for him in the court below as he appears for him today, submitted to the judge that his client was entitled to rely on duress as a defence to the charges of murder and manslaughter. There then took place a series of submissions by counsel to the judge and a ruling by the judge.

There was plainly a misunderstanding between the judge and counsel for the appellant as to what it was that the judge had in fact ruled. As some of the grounds of appeal are based on that misconception, it is necessary perhaps very briefly to refer to them, although as matters have turned out today they are not vital to the determination of this appeal.

Counsel thought that the judge was ruling that the defence of duress was not open to the appellant on three grounds: (a) such a defence is only available where the defendant discharges the evidential burden of proof sufficient to show that there is something fit for the jury to consider in the way of duress; (b) the defence of duress is not available to a man who has voluntarily joined an organisation or a gang which he knows might compel him to commit serious crimes similar to those with which he is charged; and (c) the evidence was such that the jury could come to no conclusion other than that the defendant had voluntarily joined such a gang. That was plainly counsel's understanding of the matter, which was based on a passage in the judge's ruling which initially gave that impression. In fact the judge, as is clear if one reads the passage as a whole, was taking the view that all he had ruled on was point (b), namely that duress is not available to a man who, to put it briefly, has the necessary knowledge, and with the necessary knowledge joins the gang of miscreants.

There is no need to go further into that misconception, because counsel now agrees that everything in this appeal depends on whether the judge was correct or not in ruling that a defendant who has voluntarily joined a gang such as this cannot subsequently rely on the defence of duress.

So we turn to examine the situation which lies behind counsel for the appellant's submission to the judge, and again the submission to this court, namely that the common law knows no such exception to the defence of duress. Counsel realistically is the first to concede that pragmatically, to use his own word, and realistically the judge's interpretation of the law was desirable, if not essential, if justice is to be done in circumstances such as existed in the present case. But he submits that it is not for this court, or indeed any other court, to usurp the function of Parliament and to introduce into the common law a rule which, in his submission, has never previously been held to form part of it.

No one could question that if a person can avoid the effects of duress by escaping from the threats, without damage to himself, he must do so. In other words if there is a moment at which he is able to escape, so to speak, from the gun being held at his head by Hussey, or the equivalent of Hussey, he must do so.

It seems to us to be part of the same argument, or at least to be so close to the same argument as to be practically indistinguishable from it, to say that a man must not voluntarily put himself in a position where he is likely to be subjected to such compulsion.

Counsel for the appellant, I hope, will forgive us if we do not refer to all the citations which he made of authority. He read to us lengthy extracts from the decision in R v Tyler (1838) 8 C & P 616, 173 ER 643 and a further passage from Glanville Williams Criminal Law: The General Part (2nd edn, 1961) p 751 ff at 'Duress and Coercion, which do not, if we may say so respectfully, seem to advance the argument one way or the other. But we are fortified in the view which I indicate (which, to jump ahead, is that this is part of the common law and always has been) by certain matters which appear in the speeches of their Lordships in Lynch v DPP for Northern Ireland [1975] 1 All ER 913, [1975] AC 653. Although Lynch's case has been the subject of certain adverse comment since the date of those speeches, nevertheless the passages to which we wish to refer have not, as far as we know, been the subject of criticism.

First of all in the speech of Lord Morris appears this passage ([1975] 1 All ER 913 at 915, [1975] AC 653 at 668):

'Where duress is in issue many questions may arise such as whether threats are serious and compelling or whether (as on the facts of the present case may specially call for consideration) a person the subject of duress could reasonably have extricated himself or could have sought protection or had what has been called a "safe avenue of escape". Other questions may arise such as whether a person is only under duress as a result of being in voluntary association with those whom he knew would require some course of action. In the present case, as duress was not left to the jury, we naturally do not know what they thought of it all.'

A little later Lord Morris said ([1975] 1 All ER 913 at 918, [1975] AC 653 at 670):

'In posing the case where someone is "really" threatened I use the word "really" in order to emphasise that duress must never be allowed to be the easy answer of those who can devise no other explanation of their conduct nor of those who readily could have avoided the dominance of threats nor of those who allow themselves to be at the disposal and under the sway of some gangster-tyrant. Where duress becomes an issue courts and juries will surely consider the facts with care and discernment.'

Here of course, I interpolate, Hussey was the archetypal gangster-tyrant.

I turn from Lord Morris to the speech of Lord Wilberforce, in which appears this passage ([1975] 1 All ER 913 at 925, [1975] AC 653 at 679):

'It is clear that a possible case of duress, on the facts, could have been made. I say "a possible case" because there were a number of matters which the jury would have had to consider if this defence had been left to them. Among these would have been whether Meehan, though uttering no express threats of death or serious injury, impliedly did so in such a way as to put the appellant in fear of death or serious injury; whether, if so, the threats continued to operate throughout the enterprise; whether the appellant had voluntarily exposed himself to a situation in which threats might be used against him if he did not participate in a criminal enterprise (the appellant denied that he had done so); whether the appellant had taken every opportunity open to him to escape from the situation of duress. In order to test the validity of the judge's decision to exclude this defence, we must assume on this appeal that these matters would have been decided in favour of the appellant.'

Finally, so far as the passages in favour of the contention which we are supporting are concerned, in the speech of Lord Simon appears this passage ([1975] 1 All ER 913 at 932, [1975] AC 653 at 687):

'I spoke of the social evils which might be attendant on the recognition of a general defence of duress. Would it not enable a gang leader of notorious violence to confer on his organisation by terrorism immunity from the criminal law? Every member of his gang might well be able to say with truth, "It was as much as my life a was worth to disobey". Was this not in essence the plea of the appellant? We do not, in general, allow a superior officer to confer such immunity on his subordinates by any defence of obedience to orders; why should we allow it to terrorists? Nor would it seem to be sufficient to stipulate that no one can plead duress as a defence who had put himself into a position in which duress could be exercised on himself.'

b In deference to counsel for the appellant, we turn finally to a passage in the speech of Lord Kilbrandon, who, in his opening words, said ([1975] 1 All ER 913 at 942, [1975] AC 653 at 699-700):

c 'My Lords, the learned trial judge directed the jury to the effect that the defence of duress is not available as exculpation in a charge of murder, whether the accused has been charged as a principal in the first or in the second degree. In my opinion, that direction correctly stated the law as it then stood and now stands. It is my misfortune that while I agree with those of your Lordships who consider that that law is in a very unsatisfactory state, and is in urgent need of restatement, I remain convinced that the grounds on which the majority propose that the conviction of the appellant be set aside involve changes in the law which are outside the proper functions of your Lordships in your judicial capacity.'

d Counsel for the appellant submits, as already indicated, that that view is a correct one, that it is not for this court to extend by judicial interpretation what he submits is the present state of the common law.

e We draw assistance from the fact that common law jurisdictions as well as Commonwealth jurisdictions throughout the world have adopted this rule almost unanimously (although the wording in their various statutes differs the one from the other), which is an indication to us that this may well have been, and indeed was, throughout a principle of the common law.

The matter was stated clearly by Winneke CJ in R v Hurley and Murray [1967] VR 526, the Supreme Court of Victoria. Before turning to the passage in Winneke CJ's judgment, let me just read part of the headnote in order to summarise the effect of the decision:

f 'Held . . . (2) Whether or not the matters raised by M could amount to a defence of duress, that defence was not available to him in the present case because he had voluntarily, and without any threat to himself, joined in the criminal enterprise and could not excuse his conduct by showing that he had subsequently been subjected to threats of violence to ensure that he did not withdraw from the enterprise.'

g Turning to the judgment of Winneke CJ, which was the majority judgment of the court, the passage runs as follows (at 533):

h 'Tyler's case ((1838) 8 C & P 616, 173 ER 643) was cited to us by [counsel for the Crown] as authority for the proposition contained in the last sentence of the passage quoted above from Dr. Glanville Williams' book [Criminal Law: The General Part (2nd edn, 1961) p 759, para 247], but it is plain on consulting the report that Lord Denman did not in his charge to the jury advert to the matter at all. [If I may interpolate there, that is a statement with which this court entirely agrees.] There is thus nothing in his charge to the jury which is authority for Dr. Glanville Williams' statement. Nevertheless, we are persuaded that it is both good law and good sense, and that a person who without threat of death or serious violence voluntarily makes himself a party to a criminal enterprise cannot excuse his criminal conduct in participating in that enterprise by showing that after he had embraced the cause he was subjected to threats of violence at the hands of the other parties to ensure that he did not resile from the bargain he had voluntarily entered into.'

j That was the precise description of what happened in this case between this appellant and Hussey.

Winneke CJ went on to cite from the Criminal Codes of Queensland, Western Australia and Tasmania, each of which contained a provision to that very effect. He cited the first Criminal Code from Canada (1892). He cited the New Zealand codification of the criminal law (first codified in 1893, then in the Crimes Act 1961), and he cited also the well-known American textbook, Perkins on Criminal Law (1957) p 843, where the following passage appears:

'If D for example is compelled under threat of death to provide a getaway car for robbers, or to assist them in some other way, he is not guilty of robbery . . . He cannot be a perpetrator of a robbery of which he is innocent. This is not comparable in any way to the claim that one who willingly joins in the robbery was compelled during the perpetration to do something against his will. Such a claim will be rejected because the situation was the result of extreme culpability of his part.'

Two American decisions are cited there by name.

We are therefore, in the light of that persuasive authority and the indications in their Lordships' speeches in Lynch v DPP for Northern Ireland, of the opinion that the judge, Kenneth Jones J, was correct in the decision which he reached.

We are further fortified in that view by the judgment of Lord Lowry LCJ in R v Fitzpatrick [1977] NI 20. Let me read the brief headnote once again in order to indicate the nature of the decision. It runs as follows:

'If a person by joining an illegal organisation or a similar group of men with criminal objectives and coercive methods, voluntarily exposes and submits himself to illegal compulsion, he cannot rely on the duress to which he has voluntarily exposed himself as an excuse either in respect of the crimes he commits against his will or in respect of his continued but unwilling association with those capable of exercising upon him the duress which he calls in aid.'

Turning to the body of the judgment, there are just three passages which we would like to cite to indicate the way in which Lord Lowry LCJ's judgment went. The first reads as follows (at 22):

' . . . the judge held that, having joined the I.R.A. and voluntarily exposed himself to the risk of compulsion by the I.R.A. to commit crimes on its behalf, the appellant was not entitled to rely on the defence of duress exercised by that organisation. In so holding the learned trial judge cited the well known passage from Stephen's History of the Criminal Law of England ((1883) vol 2, p 108), which was referred to by Lord Edmund-Davies in Lynch ([1975] 1 All ER 913 at 947, [1975] AC 653 at 705): "If a man chooses to expose and still more if he chooses to submit himself to illegal compulsion, it may not operate even in mitigation of punishment. It would surely be monstrous to mitigate the punishment of a murderer on the ground that he was a member of a secret society by which he would have been assassinated if he had not committed murder."'

The second passage reads as follows (at 23):

'Counsel on both sides have informed us that the point is devoid of judicial authority and we have not found anything to suggest the contrary. Therefore we have to decide, in the absence of judicial decisions, what is the common law. Assistance may be sought from the opinions of textwriters, judicial dicta and the reports of Commissions and legal committees, and from analogies with legal systems which share our common law heritage, with a view to considering matters of general principle and arriving at the answer. [Counsel for the appellant] drew to our attention the penal codes of Canada, New Zealand and the State of Queensland and we have also considered among others the penal codes of Western Australia and the State of New York as well as the draft code of 1879 prepared by the Royal a Commission of which Mr. Justice Stephen was a member and the American Model Penal Code. All these codes and draft codes contain various provisions withholding from members of unlawful organisations the right to rely on a defence of duress.'

Then Lord Lowry LCJ cites two extracts from the various codes and authorities which he indicates in précis in the passage which I have read.

b There is no need for us to go into that and there is no need for us to cite further from Lord Lowry LCJ, except for one passage, where he said (at 26):

c 'We consider that the widespread adoption of such limiting provisions with regard to duress shows that the framers of the codes and drafts which we have mentioned considered that this exclusory doctrine was already part of the common law and the Law Commission's recommendation indicates the view of a distinguished body of jurists, (whose recommendations are in general favourable to duress as a defence), that participation in unlawful associations or conspiracies should disqualify the accused from relying on it.'

d In other words, in our judgment, where a person has voluntarily, and with knowledge of its nature, joined a criminal organisation or gang which he knew might bring pressure on him to commit an offence and was an active member when he was put under such pressure, he cannot avail himself of the defence of duress. Counsel for the appellant concedes that such a ruling is the end of his appeal. The appeal is therefore dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD KEITH OF KINKEL, LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON, LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK, LORD GRIFFITHS AND LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN

8, 9, 10 JUNE, 28 JULY 1987

Shipping – Demurrage – Late payment – Payment in sterling – Currency exchange loss – Damages arising from late payment of demurrage – Charterparty providing for demurrage to be calculated in US dollars but paid in sterling – Dispute over demurrage resolved by arbitration – Sterling exchange rate falling between date demurrage due and date of arbitration award – Whether currency exchange loss arising from late payment of demurrage recoverable.

In July 1980 the owners chartered their vessel to the charterer for the carriage of a cargo of phosphate from Louisiana to India. Under cl 30 of the charterparty freight and demurrage were to be calculated in US dollars but were to be paid in London in sterling at the mean exchange rate ruling on the date of the bill of lading. At that date the exchange rate was $2.37 to the pound. A dispute arose between the parties over demurrage which was referred to arbitration in England. In February 1983 the umpire published an award in favour of the owners. By the date of the award the sterling exchange rate had dropped to $1.54 to the pound. The umpire held that the charterer was liable for demurrage amounting to $24,250 and that because the charterer was liable for damages for late payment the owners were entitled to recover the exchange loss suffered by them because of the fall in the sterling exchange rate, with the result that the total award in effect comprised demurrage converted at the $2.37 exchange rate (ie £10,232) and damages for the exchange loss, being the difference in converting at the $1.54 and $2.37 exchange rates (ie £5,514), making a total of £15,746. In a further award the umpire held that the exchange loss was recoverable as special damages. On appeal by the charterer the question arose whether the exchange loss was recoverable as general or special damages. The judge allowed the charterer's appeal, holding that the exchange loss caused by the late payment of demurrage could not be recovered as special damages and he varied the award by converting the demurrage into sterling at the $2.37 exchange rate (thus reducing the award to £10,232). On appeal by the owners the Court of Appeal held that the exchange loss suffered by the owners was recoverable as special damages and allowed the appeal. The charterer appealed to the House of Lords.

Held – Since demurrage was not a liability in debt but a liability in damages arising out of the detention of a chartered ship by the charterer beyond the stipulated lay days, and since there was no such thing as a cause of action in damages for late payment of damages, a currency exchange loss arising out of the late payment of demurrage was not recoverable as special damages and could only be compensated by the award of interest. Having regard to the terms of cl 30 of the charterparty, the appropriate award was demurrage payable in sterling at the $2.37 exchange rate prevailing on the date of the bill of lading together with interest running from two months after the completion of discharge (that being the period within which demurrage was usually settled and paid for). The appeal would therefore be allowed (see p 111 h j, p 115 c to e, p 117 a to d, p 118 d to f and p 121 a, post).

Appeal

- The President of India, the charterer of the vessel Lips from the owners, Lips Maritime Corp, under a charterparty in the Ferticon form dated 1 July 1980, appealed with leave of the Appeal Committee granted on 5 February 1987 against the decision of the Court of Appeal (Neill, Nicholls LJ and Sir Roualeyn Cumming-Bruce) ([1987] 1 All ER 957, [1987] 2 WLR 906) on 31 October 1986 allowing the owners' appeal against the decision of Staughton J ([1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep 180) on 3 April 1985 varying the award made by the umpire, Mr Frank Rehder, on 22 February 1983 in an arbitration between the parties whereby he awarded the owners the sum of $24,250, converted at the rate of $1.54 to the pound to £15,746.75, for demurrage and the exchange loss arising out of the late payment thereof. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Brandon.

28 July. The following opinions were delivered.

- LORD KEITH OF KINKEL. My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon. I agree with it and
- h for the reasons he gives would allow the appeal.

- LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Mackay, and I share his difficulty in departing from the umpire's holding to the effect that the charterer was contractually bound to pay the demurrage by 11 December 1980. But I agree with my
- j noble and learned friend that it would be inappropriate either to remit the case to the umpire or to decide the appeal on a legal basis which is unsound. In these circumstances I agree that the appeal should be allowed and should be disposed of in the way proposed by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, this is an appeal by leave of your Lordships' House from an order of the Court of Appeal (Neill, Nicholls LJ and Sir Roualeyn Cumming-Bruce) ([1987] 1 All ER 957, [1987] 2 WLR 906) made on 31 October 1986. By that order the court allowed an appeal from an order of Staughton J ([1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep 180) made in the Commercial Court on 4 April 1985, by which he had varied an award, dated 22 February 1983 made in arbitration proceedings in London by an umpire, Mr Frank Rehder.

The appellant (the charterer) was the charterer of the m v Lips (the ship) owned by the respondents (the owners) under a voyage charterparty dated 1 July 1980 (the charter). Pursuant to the charter the ship loaded a cargo of di-ammonium phosphate at Donaldsville, Louisiana, and carried it to India. There she discharged part of the cargo, for lightening purposes, at Visakhapatnam, and the remainder of it at Calcutta. After the completion of the voyage disputes arose concerning, among other things, the amount of the charterer's liability to the owners in respect of demurrage. It is with the way in which the umpire dealt with the owner's claim in respect of demurrage that the proceedings in the courts below and the present appeal is concerned.

The charter provided, so far as material, as follows: by cl 9, that if the ship should be detained beyond the lay days demurrage should be paid at the rate of $US6,000 per day and pro rata, and dispatch money for all working time saved at half the demurrage rate per working day and pro rata; by cl 13, that the owners should have a lien on the cargo for demurrage; by cl 15, that general average should be settled in London; by cl 17, that any dispute arising under the charter should be settled by arbitration in London; by cl 18, that the freight should be paid in London in British sterling: 90% within seven days of submission of the necessary freight bill and the balance after completion of settlement of demurrage/dispatch; by cl 19, that freight should be calculated at various rates in US dollars per ton of cargo depending on the charterer's choice of ports for loading and discharge; by cl 28, how laytime should be calculated and that laytime for loading and discharging should be reversible.

Clause 30 of the charter further provided:

'(A) Freight . . . is payable in British External Sterling in London . . . at the mean exchange rate ruling on Bill(s) of Lading date . . .

(B) The mean exchange rate ruling on Bill of Lading date will also apply, to other related payments/settlements including demurrage/dispatch settlements under this Charter Party and will apply in all cases where payments/settlements are affected in currency other than the currency in which the rates of freight and demurrage/dispatch are indicated in the Charter Party.

(C) In cases where there is more than one Bill of Lading in respect of a shipment the mean exchange rate as above will be applicable to the calculation of freight under each Bill of Lading. For the purpose of demurrage/dispatch and other related payments, the exchange rate applicable will be the simple average of the mean exchange rates adopted for freight calculations.

(D) Demurrage/dispatch and any other payments, under this Charter Party shall also be made in British External Sterling.'

By his award the umpire decided as follows: (1) that the ship had been on demurrage for 28 days 1 hour 47 minutes of which only 24 days and 47 minutes had been admitted and paid for by the charterer, leaving 4 days and 1 hour still to be paid for by him; (2) that the amount of demurrage payable in respect of this period of 4 days and 1 hour, calculated at the prescribed rate of $6,000 per day and pro rata, was $24,250; (3) that the rate of exchange on the date of the bills of lading was $1.54 = £1.00; (4) that the charterer was under an obligation to settle and pay for demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge; (5) that the owners were entitled to recover, as damages for late payment of the outstanding demurrage, the loss suffered by them by reason of sterling having depreciated from a rate of $2.37 = £1.00 at the bills of lading date to a $1.54 = £1.00 at the date of the award; (6) that, in order to give effect to this right of recovery, the sum of $24,250 referred to earlier should be converted into sterling, not at the rate of $2.37 = £1.00 prevailing at the bills of lading date, but at the rate of $1.54 = £1.00 prevailing at the date of the award, producing a sum payable by the charter of £15,746.75 to which interest should be added.

While the above represents a summary of what the umpire decided, I think that I should set out in full two passages from the reasons for his award given by him.

b Paragraph 4.2 of the reasons states:

‘On the date of the Bills of Lading the rate of exchange was about $2.37 = £1. At the present time it is about $1.54 = £1. Thus, if, as Charterers contended, conversion of the amount awarded is made at the rate as at the Bill of Lading date, Owners will suffer a considerable loss. Charterers were in breach in not making payment at the proper time, and the damages for that breach is the difference between the respective rates of exchange, and I have awarded accordingly.’

Paragraph 8.2 of the reasons states:

‘The demurrage should have been settled and paid within two months of the completion of discharge, i.e. by 11 December 1980 . . .’

It was common ground between the parties before your Lordships that the sum of £15,746.75 awarded by the umpire in respect of demurrage, though not so expressly described in the award, must be regarded as comprising two separate elements: firstly, $24,250 converted at $2.37 = £1.00, which comes to £10,232.07 (the demurrage element), and, secondly, the difference between $24,250 converted at $1.54 = £1.00 and at $2.37 = £1.00, which comes to £5,514.68 (the damages element).

The charterer's case before your Lordships was that the umpire was wrong in law in deciding that demurrage should have been settled and paid for two months after completion of discharge and, on that ground, in adding the damages element to the demurrage element. It was, however, also common ground that, assuming that the umpire was right in law about these two matters, he should have calculated the damages element by reference to the rate of exchange prevailing two months after completion of discharge, i.e. 11 December 1980, rather than the rate of exchange prevailing on the bills of lading date. The rate of exchange prevailing on 11 December 1980 was $2.32 = £1.00. If that rate is taken, the damages element is reduced from £5,514.68 to £5,294.16, and the total of both elements from £15,746.75 to £15,526.23.

My Lords, by order dated 15 July 1983 Hobhouse J gave the charterer leave to appeal on a question of law which was, in effect, whether the umpire was right in law, in dealing with the owners' claim in respect of demurrage, to add the damages element to the demurrage element.

On 26 July 1984 the appeal came before Lloyd J, whose judgment is reported (see [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep 180). He took the view that the principle laid down by your Lordships' House in President of India v La Pintada Cia Navegacion SA [1984] 2 All ER 773, [1985] AC 104 in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment applied equally in relation to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for late payment. That principle was that interest could be recovered as damages for late payment if it was special damage which could be brought within the second part of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch 341, [1843–60] All ER Rep 461, but not if it was general damage which could only be brought within the first part of that rule. Lloyd J, being of that opinion and considering also that the umpire's reasons for his award left it in doubt whether he regarded the owners' currency exchange loss as coming within the first or second part of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale, by order dated 30 July 1984 allowed the appeal to the extent of remitting the award to the umpire in order that he should reconsider the matter and resolve that doubt.

As a result of the remission the umpire made a further award dated 23 November 1984. In it he set out a series of further findings of fact on the basis of which he said that, in his view, the currency exchange loss suffered by the owners was special damage coming within the second part of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale. Paragraph 15 of his further award states:

'The provisions of clause 30 apply, for better or for worse, where the contract is correctly performed; but they do not apply to a breach. I have already found that Charterers were in breach in not making payment timeously.'

It appears to me that this passage involves some confusion of thought. In arriving at the amount of the demurrage element, the umpire did apply the provisions of cl 30; but he counteracted that application by adding the damages element. The result is, mathematically, the same; but the rationale is different. What I think that the umpire was really trying to say was that, although cl 30 was applicable to the calculation of the demurrage element, it did not preclude the addition to the latter of the damages element.

Following the making of the umpire's further award, the charterer's appeal came back for further hearing before Staughton J (see [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep 180). He held that, having regard to the further findings of fact made in the further award, the umpire had been wrong in law to conclude that the owners' currency exchange loss came within the second part of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale; he should instead have concluded that it came within the first part of that rule. He accordingly made an order dated 4 April 1985, the effect of which was to vary the umpire's award in respect of demurrage by excluding from it the damages element.

The owners appealed to the Court of Appeal (see [1987] 1 All ER 957, [1987] 2 WLR 906), constituted as stated earlier. That court allowed the appeal on two grounds. The first ground was that the currency exchange loss suffered by the owners came within the second part of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale and was therefore recoverable as special damages for breach of contract. The second ground was that cl 30 of the charter determined the rate of exchange applicable when the contract was performed, ie when demurrage was settled and paid for within two months of the completion of discharge, but did not do so when the paying party was in breach of the contract by failing to pay within that time. The clause did not, therefore, preclude the owners' claim for damages.

Here again there seems to have been some confusion of thought. If cl 30 did not apply to determine the rate of exchange applicable in the case of a late payment, then there was no provision for conversion in that case at all. It would follow for reasons given later than, in such a case, demurrage would be payable in dollars. The Court of Appeal, however, held that, since the owners had not contended for payment in dollars before the umpire, it was too late for them to do so at that stage.

My Lords, it will be apparent from the account which I have given of the proceedings in the courts below that this case has been dealt with throughout on two basic assumptions. The first assumption has been that the umpire was right in law in deciding that the charterer was under a contractual obligation to settle and pay for demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge. The second assumption has been that the principle laid down by your Lordships' House in President of India v La Pintada Cia Navegacion SA [1984] 2 All ER 773, [1985] AC 104 in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment applied equally in relation to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for late payment. For reasons which I shall give later, I am of the opinion that both these assumptions were fallacious. I also think that, because the assumptions were fallacious, the courts below were led into two errors. The first error was to apply themselves to deciding a question which, on what I consider to be a true view of the law, did not need to be decided. The second error, which was linked with the first, was to approach the construction of cl 30 of the charter on a wrong basis. Your Lordships are faced with the difficulty that the charterer does not appear to have disputed the correctness of either of the assumptions to which I have referred in the courts below.

It seems to me, however, that this circumstance, while it may in certain events be relevant to questions of costs, should not inhibit your Lordships from deciding this appeal on a correct legal basis. The real issue in the appeal is the true construction of the provisions relating to demurrage contained in the charter, which your Lordships were given to understand were in a form commonly used by the charterer in his chartering transactions. That being so, it would, in my view, be wrong to allow fallacious assumptions of law, which were allowed to go unchallenged in the courts below, to affect the way in which your Lordships decide the matters of construction which are really in issue.

I consider first the assumption that the umpire was right in law in deciding that the charterer was under a contractual obligation to settle and pay for demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge. This part of the umpire's decision appears to have been treated below as if it were a finding of fact, whereas it was plainly a holding in law. The question whether it was right or wrong must be dealt with on that basis.

It is essential to the decision of that question to have in mind the legal nature of demurrage: both what it is and what it is not. I deal first with what demurrage is not. It is not money payable by a charterer as the consideration for the exercise by him of a right to detain a chartered ship beyond the stipulated lay days. If demurrage were that, it would be a liability sounding in debt. I deal next with what demurrage is. It is a liability in damages to which a charterer becomes subject because, by detaining the chartered ship beyond the stipulated lay days, he is in breach of his contract. Most, if not all, voyage charters contain a demurrage clause, which prescribes a daily rate at which the damages for such detention are to be quantified. The effect of such a claim is to liquidate the damages payable: it does not alter the nature of the charterer's liability, which is and remains a liability for damages, albeit liquidated damages. In the absence of any provision to the contrary in the charter the charterer's liability for demurrage accrues de die in diem from the moment when, after the lay days have expired, the detention of the ship by him begins. These propositions of law are so well established that the citation of authority for them is perhaps unnecessary. However, if authority is required, it is to be found in such cases as Aktieselskabet Reidar v Arcos Ltd [1927] 1 KB 352, [1926] All ER Rep 140, a decision of the Court of Appeal, and Dias Cia Naviera SA v Louis Dreyfus Corp [1978] 1 All ER 724, [1978] 1 WLR 261, a decision of your Lordships' House. In the latter case Lord Diplock said ([1978] 1 All ER 724 at 726–727, [1978] 1 WLR 261 at 263–264):

'If laytime ends before the charterer has completed the discharging operation he breaks his contract. The breach is a continuing one; it goes on until discharge is completed and the ship is once more available to the shipowner to use for other voyages. But unless the delay in what is often, though incorrectly, called redelivery of the ship to the shipowner is so prolonged as to amount to a frustration of the adventure, the breach by the charterer sounds in damages only. The charterer remains entitled to continue to complete the discharge of the cargo, while remaining liable in damages for the loss sustained by the shipowner during the period for which he is being wrongfully deprived of the opportunity of making profitable use of his ship. It is the almost invariable practice nowadays for these damages to be fixed by the charterparty at a liquidated sum per day and pro rata for part of a day (demurrage) which accrues throughout the period of time for which the breach continues.'

The charter with which this appeal is concerned contained no express provision that demurrage, instead of being payable de die in diem from the moment detention of the ship beyond the lay days began, should only be payable within two months after the completion of discharge. Nor can I see any basis for implying any such provision. It is no doubt true that, because there has to be a general settlement of accounts between the charterer and the shipowner after the completion of the charter voyage, and because time is needed to agree the calculation of the amount of demurrage where a liability for it has been incurred, demurrage will not in practice be settled and paid for until a reasonable time, which may well be of the order of two months, has elapsed after the completion of discharge. This circumstance, however, does not afford a basis for implying a term that the charterer's liability to pay demurrage does not accrue until such a reasonable time has elapsed. I would, therefore, hold that the umpire's decision that the charter here concerned was subject to such a term, adopted without dispute by the courts below, though not without some expression of surprise by Staughton J (see [1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep 180 at 183), was wrong in law. a

I turn to the second assumption, that the principle laid down by your Lordships' House in the La Pintada case in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment of a debt applied equally in relation to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for such late payment. In the La Pintada case the House was invited to depart from its earlier decision in London Chatham and Dover Rly Co v South Eastern Rly Co [1893] AC 429. In that case it was held that, under English common law, interest could not be given as damages for late payment of a debt. Two matters were decided by the House in the La Pintada case. The first matter was that the application of the principle established in the London Chatham and Dover Rly case was limited to claims to recover interest as general damages under the first part of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch 341, [1843-60] All ER Rep 461 and did not extend to claims to recover interest as special damages under the second part of that rule. The second matter was that it would be inappropriate for the House, pursuant to the 1966 Practice Statement (Note [1966] 3 All ER 79, [1966] 1 WLR 1234), to depart from the principle established in the London Chatham and Dover Rly case as so limited. The reason for not so departing, and the only reason, was that the legislature had, since the London Chatham and Dover Rly case had been decided, intervened on more than one occasion to confer on courts a discretionary power to award interest on unpaid debts and that a departure would produce an undesirable conflict between the right to recover interest at common law and statutory entitlement to recover interest on a discretionary basis so conferred. b

The London Chatham and Dover Rly case was concerned, and concerned only, with the recovery of interest as damages for late payment of a debt. It was in no way concerned with the recovery of currency exchange losses as damages for such late payment. It follows necessarily that the scope of the La Pintada case, in so far as it differentiated between claims for the recovery of interest as other general damages on the one hand and as special damages on the other, was similarly limited. The House had no reason in the La Pintada case to consider claims to recover currency exchange losses and did not do so. Such claims differ significantly from claims to recover interest in two ways. Firstly, there is no previously established law, comparable to that laid down in the London Chatham and Dover Rly case, precluding the recovery of currency exchange losses as damages for late payment of a debt. Secondly, there are no statutory provisions relating to the recovery of such losses which could conflict with any right of recovery at common law. In these circumstances it appears to me that claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for breach of contract, whether the breach relied on is late payment of a debt or any other breach, are subject to the same rules as apply for damages for breach of contract generally. This view is supported by Isaac Naylor & Sons Ltd v New Zealand Co-op Wool Marketing Association Ltd [1981] 1 NZLR 361. For these reasons I would hold that the assumption that the principle laid down by your Lordships' House in the La Pintada case in relation to claims to recover interest as damages for late payment of a debt applied equally to claims to recover currency exchange losses as damages for late payment, an assumption which was again made without dispute in the courts below, was also wrong in law. c

My Lords, I shall now consider the charterer's case that the umpire was wrong, in dealing with the owners' claim in respect of demurrage, to add the damages element to the demurrage element. I shall, moreover, do this untrammelled by the two assumptions made in the courts below which I have held to have been wrong in law. d

Once it is recognised that a claim for demurrage sounds in damages rather than in debt, it becomes apparent that the two concepts, firstly, of a contractual date for the payment of such damages and, secondly, of a claim for damages for breach of contract in not paying them by such date have no basis in law. As I said earlier an owner's cause of action for demurrage, being one for damages, albeit liquidated damages, accrues de die in diem from the moment when the ship is detained beyond the stipulated lay days. There is no such thing as a cause of action in damages for late payment of damages. The only remedy which the law affords for delay in paying damages is the discretionary award of interest pursuant to statute. It follows that the umpire's decision in the present case, in dealing with the owners' claim in respect of demurrage, to add the damages element to the demurrage element, was wrong in law, and was so irrespectively of the provisions of cl 30 of the charter. The umpire was, however, right in principle to award interest (although not compound interest: see the La Pintada case) on the amount of the demurrage payable by the charterer. Further, on the basis that demurrage is usually settled and paid for within two months of the completion of discharge, as I infer that the umpire found, he was also right to make interest payable only from the day following the expiry of that period, i.e. from 12 December 1980, as he did.

The owners, in support of their case that the umpire was right to add the damages element to the demurrage element, relied strongly on Aruna Mills Ltd v Dhanrajmal Gobindram [1968] 1 All ER 113, [1968] 1 QB 655. In that case sellers contracted with buyers to ship goods under a cif contract on or before a stipulated date. The price of the goods was to be a sum in Indian rupees, and there was an express provision in the contract that any difference in the rates of exchange between the Indian rupee and the pound sterling prevailing on the date of the contract and on the date when the price was paid should be borne and paid for by the buyers. The sellers shipped the goods later than the contractual date and during the period of delay in shipment the Indian rupee was devalued in relation to the pound sterling. As a result the buyers had to pay an increased price for the goods. A dispute between the parties was referred to arbitration and subsequently a special case was stated for the opinion of the court on the question whether the buyer was entitled to recover the increase in the price of the goods resulting from the devaluation as damages for the sellers' breach of contract in shipping the goods late. It was held by Donaldson J, applying the principles laid down in Hadley v Baxendale and later authorities on the recovery of damages for breach of contract, that the loss claimed was not too remote and was therefore recoverable by the buyers, so as to entitle them to set it off against the increased price.

The Aruna Mills case is, in my opinion, clearly distinguishable from the present case. In the Aruna Mills case the sellers committed a breach of contract in shipping goods later than the contractual date of shipment, and the only question was whether the loss suffered by the buyer in having to pay an increased price for the goods was within the contemplation of the parties at the time of contracting so as to make such loss recoverable as damages for the breach. Donaldson J decided that it was and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of his decision. In the present case, however, for reasons which I gave earlier, there was no breach of the charter by the charterer in respect of the payment of demurrage. All that happened was that the charterer did not pay liquidated damages for the detention of the ship at the time when the cause of action in respect of such damages accrued, or indeed at any time up to and including the date of the umpire's award. For that non-payment the only remedy which the law affords to the owners is interest on the sum remaining unpaid. In my view, therefore, the Aruna Mills case does not assist the owners.

My Lords, there remains for consideration the effect of cl 30 of the charter. According to the findings contained in the umpire's further award, the currency in which the owners carried on their business was US dollars. Clause 9 of the charter further provided that demurrage should be calculated at the rate of $6,000 per day and pro rata. In these circumstances, were it not for the inclusion of cl 30 in the charter, the owners would have been entitled to an award in respect of their claim for demurrage expressed in dollars: see Eleftherotria (owners) v Despina R (owners), The Despina R [1979] 1 All ER 421, [1979] AC 685. In that situation the owner would not have suffered the currency exchange loss which led the umpire to add the damages element to the demurrage element. Clause 30, however, expressly changed what would otherwise have been the situation. It did so in two ways. Firstly, it provided that demurrage calculated in dollars under cl 9 should, for the purposes of payment, be converted into pounds sterling. Secondly, it provided that such conversion should take place at the rate of exchange prevailing on the bills of lading date. These provisions, by the express terms of the clause, apply whenever demurrage is settled or paid for. Further it is clear that the expression 'settlement', as used in cl 30, includes settlement by an award in arbitration proceedings as well as settlement by agreement between the parties. I reach that conclusion after considering the use of the expression 'settle' in relation to general average in cl 15 of the charter and in relation to disputes referred to arbitration in cl 17. In any case, I did not understand the owners to be disputing that this was the meaning of the expression 'settlement' in cl 30. Their acceptance of the division of the umpire's award in respect of demurrage into two elements, the demurrage element and the damage elements, is inconsistent with their doing so.

My Lords, for the reasons which I have given I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Court of Appeal and restore the order of Staughton J except in so far as it relates to costs. As will be apparent, however, the grounds on which I think that the substantive part of the order of Staughton J was right differ fundamentally from those on which he relied in making it.

LORD GRIFFITHS. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Brandon and Lord Mackay. I should for myself have preferred to reach a result which did not enable the charterer by delaying payment to take advantage of the decline of the pound against the dollar. For the reasons given by Lord Mackay this result would be achieved only if the charterparty is subject to the implied term as to payment found by the umpire. Despite the fact that this term as to payment was not challenged until the hearing in your Lordships' House I have been reluctantly persuaded by the reasoning of Lord Brandon that no sufficient grounds exist to support such a term and that for the reasons he gives the appeal must be allowed.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon. I gratefully adopt his account of the facts and the history of these proceedings.

As my noble and learned friend has pointed out the umpire decided that the charterer was under an obligation to pay the demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge. The breach of contract alleged by the owners was failure on the part of the charterer to comply with this obligation and the damages element is the quantum of damages said to arise from that breach. If there was no such contractual obligation payment more than two months after the completion of discharge was not a breach of contract and accordingly no damages for breach of contract could be successfully claimed. Staughton J said of the umpire's holding on this point ([1985] 2 Lloyd's Rep 180 at 183):

'Quite why the charterer is allowed two months grace is not clear to me, and was not explained by counsel. But there has been no challenge to that conclusion.'

This remained the position in the Court of Appeal ([1987] 1 All ER 957, [1987] 2 WLR 906). The petition by the charterer for leave to appeal to your Lordships' House included a submission 'that it is not a breach of contract to fail to pay damages/demurrage promptly such as to entitle the payee to damages rather than interest'. In argument before your Lordships counsel for the charterer made it plain that he was not submitting a that there had been no breach of contract by late payment in the present case although his submission was that the contractual term breached was that the demurrage should have been paid from day to day as it arose.

If there was a contractual provision requiring the charterer to pay the demurrage by 11 December 1980, in my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

b Briefly, my reasons are that failure to perform this contractual term would involve a breach of contract entitling the owners to damages for that breach, measured by the amount of loss caused to them by the breach. Clause 30, in my opinion, applies whenever payment is made and accordingly applies to a late payment just as much as to a timeous payment. The business of the owners was carried on in US dollars and on receipt of timeous payment in accordance with cl 30 in British external sterling the owners would be expected to convert it as at that date into US dollars at the prevailing exchange rate. If instead of paying on the due date the charterer deferred payment to a later date and if on c that later date the same amount in British sterling converted into US dollars would yield a smaller amount than if converted at the due date the difference in US dollars would be a loss to the owners for which they were entitled, in my opinion, to compensation. I see nothing in the words of cl 30 to preclude such a claim. In my opinion, the reasoning of Donaldson J in Aruna Mills Ltd v Dhanrajmal Gobindram [1968] 1 All ER 113, [1968] 1 QB 655 would apply in this situation. Counsel for the charterer sought to distinguish the d Aruna Mills case on the basis that the reason the payment in that case was later than it would have been if the contract was performed was not because there was a breach of contract by late payment but because a breach of contract in failing to ship at the proper time resulted in payment being due later than otherwise it would have been. I cannot see why this makes any difference in principle. In both the Aruna Mills case and the present case on the basis which I am now discussing the payment was later than it should e have been with resulting loss to the payee in consequence of breach of contract on the part of the payer.

It was submitted for the charterer that the word 'settlement' in cl 30 somehow showed that cl 30 precluded the owners' claim. Clause 30 is dealing with an account between the charterer and the owners which may include items such as demurrage payable by the f charterer to the owners and items such as dispatch payable by the owners to the charterer. Where one is thinking of an account in which it is desired to bring out the balance payable by the charterer to the owners it is natural to regard amounts payable by the charterer to the owners as payments whereas amounts due in the opposite direction will not require to be paid but to be accounted for by deduction. Clause 30 provides not only that payments are to be subject to the exchange rate regime of the clause but that g amounts to be allowed by way of deduction are also to be calculated under the same regime and, in my opinion, the word 'settlement' is a convenient expression to use for this process of allowing an item as a deduction in an account. The express distinction taken between demurrage on the one hand and dispatch on the other is, in my view, in the structure of the clause mirrored by the distinction between payment on the one hand and settlement on the other. In Monrovia Tramp Shipping Co v President of India, The Pearl Merchant [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep 193 at 196 Donaldson J records a submission by Mr h Hobhouse, who appeared for the charterers in that case, in a somewhat similar context to the present 'that settlement in this context means calculation and not payment, and he says that despatch would be settled by deduction from the freight', which Donaldson J adds, 'may well be right.'

j It is true that elsewhere in the charterparty the word 'settlement' occurs in the context of settlement of disputes but I cannot regard it as related to dispute in the context of cl 30. Clause 30 is a clause which has to be applied in reaching a determination of the amount to be paid by the charterer to the owners. If the directions in cl 30 are followed and the amount brought out by the charterer following those directions is the same as the amount brought out by the owners no dispute would arise. The clause as a whole would be put into effect. If, however, a dispute arose about the payment those responsible for determining the dispute would require to apply the rules for determination of the amount to be paid set out in cl 30. It would be strange indeed if the rules to be followed differed according to whether parties were agreed on how they should be applied or differed on how they should be applied. In both cases the true construction of the rules set out in cl 30 would be applicable. In this context I think it is worth noting that clause 30(D) provides: 'Demurrage/despatch and any other payments, under this Charter Party shall also be made in British External Sterling.' The word 'settlement' is not present in that part of the clause and even after a dispute is determined what is ultimately made is an order for payment of the amount found due. It would not, I think, be correct to describe it as an order for 'settlement' of an amount found due. What is settled by the arbitration procedure is the amount of the payment to be made. a

If I am right so far, the owners had a claim for damages for breach of contract by reason of late payment of an amount equal to the exchange losses sustained by them in consequence of that breach. I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon that the decision of this House in London Chatham and Dover Rly Co v South Eastern Rly Co [1893] AC 429 was limited to claims to recover interest as general damages under the first part of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch 341, [1843-60] All ER Rep 461 and therefore has no application to the present claim. The reasoning of this House in President of India v La Pintada Cia Navegacion SA [1984] 2 All ER 773, [1985] AC 104 makes it clear that damages other than interest may be recovered for breach of contract by late payment. Accordingly, on this basis the owners' claim in the present case was a valid claim. b

However, there is no express term in this charterparty obliging the charterer to pay the demurrage within two months of the completion of discharge and the umpire's finding must depend on implication. As a practical matter I can see some attraction in having a term providing for a date on which payment is due which allows sufficient time for making up the necessary account but there is nothing in this charterparty or in the circumstances so far as disclosed in this appeal which would render necessary an implication of such a clause in the present case but would not produce a similar necessity in many other cases which have been reported. c

In general, contracts do not contain provisions regulating the amount or the manner or due date of payment of damages for their breach. A contract may contain a clause quantifying damages and this charterparty is an example in that it provides for demurrage as liquidated damages for breach of the obligation to complete loading and discharge within the lay days provided. But that does not deal with the time of payment. No doubt it is possible to make a provision which has the effect that, in respect of failure to perform a particular contractual term, a party becomes liable to pay a specified amount on a particular day to the other party. An example in which that was held to be the result is afforded by the decision of the Privy Council in Loh Wai Lian v Sea Housing Corp Sdn Bhd (3 March 1987, unreported), although in that case the date on which payment of the sum was due was not expressly provided although the Board held that it was implied. d

I have felt considerable difficulty in departing completely from this aspect of the umpire's holding, which was unchallenged in the two courts below and in respect of which it was expressly accepted by counsel for the charterer before your Lordships that a breach of contract had occurred by reason of late payment, although the breach counsel accepted was of a term different from that on which the umpire's decision rested, without giving an opportunity to the umpire to state the justification for his holding. Having regard to the amount at stake and to the issues of general importance which the parties sought to litigate I consider it would be most unfortunate to remit the case to the umpire now. I also agree that it would not be proper for this House to act on the assumption that the necessary contractual term was to be implied in this charterparty where no basis has been suggested on which that could happen. I am further persuaded that difficult questions are posed by this assumption. For example, the lien provided to the owners in respect of demurrage is a formidable though perhaps not completely insurmountable e a obstacle to the implication of any term in this contract on the lines suggested in the umpire's holding. Such questions have not been examined. In that situation I have reached the conclusion that the course proposed by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon is the proper one to follow, and I agree with his conclusion that this appeal should be allowed.

Interlocutory appeal

The defendants, Economist Newspaper Ltd, appealed with leave against the order of Tucker J dated 22 May 1987 (i) granting the plaintiffs, George Bobolas and Ethnos Publications: Nicolopoulos-Kyriazis SA, leave to serve a reamended statement of claim and reply to the reamended defence and defence to the reamended counterclaim in their action brought against the defendants for defamation and (ii) holding that the rulings of law made by Kenneth Jones J at the trial of the action would not be binding at the retrial which was ordered by reason of the jury's failure to agree on issues of fact. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lloyd LJ. a b

LLOYD LJ. We are very grateful to both counsel in this appeal. It is an appeal from a decision of Tucker J given on 22 May 1987 whereby he allowed the plaintiffs to make certain very late amendments to their pleadings in this protracted libel action. The trial started in February 1987 before Kenneth Jones J and a jury. It lasted for 42 days. At the end of the hearing the jury were unable to agree, so the judge ordered a retrial. The retrial is, as I understand it, due to start next week. c

The appeal raises an interesting question of law as to the status of issues decided at the first trial, that is to say issues decided by the judge before the jury disagreed. The defendants say that the plaintiffs cannot reargue those same issues. They rely on the doctrine of issue estoppel. The plaintiffs say that that is wrong, the trial starts again de novo. The issues decided at the first trial and any rulings given by the judge are, in the celebrated phrase of Asquith LJ, 'writ in water' (see Howard v Pickford Tool Co Ltd [1951] 1 KB 417 at 421). d e

Before Tucker J the argument turned largely on the question of law which I have mentioned. Before us that question of law has receded somewhat, but it is necessary to decide it all the same. The main argument before us has been that the judge erred in the exercise of his discretion. Counsel for the defendants accepts that the burden in that respect will not be easy for him to discharge.

It is necessary now to give the briefest possible description of how the points for decision arise. The first plaintiff, Mr George Bobolas, is a Greek industrialist. He is also the majority shareholder in the second named plaintiff. The second plaintiffs are the publishers of a Greek daily newspaper called τὸ Ἔθνος which, being translated, means 'The Nation'. The defendants are publishers of the Economist Foreign Report. In their issue of 29 April 1982 the defendants published a report about τὸ Ἔθνος which the plaintiffs say is defamatory of them. In para 4 of the statement of claim as originally served they say that the natural and ordinary meaning of the words published is: f g

'... that the Plaintiffs and each of them were publishing "Ethnos" with a subsidy from Soviet Russia, and that they were not part of a free press but rather the mouthpiece of a communist and totalitarian state's propaganda machine.'

I will return to para 4 in a moment since it is one of the paragraphs which the plaintiffs seek to amend, reluctant though they are to amend the natural and ordinary meaning of the words at this late stage of the proceedings. h

In para 7 the plaintiffs say that the natural and probable consequence of the publication was that other Greek newspapers would republish the libel as front page news, which indeed they did. The plaintiffs seek to amend that paragraph also, to which again I will return. j

The defence and counterclaim was served in August 1982. It was originally a fairly simple affair. But it was amended in February 1985 to plead justification and has been reamended on numerous occasions since then. In para 5(A) of the defence the defendants a gave notice that they will rely on s 5 of the Defamation Act 1952, which I need not pause to read.

b By their counterclaim the defendants retaliated in kind. They said that on 8 June 1982, some six weeks after the publication of which the plaintiffs complain, the plaintiffs published an article about the defendants, the natural and ordinary meaning of which is that the Economist Foreign Report is 'used as a tool by the CIA for the purposes of propaganda and false information.' They say the same about a much shorter article published on the following day, 9 June.

c The plaintiffs, in their defence to the counterclaim served in November 1982, admitted that the plaintiffs and each of them were responsible for the publication of which the defendants complain. But they denied that the words bear the meaning alleged and they go on to say that in any event they were published as a reply to the attack made on them. They can therefore rely on qualified privilege in English law. Finally, in their reply the defendants say that the plaintiffs were activated by express malice.

d The plaintiffs wish to amend their defence to the counterclaim so as to make it clear that, whilst they admit that Mr Bobolas published the words in question, nevertheless they deny that he is vicariously liable for the acts or omissions of the second plaintiffs' servants or agents. Counsel for the defendants surmises, and I do not doubt that he is right, that that proposed amendment is not unconnected with the plea of express malice.

e The plaintiffs also wish to amend the defence to counterclaim to plead certain specific provisions of Greek law which they say would provide them with a defence similar, although not in all respects identical, to the English defence of qualified privilege. In order to establish the defence in Greek law it would be necessary for them to show that they were, at the time of publication, in a state of 'justified indignation'.

f That is an outline of the amendments sought. There are thus two amendments to the statement of claim and two to the reply and defence to counterclaim. They were all allowed by Tucker J. I leave aside the other amendments which were unopposed before Tucker J and which are not therefore the subject of any appeal to this court. I will take the amendments in order, but before doing so it may be as well to deal first with the question of law raised in the appeal.

g Counsel for the defendants submits that the issues decided at the trial should be treated as binding between the parties, even though the trial was in the end inconclusive. He was unable to cite any direct authority in support of that proposition other than the decision of the Court of Appeal in Fidelitas Shipping Co Ltd v V/O Exportchleb [1965] 2 All ER 4, [1966] 1 QB 630, which does not, for the reasons which I shall mention later, throw much light on the present problem. Counsel for the defendants says that he must in any event be right in principle. Interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium applies, he says,

h as much to issues decided in the course of litigation as it does to the final outcome. Thus if there had been a preliminary issue in this case which had been decided one way or the other nobody would suggest that it should be relitigated just because the judge has ordered a retrial. He says that the same must apply to issues decided by the judge himself in the course of the trial. Those decisions are unaffected by the fact that the jury subsequently failed to agree.

i Counsel for the plaintiffs on the other hand submits that the trial starts again de novo. That means what it says. Existing issues can be abandoned and fresh issues can be raised. Where the same issue arises in both trials, the judge at the second trial should not be hampered by any decision at the first trial. He should be free to decide the issue for himself.

j In Roe v R A Naylor Ltd (1918) 87 LJKB 958 the facts were that the plaintiff, a builder, bought some timber from a traveller employed by the defendants, a firm of timber merchants. The 'sold' note bore a printed clause in very small print saying: 'Goods are sold subject to their being on hand and at liberty when the order reaches the head office.' The plaintiff, who was very short-sighted, was unable to read the condition (so small was the print) even with his glasses on. Some of the goods were not in stock and were not therefore delivered. The plaintiff brought an action for non-delivery. The county court judge decided in favour of the plaintiff. The Court of Appeal then ordered a retrial. At the retrial the county court judge (it is not clear whether or not it was the same judge) again decided in favour of the plaintiff. There was an unsuccessful appeal to the Divisional Court, and thence to the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. In the course of giving his judgment Swinfen Eady MR said (at 963):

'Counsel for the appellants sought to rely upon some finding of the Judge in the first trial of the action. In my opinion, he is not entitled to do that. This action was sent for a new trial, and the second trial superseded the first, and any finding in the first action was got rid of when the action was sent for a new trial.'

I need not I think refer to Venn v Tedesco [1926] 2 KB 227, another case relied on by counsel for the plaintiffs. It was a decision of McCardie J. All I need say is that there had in that case been a trial before Lord Hewart CJ and a special jury. Although it does not appear from the report I would suspect that there, as here, the jury disagreed. There was then an order for a retrial. McCardie J held that the fact that the defendants had at the first trial abandoned a certain defence which was available to them under the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 did not preclude them from raising the same point at the subsequent trial. He described it as a hearing de novo.

Finally counsel for the plaintiffs referred to a relatively recent decision of this court in Egger v Viscount Chelmsford [1964] 3 All ER 406, [1965] 1 QB 248, another libel case. The defence was one of qualified privilege. There, as here, the jury disagreed, and there was a retrial. At the first trial the judge had ruled that the occasion was privileged. It does not seem to have occurred to Lord Denning MR or any of the counsel in the case, who were very experienced in matters of this kind, that the ruling at the first trial might be binding at the second trial (see [1964] 3 All ER 406 at 408, [1965] 1 QB 248 at 258). In the present case the judge said:

'My view is this. It makes no difference whether the retrial takes place as a result of a ruling of the Court of Appeal or because the jury has failed to agree. An order or ruling made, whether in interlocutory proceedings or in the course of proceedings at trial, which is a final decision may be described as res judicata. But if it is raised in proceedings which have come to no final conclusion it is not res judicata. It is as if it were "writ in water". In any event, I see no reason why a party should not reamend their pleadings to circumvent the effect of such a ruling, whether res judicata or not. The retrial is a new trial. It is wholly independent of the first. The parties are not fettered by anything that took place in the previous proceedings. I do not agree that Kenneth Jones J's rulings are res judicata. In my judgment they are not.'

I agree with the view there expressed by the judge, and I find it difficult to improve on his language. I say nothing as to any interlocutory proceedings concluded before a trial has begun, which may raise other problems. But once the trial has begun any rulings given by the judge in the course of the trial and any issues decided by him lapse when the trial itself lapses. I accept of course the importance of the twin principles on which counsel for the defendants relies: that there should be an end to litigation and that no man should be vexed more than once in relation to the same cause of action. But I find it difficult to apply those principles to a ruling given or an issue decided in the course of a trial when ex hypothesi a second trial is called for.

In Fidelitas Shipping Co Ltd v V/O Exportchleb [1965] 2 All ER 4 at 10, [1966] 1 QB 630 at 642, on which counsel for the defendants particularly relied, Diplock LJ said that an issue decided between the parties in any proceedings (in that case the proceedings were arbitration proceedings) will bind in subsequent proceedings, and, a fortiori, in the same proceedings. That passage must now be read in the light of the comments in Carl-Zeiss-

Stiftung v Rayner & Keeler Ltd (No 2) [1966] 2 All ER 536 at 565–566, 573, [1967] 1 AC 853 at 935, 947 per Lord Guest and Lord Upjohn.

In any event, the difficulty of counsel for the defendants in the present case is more fundamental. There are no relevant 'proceedings'. The effect of the jury's disagreement, followed by the order for a retrial, means that the proceedings have to start all over again. It is as if they had never been. I would therefore reject the argument of counsel for the defendants on the point of law and decide it in the same way as the judge.

I now turn to the argument that the judge erred in the exercise of his discretion. I have already read the unamended version of para 4 of the statement of claim. The plaintiffs now wish to amend that paragraph so as to read as follows:

'The said words meant and were understood to mean, in their natural and ordinary meaning, that the Plaintiffs and each of them had set up their newspaper Ethnos with a Soviet subsidy, that their newspaper was losing circulation and incurring losses which were being met by Russia, and that the Plaintiffs' newspaper was not an independent Greek newspaper because the Plaintiffs were in the pay of the Russians.'

The difference, broadly speaking, between the original plea and the proposed amended plea is that the plaintiffs wish to drop the reference to the newspaper being the 'mouthpiece' of the Russian propaganda machine. They wish to make clear that the sting of the libel consists solely in the allegation of a Russian subsidy.

Counsel for the defendants opposes the amendment. He says that there is no point in it, and if there is a point he does not like it. He fears the Greeks et dona ferentis. He refers to a sentence in the skeleton argument of counsel for the plaintiffs where it is said that one of the purposes of the amendment is to limit the extent to which the defendants are able to take an unfair advantage of the meaning originally pleaded.

That sentence reflects what is said in an affidavit sworn by Mr Martin Kramer, a partner in the firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiffs. He says:

'... The Plaintiffs contend that the existing paragraph means that the Plaintiffs and each of them were publishing Ethnos with a subsidy from the Soviet Union and that therefore they were not part of a free press but rather the paid mouthpiece of a Communist and totalitarian state's propaganda machine. It is the Defendants' contention that the Plaintiffs' complaint was simply that Ethnos was a Soviet mouthpiece, and it is this which the Defendants say they can justify. It is the Plaintiffs' case that the Defendants' contention involves taking the word "mouthpiece" out of context, and that the allegation of Soviet subsidy is all important. The Plaintiffs now wish to amend their pleading in order to make even clearer the nature of their own complaint and to limit the extent to which the Defendants are able to take what the Plaintiffs regard as an unfair advantage of the original appearance of the word "mouthpiece" in the pleaded meaning in the Statement of Claim. (Mr Kramer's emphasis.)'

Finally counsel for the defendants stresses, as he stresses in relation to all the proposed amendments, that it comes at a very late stage indeed in these proceedings: five years after the original pleading. He relies on what was said by Lord Denning MR in another libel case, Associated Leisure Ltd v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1970] 2 All ER 754 at 758, [1970] 2 QB 450 at 456. That passage is as follows:

'... when the defendant seeks to plead justification at a late stage, his conduct will be closely enquired into. The court will expect him to have shown due diligence in making his enquiries and investigations. The court may well refuse him application if he has been guilty of delay or not made proper enquiries earlier.'

Counsel for the plaintiffs says in answer that, since there is to be a retrial, there could be no objection to each side taking the opportunity to put its tackle in order before the retrial starts. The judge, as I have said, concentrated mainly on the point of law, but he also explained his approach to the exercise of his discretion. What he said about that was as follows:

'The defendants are unable to point to any specific prejudice which could not be overcome by an order for costs. Of course the plaintiffs have in mind some advantage to themselves in making these reamendments and there must be a corresponding disadvantage to the defendants. In that sense the defendants' case is prejudiced but it is not unfairly prejudiced. I look to see if there is any unfair or real prejudice. The defendants have not suggested that there would be. Of course they say the application is late but it has not been suggested that they will be unable to call specific evidence as a result of this, or that they will be handicapped in the calling of witnesses or that witnesses have died or are unavailable. If they had done so I would have been influenced by it.'

On that approach the judge granted the leave to reamend para 4.

Once again I find myself in complete agreement with the judge. He asked himself the right questions in relation to this late application to amend. His approach is in line with the decision of this court in Associated Leisure Ltd v Associated Newspapers Ltd, and in particular with a passage from the judgment of Edmund Davies LJ which I should read ([1970] 2 All ER 754 at 758-759, [1970] 2 QB 450 at 457):

'The defendants rightly accept that by the words complained of here they make grave charges. They also accept that their application for leave drastically to amend their defence is very belatedly made. So it is. Even so, should it be granted? The all-embracing principle applicable to such a case as the present was enunciated by Bowen LJ in Cropper v Smith (1884) 26 Ch D 700 at 710-711 in classic words: "... I know of no kind of error or mistake which, if not fraudulent or intended to overreach, the Court ought not to correct, if it can be done without injustice to the other party. Courts do not exist for the sake of discipline, but for the sake of deciding matters in controversy, and I do not regard such amendment as a matter of favour or grace ... It seems to me that as soon as it appears that the way in which a party has framed his case will not lead to a decision of the real matter in controversy, it is as much a matter of right on his part to have it corrected, if it can be done without injustice, as anything else in the case is a matter of right." To that approach all other considerations must be subordinate.'

For my part I would regard the proposed amendment as falling within the all-embracing principles enunciated by Bowen LJ in Cropper v Smith. Like the judge I would therefore allow the amendment to para 4.

I come now to the proposed amendment to para 7. The original pleading was that the natural and probable consequence of the original publication was that there would be republication by various newspapers in Greece. The pleading was put in that way in reliance on a passage which appears in Gatley on Libel and Slander (8th edn, 1981) p 118, para 267(ii). The plaintiffs now wish to strengthen their pleading by adding that the consequence was not only natural and probable but inevitable, and, indeed, intended. As to the inevitability of the consequence, it seems to me that that was already covered by further and better particulars of the pleading, which were given as long ago as November 1982. As to intention, counsel for the defendants submits that this is the first time that any issue has been raised as to the defendants' state of mind. He says that the evidence at the trial was uncontroversial on that point, and in the light of that uncontroversial evidence the proposed amended plea must fail. It would be impossible for the jury at the retrial to find that the defendants had intended republication. He relies in particular on the fact that the Economist Foreign Report is supplied to subscribers only and expressly states that the information contained in the report is confidential and not for dissemination.

a Counsel for the defendants also relies, in relation to the amendment to para 7, on a finding which the judge made in the course of the trial which is now, he says, res judicata. The judge said:

b 'In all the circumstances it seems to me to be impossible to hold other than that the republication in any other newspaper was the voluntary act of a free agent, namely the editor of that paper, over whom the defendants had no control and for whose acts they were not answerable, and therefore not something for which the defendants should be held liable.'

He says that that gives rise to a classic instance of issue estoppel. That is the point of law with which I have already dealt in the course of this judgment. I say no more about it now. In my judgment it does not bind the plaintiffs at the retrial.

c Counsel for the plaintiffs, on the other hand, argues that the fact that the information is stated in the Economist Foreign Report to be confidential is not in itself conclusive. It may of course be, as he would accept, that the amended plea will not succeed. It may be that it is unlikely to succeed. But that is not for us to say. Unless it is certain to fail the likelihood of the amended pleading succeeding is not a ground for refusing the amendment. The judge has found that the defendants will suffer no relevant prejudice as a result of the amendment to para 7. I can see no basis on which this court could d interfere with the judge's discretion in that respect.

Turning then to the third proposed amendment in the reply and defence to counterclaim, the plaintiffs now wish to plead that Mr Bobolas is not vicariously liable for the acts or omissions of the second plaintiffs' servants or agents. In the original pleading the plaintiffs had admitted that Mr Bobolas was responsible for the publication e of the newspaper. Counsel for the defendants submits that that could only be on the basis of respondeat superior. Now it is to be said that he is not liable on the basis of respondeat superior, which contradicts the original pleading. Furthermore, the proposed amendment is, says counsel for the defendants, inconsistent with paras 4 and 6 of the reply and defence to counterclaim, in which it is expressly admitted that Mr Bobolas published the words complained of.

f I can see no necessary inconsistency. As counsel for the plaintiffs pointed out, two or more persons may take part in the publication of a defamatory statement. It does not follow that each is vicariously liable for the other so as to infect him with that other's malice, if proved. Of course the plea that Mr Bobolas is not vicariously responsible for the malice, if any, of the second plaintiffs' employees, and, in particular, Mr Leonardos, may, like the other amended pleas now put forward, fail on the facts. But that is another matter. I see no reason why the point should not be pleaded. So, like the judge, I would g allow that amendment too.

h Finally, there is the question of Greek law. The judge at the trial held that the plaintiffs could not rely on a special defence of what I will call qualified privilege in Greek law because it had not been properly pleaded. Counsel for the defendants did not rely on any issue estoppel in that connection, but he says that if the Greek defence is to be raised, then the plaintiffs must show that it is in some way different from the English defence of qualified privilege. If it is the same, the plaintiffs do not need the amendment: it is otiose. If, on the other hand, the Greek defence goes beyond the English defence, in other words if it is more favourable to the plaintiffs, then it is far too late to allow the amendment now. No explanation has been given why the Greek law was not fully pleaded in the first place. If the amendment is allowed it will inevitably increase the length of the trial and add to the costs, since the two experts in Greek law unfortunately j speak no English. Anyone who has any experience of examining or cross-examining experts through an interpreter will appreciate the difficulty.

I have some sympathy with the argument of counsel for the defendants' on this amendment, and perhaps even more sympathy, as had Tucker J, with the judge who will preside at the retrial. I am happy to think that it is more likely to be him than me. Be that as it may, I can see no ground for refusing the amendment. One of the consequences of the jury failing to agree, and the only beneficial consequence, is that it has enabled the parties to get their tackle in order. One would hope that that would in general, as it should, result in a saving of time and expense at the retrial. Issues which are no longer critical can and should be dropped. I would earnestly hope that the parties would see it in that light and take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the order for a retrial. But, if the plaintiffs wish to raise a new issue which may lengthen the retrial, I cannot see how in justice we can prevent it. Counsel for the defendants submits that the Greek defence remains chimerical. I am not persuaded that it is. I do not of course decide that it will necessarily add anything to the English defence of qualified privilege, but I think it may, and that is enough to allow the amendment. a

So I would allow the amendment in relation to Greek law, although I do so with much more reluctance than in the case of the other amendments sought.

In the result I would allow all the amendments. I would add that even if I had been minded to disagree with the judge I can see no possible ground in this case on which we could have interfered with the exercise of his discretion. On those grounds, both on the point of law and on the point of discretion, I would dismiss this appeal. b

BALCOMBE LJ. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. On the question of law I am satisfied that, as a matter of principle, the rulings made by a judge in the course of a trial where no decision is reached cannot be binding at the retrial, whether by way of issue estoppel or otherwise. I am not surprised that such authority as exists (Lloyd LJ has referred to Roe v R A Naylor Ltd (1918) 87 LJKB 958, Venn v Tedesco [1926] 2 KB 227 and Egger v Viscount Chelmsford [1964] 3 All ER 406, [1965] 1 QB 248, supports this view. It accords with what I understand to be the principle in the case of a criminal trial where the jury disagrees and there is a retrial. c

On the question about the specific amendments, it is sufficient for me to say that the judge was fully entitled, in the exercise of his discretion, to allow these amendments. On the well-known principles by which an appellate court acts in the case of the exercise of judicial discretion at first instance, there are no grounds on which we could interfere with this decision. d

June 1986 allowing an appeal by the defendants, Herdmans Ltd, against the decision of O'Donnell LJ on 31 January 1986 dismissing their appeal against the refusal by Master Wilson on 13 January 1986 of their application for an order that the Department of Health and Social Services produce certain medical records in its possession relating to an application by the plaintiff for industrial disablement benefit. The defendants sought to use the documents in an action brought against them by the plaintiff by writ dated 28 January 1983 for damages for personal injury, loss and damage arising out of byssinosis contracted by the plaintiff as the result of the defendants' negligence and breach of statutory duty. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Mackay.

James McNulty QC and Dermot Fee (both of the Northern Ireland Bar) for the plaintiff.
Brian Kerr QC and Norman Lockie (both of the Northern Ireland Bar) for the defendants.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

9 July. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Mackay. I agree with it and for the reasons he gives I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD ELWYN-JONES. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Mackay. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Mackay. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, this is an appeal from Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland with leave of that court against an order that the Department of Health and Social Services produce the records of the decision given on 6 July 1982 of the pneumoconiosis medical board on the application of the appellant plaintiff to be held entitled to payment of industrial disablement benefit and of the decision given on 4 March 1983 by the medical appeal tribunal which heard an appeal from the decision of the board. The decision appealed against is an important one since it marks a change in the practice in Northern Ireland in relation to the granting of such orders.

The plaintiff claims to have contracted byssinosis by reason of exposure to excessive flax dust in the course of her employment between 1950 and 1961 in the factory of the respondent defendants. She claims that as a result she has severe respiratory impairment with considerable consequences for her working ability and her social and domestic activities. She claims that the defendants were negligent and in breach of their statutory duty under the Factories Act (Northern Ireland) 1938. The defendants deny liability. One of the major issues in the action is whether the plaintiff's chest condition is properly to be regarded as flax byssinosis. The Court of Appeal describe the background to the case as follows:

'In the diagnosis of flax byssinosis the history given by the patient is of peculiar importance. The disease is brought on by inhalation of excessive amounts of flax dust. The aetiology is obscure, but it is accepted that a pulmonary condition can be attributed to a reaction to the components of such dust when inhaled in sufficient quantities. That condition can be very difficult to distinguish clinically from other chest conditions which have no connection with exposure to dust. We were a informed by counsel, and this corresponds with our own experience of such cases, that the distinguishing features for which a medical examiner looks to support a diagnosis of byssinosis are a combination of factors, in which major importance may be attributed to the date of onset of symptoms after first exposure, the day of the working week on which symptoms are first present to a significant degree (the so-called "Monday syndrome"), the progression of symptoms to other days of the week and the extent of remission in the evenings, at weekends and in holiday periods. In his grounding affidavit sworn in support of the second application, Mr F J Irvine, partner in the defendant's solicitors, states: "My experience in such litigation has revealed that an analysis of the history of symptoms and complaints made by the Plaintiff is crucial to the diagnosis of flax byssinosis." This averment was not challenged by the plaintiff's counsel, and it accords with our own experience that in cases where the diagnosis is contested the history given by a plaintiff at different times is the subject of minute examination. The use which is made of the previous history at the trial of such cases accordingly goes beyond the mere testing of the plaintiff's credit. It was common case that the plaintiff made an application to the Department of Health and Social Services for industrial disablement benefit. In order to do so she would have had to complete Form BL 100 (Pn), setting out certain personal details and her working history. The normal procedure then was that the department would send Form BL 77 (FB) to the defendant for completion and return, to give the department verification of the [plaintiff's] periods of employment with the defendant and the work which she did in that employment. The plaintiff was examined by the pneumoconiosis medical board, consisting of two respiratory physicians, who carried out a clinical examination and took a history from her. Their practice after concluding their examination and forming their opinion is to complete Form BL 180 (B), of which a sample from another case was put in evidence. The section containing the history contains the following instruction to the examiner: "The statement should record, as nearly as possible in the claimant's own words, what he has to say about his present illness and how it developed, and should be read to him for agreement and signature below." There appears a space for the claimant's signature at the bottom of the section of the form. The members of the board set out their decision on the diagnosis of byssinosis, and add in the next section a statement of findings "ON ALL QUESTIONS OF FACT MATERIAL TO THE DECISION ON DIAGNOSIS". A claimant whose claim has been refused by the board has the right of appeal to the medical appeal tribunal composed of two respiratory physicians and a lawyer as chairman. These physicians examine the claimant again and consider the material contained in Form B. 1. 180(B) completed by the board, together with any material submitted on behalf of the claimant, which may include a medical report or medical reports obtained to support the claim. Their practice is to take a fresh history from the claimant and record it. The tribunal then comes to a conclusion, and records it on Form BL 255 (C). This form, a sample of which was produced in evidence, contains the tribunal's findings and conclusion in some detail. The sample before us contains an extract from a medical report obtained from a respiratory physician and submitted on the claimant's behalf. In some cases that report may be one which the claimant's solicitor has obtained for the purpose of the claim brought against the employer. [Counsel] for the defendant conceded that if the tribunal's decision on Form BL 255 (C) is to be discovered some editing would need to be done in order to remove any extracts from such a report, and possibly also discussion of its contents in the decision. He submitted, however, that this would not in practice be difficult to do.'

The plaintiff's solicitors had obtained copies of these forms from the Department of Health and Social Services and the defendants made an application under RSC (Northern Ireland) (Revision) 1980, SI 1980/346, Ord 24, r 5 seeking their discovery. This was resisted on the ground of legal professional privilege and the Court of Appeal, affirming the judge (Kelly J), upheld the claim and refused to order discovery. No appeal is taken to this House against that decision. a

This appeal is concerned with a summons brought under s 32(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 for production of the originals of these documents by the Department of Health and Social Services. The defendants' application for such an order, which was opposed by the plaintiff although not by the department, had been refused both by the master and by the judge (O'Donnell LJ). In refusing the order, the judge had given his reasons orally but no full record of them exists. There were some slight differences of recollection between counsel for the parties before your Lordships as to precisely what the judge had said. It seems clear, however, that he refused the order by an exercise of his discretion in accordance with the views expressed by himself (O'Donnell J) in McClelland v Clyde Fuel Systems Ltd [1973] NI 66. Counsel for the party applying for the order in that case had argued that s 32 of the 1970 Act had made no difference to the law in Northern Ireland and that the principles on which the discretion of the court should be exercised should be the same as those previously applied. The judge, dealing with this matter, said (see NIJB, February 1973, p 6): b

'Although I consider that the Act of 1970 did intend to make a change in the existing law, I consider that in exercising its discretion a court should have regard to the earlier decisions dealing with the production of medical records and notes.' c

It appears from these earlier decisions that the power to make an order which had the effect of securing production of such documents was regarded as closely circumscribed and a very strong case had to be made out that it was impossible or impracticable for the party seeking the order to conduct his case without seeing the documents. Accordingly, it was a test on these lines that the judge applied in considering whether he should exercise his discretion to make an order in the present case. d

Before the passing of the 1970 Act a party who wished to have access to medical records was obliged to make an application to the court to stay further proceedings in the action under s 27 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act (Ireland) 1877 until the other party made the records available. The medical records would normally not be in the custody of that other party to the action but this was the only method available to force that party to give consent for the production of these records to the party applying for the stay. Section 27(5) enabled the High Court and the Court of Appeal to stay proceedings in any cause or matter 'so far as may be necessary for the purposes of justice'. There was, at that time, no power to make an order at any stage before trial for disclosure or production against anyone who was not a party to the proceedings and it was obviously a strong step for the court to stay an action brought by a plaintiff so that the defendant could obtain production of medical records not in the plaintiff's possession. No doubt these circumstances along with the wording of the statutory provision on which the procedure was founded led the court to regard the power to stay as closely circumscribed in the manner that I have mentioned. e

A party to an action could then and still can obtain production to the court at the trial by a third party of a document relevant to the action by a subpoena duces tecum. The issue of such a subpoena is an administrative act at the instance of the party seeking the document and if the third party had any reason to dispute the validity of the subpoena he had an opportunity to do so by applying to the court to set it aside. f

The 1970 Act introduced in Northern Ireland, as it did in England and Wales, new provisions in this respect¹. Section 32, which is the relevant provision in this appeal is, so far as relevant, in these terms: g a '(1) On the application, in accordance with rules of court, of a party to any proceedings in which a claim in respect of personal injuries to a person or in respect of a person's death is made, the High Court shall, in such circumstances as may be specified in the rules, have power to order a person who is not a party to the proceedings and who appears to the court to be likely to have or to have had in his possession, custody or power any documents which are relevant to an issue arising out of that claim—(a) to disclose whether those documents are in his possession, custody or power; and (b) to produce to the applicant such of those documents as are in his possession, custody or power . . .'

b Section 33 provided that the power to make rules of court should include power to make rules of court as to the circumstances in which an order could be made under s 32. At the time with which this appeal is concerned the relevant rules of court were in Ord 24 of RSC (Northern Ireland) (Revision) 1980. That order contains a number of rules relating to discovery and inspection of documents. Rule 1 provides for discovery between parties to a cause or matter and rr 2 to 5 are related to that subject. Rule 6 by para (2) and its later paragraphs regulates applications for an order under s 32 of the Act and provides that they shall be made by summons which must be served personally on the person against whom the order is sought and on every party to the proceedings other than the applicant. Rule 6(6) provides so far as relevant as follows:

c 'No person shall be compelled by virtue of such an order to produce any documents which he could not be compelled to produce . . . (b) in the case of a summons under paragraph (2), if he had been served with a writ of subpoena duces tecum to produce the documents at the trial.'

d Rule 6(8) provides:

'For the purposes of rules 9 and 10 an application for an order under the said section 31 or 32(1) shall be treated as a cause or matter between the applicant and the person against whom the order is sought.'

Rule 7 provides:

e 'On the hearing of an application for an order under rule 1, the court . . . shall in any case refuse to make such an order if and so far as it is of opinion that discovery is not necessary either for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs.'

Rule 8 provides:

f 'A party who has served a list of documents on any other party, in compliance with an order under rule 1, must allow the other party to inspect the documents referred to in the list . . . and, accordingly, he must when he serves the list on the other party also serve on him a notice stating a time within seven days after the service thereof at which the said documents may be inspected at a place specified in the notice.'

g Rule 9 provides:

'(1) Any party to a cause or matter shall be entitled at any time to serve a notice on any other party in whose pleadings or affidavits reference is made to any document requiring him to produce that document for the inspection of the party giving the notice . . .'

h and then makes a provision in para (2) on the same lines as the concluding part of r 8. Rule 10 provides:

'(1) If a party who is required by rule 8 to serve such notice as is therein mentioned or who is served with a notice under rule 9(1)—(a) fails to serve a notice under rule 8 or, as the case may be, rule 9(2), or (b) objects to produce any document for inspection, or (c) offers inspection at a time or place such that, in the opinion of the court, it is unreasonable to offer inspection then or, as the case may be, there, then subject to rule 12(1), the court may, on the application of the party entitled to inspection, make an order for production of the documents in question for inspection . . .'

Rule 11 provides:

'At any stage of the proceedings in any cause or matter the court may, subject to rule 12(1), order any party to produce to the court any document in his possession, custody or power relating to any matter in question in the cause or matter and the court may deal with the document when produced in such manner as it thinks fit.'

Rule 12(1) provides:

'No order for the production of any documents for inspection or to the court shall be made under any of the foregoing rules unless the court is of opinion that the order is necessary either for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs.'

The provisions of rr 7 and 12 appear to be the first provisions in statute or rules of court preventing the court in Northern Ireland from making orders for discovery or related matters unless the court is of opinion that the order is necessary either for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs. A similar provision had been introduced in England and Wales by r 13 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1 November 1893 (see now RSC Ord 24, r 13(1)).

From these provisions applying in Northern Ireland it is clear that the documents which may be ordered to be produced under s 32 are restricted to those relevant to an issue arising out of a claim in respect of personal injuries or death and which the holder could be compelled to produce if he had been served with a writ of subpoena duces tecum to produce them at the trial. The provision of r 6(6) on this point was obviously not brought to the attention of the Court of Appeal in the present case since they were a little less certain than Lord Diplock had been in McIvor v Southern Health and Social Services Board [1978] 2 All ER 625 at 628, [1978] 1 WLR 757 at 761 that discovery is confined under s 32 to 'those documents of which production could ultimately be obtained at the trial on subpoena duces tecum'.

It was submitted to your Lordships, although this had not been submitted to the Court of Appeal, that r 12, which I have quoted above, applied to orders under s 32 and that in this respect r 12 was part of the specification in the rules of the circumstances in which the court should have power to make an order under that section. It was argued for the plaintiff that an order under s 32 is made under r 6 and that when r 12 refers to 'the foregoing rules' that includes r 6.

In my opinion, while r 6 provides the procedure to be followed in making an order under s 32(1) it is not correct to describe an order under s 32(1) as an order under r 6 since that rule is not the authority for the order but merely prescribes the method by which it is to be applied for and prescribes circumstances in which such an order may be made. Rule 6(8) itself describes such an order not as an order under that rule but as an order under s 32(1). If it had been intended to apply a proviso such as is found in r 12 to the subject matter dealt with in r 6 one would have expected it in r 7 which deals with an analogous proviso applied in respect of orders under r 11 but, in my opinion, the plaintiff's argument on this point is most effectively met by noting that the immediately foregoing rules to r 12, namely rr 10 and 11, empower the court to make orders for production of documents for inspection and for production of documents to the court and that these two rules conferring power to make orders do so expressly subject to r 12(1). In contradistinction to that, r 12(1) is nowhere mentioned in r 6 and the provisions of r 6(8) underline the fact that r 10 is dealing with something quite distinct from the subject matter of r 6. I conclude, for these reasons, that r 12 does not apply to restrict the power to make orders under s 32(1).

I turn now to the principal issue with which the Court of Appeal was concerned in the present case. The plaintiff argued that the principles on which the judge at first instance exercised his discretion based on the tests for the exercise propounded by him in McClelland v Clyde Fuel Systems Ltd [1973] NI 66, were correct and that it was right to use the practice developed before 1970 in exercising the discretion conferred by s 32. The defendants, on the contrary, submitted that the pre-1970 case law was not an appropriate basis on which to exercise the new discretion which had been conferred by s 32. On this the Court of Appeal expressed its conclusion thus:

'We have come to the conclusion, after careful consideration of the authorities and the implications of a change in practice, that the argument put forward for the defendant is correct. We are in agreement with the views expressed by the judge in McClelland v Clyde Fuel Systems Ltd that discovery should not be ordered under s 32 as a matter of course, and we also share his opinion about the undesirability of fishing expeditions for documents. We further consider that a party seeking discovery should have to make out a positive case, based on sufficient evidence and not on unsupported averments, that the respondent to the summons is likely to have or to have had in his possession, custody or power documents which are relevant to an issue arising out of the plaintiff's claim. That does not in our opinion mean that he must establish that he and his advisers would be unable to prepare or present his case without resort to the documents. The present application itself poses the issue. It would be possible for the defendant's medical advisers to reach their diagnosis and advice the defendant without recourse to the records. The deponent Mr Irvine has not attempted to aver and counsel has not attempted to argue to the contrary. But the records are directly relevant to the issues in the action in the way in which I earlier set out, and the ability to make proper use of their contents may well make a material difference to the outcome of the action. In these circumstances it would in our view be wrong to deny the defendant access to them, and a limitation on the discretion of the court which would have that effect would in our opinion be unjustified and contrary to the intention of Parliament, as we understand it to be, in enacting s 32(1) of the 1970 Act. We do not think that we can usefully attempt to lay down a comprehensive definition of the situations in which discovery should be ordered under s 32(1). As Lord Lowry LCJ observed in Farrell v Rotary Services Ltd [1985] 1 NIJB 55 at 61, each case must be judged on its own facts. It is sufficient for present purposes to say that in our opinion the extent of the discretion of the court was too closely circumscribed in McClelland v Clyde Fuel Systems Ltd, and that in relying on the propositions which he there laid down the judge applied a wrong principle. We consider that on a proper approach to the ambit of s 32(1) of the 1970 Act and the extent to which the discretion of the court to order discovery should be exercised, the records should in the present case be disclosed.'

In the argument before your Lordships counsel for the plaintiff clearly and fairly accepted that the documents in question were documents which the department could have been compelled to produce if they had been served with a writ of subpoena duces tecum to produce them at the trial. Although he suggested that they were confidential he agreed that such confidentiality as they had would not found a valid objection to their being produced at the trial. No doubt it was because the Department of Health and Social Services took the view that it would not be right to hand these documents over to the defendants without the consent of the plaintiff or an order of the court that this application was necessary. Accordingly, there is no dispute between the parties that the documents should be produced; the only live question is when they should be produced.

In terms of s 32(1), when an application has been made in accordance with the rules in proceedings of the kind described and in the circumstances specified in the rules, all of which prerequisites have admittedly been met in the present case, the court has a power in no way expressly fettered to order production of any documents which are relevant to an issue arising out of the claim as these documents admittedly are. Where such an unfettered power is given, in my opinion, it is to be construed as a power to be exercised when its exercise would help to achieve the purpose of the Act which is the proper administration of justice or, to put the matter negatively, in the words of Lord Diplock in McIvor v Southern Health and Social Services Board [1978] 2 All ER 625 at 627, [1978] 1 WLR 757 at 760, the court can decline to make an order—

‘if it is of opinion that the order is unnecessary or oppressive or would not be in the interests of justice or would be injurious to the public interest in some other way.’

In my opinion, there is no factor present in the circumstances of this case which would indicate that it would be just to refuse to exercise the power and there are strong factors in favour of the exercise of the power. If the case goes to trial it is obviously in the interests of justice that these documents of central importance should be available to both parties before the trial starts so that the jury may be given a fair impression of the central issues from the beginning. To force the defendants to refuse to deploy its full position in cross-examination until the stage is reached at which these documents would be available to it under a subpoena duces tecum would not be in any way in the interests of justice. Further the early production of these documents may well affect the course of the litigation before the trial. It may lead the defendants to consider a settlement of the action and it certainly will enable the medical advisers and the legal advisers of the defendants to appreciate the real issues in the case when they are preparing for trial. The interests of justice are, in my opinion, served by the promotion of settlements rather than the prolongation of litigation and by the possibility of early, complete preparation for both parties to a trial rather than by obliging one party to delay its full preparation until after the trial has actually started.

Where a third party has no objection to the disclosure or production of documents at an early stage in a litigation and no party to the action has an objection to the production of the documents that would be a valid obstacle to their production to the court under a subpoena duces tecum I cannot see any valid reason for the court refusing to make an order under s 32(1) when the prerequisites set out in the section are met. For a party to the action to oppose such an order in these circumstances appears to me to be an attempt to delay the attainment of justice rather than to promote it.

In my opinion the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case was plainly right, as were its reasons for reaching that decision. The 1970 Act is to be construed according to its own provisions and the discretion which it confers is to be exercised on considerations derived from that construction. It is not, in my opinion, sound to fetter the discretion conferred by the 1970 Act by reference to decisions taken under an entirely different statute in relation to a completely different procedure for seeking to obtain documents from persons not parties to an action by means of forcing a stay of the action until those documents were produced.

For these reasons, in my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Mackay. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would dismiss the appeal.

Company – Compulsory winding up – Unregistered company – Foreign company – Jurisdiction – Essentials to establish jurisdiction – Connection with England – Assets not within jurisdiction – Whether court having jurisdiction to wind up company – Whether company having sufficient connection with jurisdiction – Whether benefit reasonably likely to accrue to creditors from winding up.

A company which was incorporated in Liberia and was part of a group of companies controlled by a Greek family (the S family), borrowed some $13m from a bank to provide part payment for the construction of a bulk carrier. The loan was secured by a charge executed by the company over the vessel. The loan agreement was negotiated and executed in England, the agreement required performance in England, the company's only bank accounts were in London, the company gave London as the address of its directors and management decisions were taken in London either directly or through another company, S Ltd, which was an English company with which the S family were associated. The vessel flew the Greek flag and notice under the loan and mortgage agreements had to be given to a company in Greece which was also controlled by the S family. The company breached the loan agreement with the bank, which, after obtaining judgment against the company for some $14m, then presented a petition to wind up the company and applied for the appointment of a provisional liquidator. Affidavit evidence was filed that no member of the S family had ever had a beneficial interest in any shares of the company, that all the members of the S family had resigned as directors of the company, that any responsibility that S Ltd had in connection with the vessel had been brought to an end and that the vessel was being managed by a company in which the S family had no interest. On that basis the company contended that the court had no jurisdiction to wind it up because it had no assets within the jurisdiction.

Held – The presence of assets in England was not essential to confer jurisdiction on the court to wind up a foreign company. The court could wind up a foreign company if there was a sufficient connection with England and a reasonable possibility that benefit would accrue to the company's creditors from the winding up. On the facts, there was evidence indicating that the company had sufficient connection with England to confer jurisdiction, since, in particular, the loan agreement with the bank was negotiated and executed in England and required performance in England and there was evidence to suggest that the company was effectively managed in England either directly or through S Ltd and that it carried on business in England. Moreover, no other jurisdiction was more appropriate for the winding up of the company, since the connection with England was closer than with the country of incorporation, namely Liberia, or with the country where the vessel was registered, namely Greece. Furthermore, there was a reasonable possibility that the liquidator might be successful in bringing an action under ss 213^a

(1) If in the course of the winding up of a company it appears that any business of the company has been carried on with intent to defraud creditors of the company . . . or for any fraudulent purpose, the following has effect.

(2) The court, on the application of the liquidator may declare that any persons who were knowingly parties to the carrying on of the business in the manner above-mentioned are to be liable to make such contributions (if any) to the company's assets as the court thinks proper.'

and 214^b of the Insolvency Act 1986 against some members of the S family resident in England which would benefit the creditors. Accordingly, the court would grant a winding-up order and, in view of the exceptional nature of the case, in particular the fact that the vessel, the only known asset of the company, could not be located, it was appropriate to appoint a provisional liquidator, and the bank's request for the appointment of someone other than the Official Receiver would be granted (see p 145 h j, p 148 b c h to p 149 c e to j and p 150 a to f h j, post).

Petition

By a petition dated 3 February 1987 International Westminster Bank plc sought an order that Okeanos Maritime Corp, a company established under the laws of the Republic of Liberia, be wound up under the provisions of the Insolvency Act 1986, on the grounds that it was an unregistered company which was unable to pay its debts and that it was just and equitable that it should be wound up. The facts are set out in the judgment.

W A Blackburne QC and Geoffrey Vos for the petitioner.

b Section 214, so far as material, provides:

'(1) ... if in the course of the winding up of a company it appears that subsection (2) of this section applies in relation to a person who is or has been a director of the company, the court, on the application of the liquidator, may declare that that person is to be liable to make such contribution (if any) to the company's assets as the court thinks proper.

(2) This subsection applies in relation to a person if—(a) the company has gone into insolvent liquidation, (b) at some time before the commencement of the winding up of the company, that person knew or ought to have concluded that there was no reasonable prospect that the company would avoid going into insolvent liquidation, and (c) that person was a director of the company at that time ...'

PETER GIBSON J. On 3 February 1987 International Westminster Bank plc (the petitioner), a subsidiary of National Westminster Bank plc (NatWest), presented a petition for the winding up of Okeanos Maritime Corp (the company). On 5 February the petitioner, appearing by Mr Vos, applied for the appointment of a provisional liquidator. That application was made ex parte but short notice was given to the company which the next day appeared by Miss Heilbron to oppose the application. As the major question raised by the application related to the jurisdiction of the court which the company challenged, and as the company wished to put in evidence, I acceded to her submission that the application be stood over to enable such evidence to be filed. The matter has come back before me inter partes after an 11-day adjournment. I am grateful to Mr Blackburne leading Mr Vos for the petitioner and to Miss Heilbron for their helpful arguments in what is a very unusual case.

The affidavits filed on both sides reveal a number of matters to be in dispute, but the following appears to be not challenged or is supported by documentary evidence. The Samonas family is a Greek family having at its head Captain John Samonas. His wife is Maritsa Samonas and they have three sons, Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas. The family has been connected with shipping for many years. An English company, John Samonas & Sons Ltd (JSS), which on its headed paper describes itself as 'Shipbrokers and Shipagents' was incorporated in 1966. Its present directors are Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas and one other and their offices are in the City of London. Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas are all resident in England. Captain John Samonas has sworn two affidavits in which he gives a Greek address, but on 12 December 1984 a letter from Dimitri Samonas on JSS paper gives the JSS office address as Captain John Samonas's and his wife's address, and Captain John Samonas's name with a London address is given in the current London telephone directory. If he has moved to Greece it is only recently that he has done so.

There are four ships which bear names which show their apparent relationship to each other and to Captain John Samonas as they all include the name 'Samjohn'. The Samjohn Captain is the vessel relevant to the present case, being the company's only known asset. The Samonas family, through Liberian or Panamanian companies, owns the other three ships. One other company I must mention is Esperos Shipping Co SA (Esperos). This is a Panamanian company and a search of the Panamanian Companies Register shows as its board of directors Captain John Samonas, Nikolas Samonas and Mrs Maritsa Samonas. However, another Greek, Mr Vennis, is its general manager.

The company was incorporated in Liberia on 16 June 1982. Until 15 August 1986 but according to Captain John, Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas not thereafter, the board of directors of the company consisted of Captain John Samonas (who was also president), Mrs Maritsa Samonas, Christos, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas. Its share capital consists of 100 bearer shares of no par value. It has a registered office in Monrovia but its byelaws allow it to have an office or offices within or outside Liberia as the board may from time to time appoint or the business of the company may require, and they permit it to hold directors' meetings whenever and wherever the board requires.

The Samonas family has had dealings with NatWest over many years and by 1982 the Samonases were held in high regard by NatWest. On 12 May 1982 Dimitri Samonas approached Mr Haynes, the manager of the shipping section of the corporate financial Services Department of NatWest, to finance the purchase of a newly built bulk carrier. The Samonases were not willing to provide written guarantees of any sort, apparently because of fears that the Revenue might obtain access to such documents with possible fiscal consequences for them. Dimitri Samonas told Mr Haynes that the Samonases would verbally assure NatWest that they would support the vessel from other fleet income, their three ships all being unincumbered. On 4 June 1982 Mr Haynes wrote to Captain John Samonas offering a facility of $US12.8m and pointing out that NatWest had been looking for a formal undertaking by the other shipowning companies in his group but in view of the personal assurances that Captain John Samonas and his sons had given him, NatWest was not asking for a formal undertaking. The draft facility letter supplied by NatWest indicated that the loan facility was to be offered to a Liberian company to be formed.

The Samonases then changed their plans, proposing instead to purchase a new vessel, first from a Danish yard, and by April 1983 they had decided that the new vessel would be built in a Japanese yard. They sought finance for that contract from NatWest. On 23 August 1983 the company entered into a contract with a Japanese shipbuilder for the building of a 64,100 ton bulk carrier at a cost of about $18m. The address of the company for the service of notices was given as care of JSS in London. The contract was signed by Captain John Samonas for the company and the contract included a term that the company should on execution of the contract cause a letter of guarantee to be issued by Captain John Samonas to the shipbuilder, whereby he personally guaranteed payment of the whole of the purchase price. Only on 30 March 1984 were the terms and the execution of that contract approved by the board of the company and in turn by the shareholders.

Negotiations for the financing through NatWest of nearly $13.5m of the contract price continued that autumn. NatWest was content to rely simply on the Samonases' verbal assurances as Captain John Samonas was told by letter of 8 December 1983, enclosing the petitioner's draft facility letter. On 15 December in London the petitioners' offer was accepted by Dimitri Samonas signing the facility letter on behalf of the company. It was thereby agreed that the facility should be evidenced by a loan agreement and secured by a first preferred mortgage on the vessel, together with an assignment to the petitioner of all the earnings of the vessel. It was a term of the facility letter that there should be no change in the ownership and control of the company for the duration of the facility.

On 30 March 1984 there was a board meeting of the company in London. In addition to approving Captain John Samonas's action in signing the shipbuilding agreement the board resolved to borrow nearly $13.5m on the terms of the loan agreement and to execute the first preferred mortgage and assignment. The same day there was a meeting of shareholders of the company, the minutes showing Captain John Samonas, Dimitri and Nikolas Samonas as present as proxies for the shareholders. The meeting approved the board's resolutions.

Also on 30 March the loan agreement was executed in London by Captain John Samonas for the company. It provided for a loan of $13,443,872 on which interest was payable at 1% above London Interbank Offered Rate. The vessel was to be registered under the Greek flag. The company covenanted to keep the vessel fully insured and maintain current operating accounts with the St Mary's Axe branch of NatWest in London into which all the vessel's earnings were to be paid. The company agreed not to dispose of the vessel and not to permit any change in the ownership and control of the company. Again therefore, what was envisaged was that the Samonases would own and control the company. There was a provision that if, inter alia, the company failed to pay interest when it fell due, the petitioner could declare the whole of the indebtedness of the company to be immediately payable. It was provided that notice under the loan agreement should be given to the company care of Esperos in Greece with a copy to JSS in London and legal process could be served on the company at the offices of JSS. JSS was required to write a letter accepting its appointment as the agent of the company for service of process and notices.

On 2 October JSS for the company asked the St Mary's Axe branch to open sterling and dollar accounts in the company's name and on 10 December 1984 Dimitri Samonas wrote to that bank, on JSS paper but signing for the company directly, supplying the name and address of each of the directors of the company and the JSS office was given as that address. Similarly Dimitri and Captain John Samonas wrote to that branch on 25 January 1985 on JSS paper but directly for the company, requesting a transfer of some $85,000 to the petitioner, debiting the company's account. At the end of December 1984 the full loan facility was drawn down and the Samjohn Captain was delivered to the company in early January 1985.

a By the first preferred mortgage made on 25 January in accordance with Greek law the company granted the petitioner a first preferred mortgage on the Samjohn Captain. JSS was appointed the agent for the managers of the company so long as the mortgage was in force. In the event of any default the petitioner had the right to take possession of the vessel without giving notice. Notices were again to be sent to the company care of Esperos with a copy to JSS and, to comply with Greek law, an agent and representative of the company in Greece was appointed, namely the managing director of Esperos. Again, b legal process could be served on the company at JSS's office in London. That deed was executed by the company in London, as was a deed of assignment of the same date, whereby the company assigned all its earnings from the vessel to the petitioner.

In 1986 the company was adversely affected by the slump in the shipping market. The first signs of financial difficulties affecting the company appear in the late summer of 1986. The company failed to pay its insurance premium of nearly $35,000 due on 25 July c 1986. On 15 August NatWest wrote to Dimitri Samonas about the level of borrowings on the accounts of, inter alia, the company and JSS. The company's sterling account was £2,691 overdrawn while the dollar account was $62,214 overdrawn. The company was due to pay $593,584.29 interest on 30 September. Because of the company's difficulties it was agreed that only $250,000 needed be paid then, but the balance of the interest instalment, together with further interest thereon, had to be paid on or before 14 d November. The $250,000 were paid but on 1 October NatWest wrote again to Dimitri Samonas pointing out that, inter alia, the company's account was in overdraft in excess of £26,000 and requesting that no further cheques be drawn.

On 3 October 1986 Dimitri Samonas for JSS wrote to NatWest saying: 'My principals have had a very happy association with the Bank for over 20 years.' In the context, that e could not mean the company and could only mean the Samonas family. He sought by that and a letter of 14 October the consent of the bank to the company using the earnings from the Samjohn Captain to keep it trading. But no consent was forthcoming and the bank warned that failure to pay the balance of the interest instalment on 14 November would be an act of default. On 22 October Dimitri Samonas wrote pointing out that the debts of the Samjohn Captain amounted to $350,000 and on 24 October he wrote again f saying that the vessel was not producing the funds necessary to pay all the various expenses. On 10 November he wrote again saying that he had had an opportunity of consulting with the shareholders of the company. Their own resources had been exhausted. He asked that the overdue interest be capitalised. That was refused. On 13 November Dimitri Samonas wrote that there were no funds to meet the interest payment due on 14 November. There was a default the next day. On 17 November the petitioner g declared the whole of the indebtedness to be due.

The company had on 4 November through JSS in London negotiated a charterparty whereby the vessel was to be chartered to a Japanese company, Daiichi, to take coal from Newcastle, New South Wales, to Japan and a sum of $210,000 was to be paid initially into the NatWest account of the company. However on 18 November the company in breach of contract directed Daiichi to pay that sum to an account at the Midland Bank in h London. The petitioner decided to arrest the Samjohn Captain which was due to arrive at Newcastle on about 19 November. A warrant for her arrest was obtained from a New South Wales Court but through ill luck bad weather delayed the vessel coming into port. On 21 November Daiichi's Australian agents in Newcastle heard of the proposed arrest and informed Daiichi. Daiichi sought and obtained from JSS on 21 November an option to cancel the charter. All the decisions taken in the name of the company in respect of j the charterparty were taken after the Samonases had been consulted. That option was exercised on 23 November by Daiichi's London agents telephoning Christos Samonas. In the meantime the Samjohn Captain, no doubt as a consequence of JSS being made aware of the petitioner's intention to arrest the vessel, never put into Newcastle and so avoided arrest. Attempts by the petitioner to communicate with the vessel have failed or at any rate have met with no response. The vessel is not trading but is 'semi-laid up' (in the words of Mr Vennis as reported by Christos Samonas) somewhere, but where has never been revealed, off Indonesia.

The company failed to pay another insurance premium due in October and the insurers on 24 November visited the offices of JSS and were told of the financial difficulties of the vessel and that the premium could not be paid. The petitioner is having to pay substantial sums to keep the vessel insured. There were without prejudice negotiations between the company and the petitioner in December. Dimitri and Christos Samonas attended two meetings as representatives of the company, but no agreement was reached.

On 23 December proceedings were issued by the petitioner in the Commercial Court for the recovery of its debt owed by the company. On 24 December Dimitri Samonas wrote to the petitioner saying that JSS was no longer the agent for the company or the Samjohn Captain; but of course the provisions of the loan agreement and the first preferred mortgage required JSS to remain agents for service of proceedings on the company. On 7 January 1987, no notice of intention to defend having been given by the company, the petitioner recovered judgment in the sum of $14,024,095.47 plus costs. Interest continues to accrue on the debt at over $5,000 per day.

In the mean time Esperos commenced proceedings against the company in Greece claiming that it had agreed to become the agent of and to manage in Greece the Samjohn Captain for all the vessel's supplies, wages and essential needs, and that it was owed $840,000 by the company. It claimed that the ship was the only asset of the company and was subject to navigational dangers of every nature, and that the company had the intention of causing Esperos loss and according to information (which and its source were not specified) the company intended secretly to sell the ship. For these reasons Esperos sought a temporary order forbidding the transfer of the legal status of the vessel, which order was granted on 8 December by the Piraeus court.

The application before me had been supported by evidence put in by the petitioner of the insolvency of the company and of the incurring of huge costs and expenses including the accrual of interest since 14 November 1986. Those costs and expenses are estimated by the petitioner to exceed $800,000 and that sum continues to increase so long as the vessel is not given up.

The affidavit evidence put in on behalf of the company in relation to the question of jurisdiction consists of affidavits from Captain John, Dimitri, Christos and Nikolas Samonas and a short affidavit from Mr Flint, a solicitor, who states that he has the care and conduct of this matter on behalf of the company. Alone of the deponents he states that he is duly authorised to make the affidavit, although he does not state who in the company so authorised him. Mr Flint in his affidavit deposes only to a conversation with Mr Vennis. The burden of that affidavit evidence can be summarised thus: no member of the Samonas family has ever had any beneficial interest in any share in the company; all the Samonases ceased to be directors at a board meeting in Greece on 15 August 1986 when they all resigned and three Greeks with the surname Lemos were elected; by a management agreement dated 1 January 1985 the company appointed Esperos as manager of the Samjohn Captain and by a further agreement of the same date Esperos appointed JSS as its agent; JSS's agency for Esperos was terminated on 21 November 1986 by mutual agreement and all documents relating to the vessel were forwarded to Esperos; no member of the Samonas family owns any shares in or exercises any control or influence over Esperos and the management and control of the vessel are and have since 21 November 1986 been fully in the hands of Esperos, and to the best of the Samonases' knowledge there are no assets of the company within the jurisdiction.

This evidence raises to my mind as many or more questions as or than those which it purports to answer. No affidavit has been supplied by anyone claiming to be a director or officer of the company. Not even Mr Vennis has put in an affidavit, although he is said to be not only the general manager but also the sole shareholder of Esperos and although on 12 February the company's solicitors said that an affidavit would be sworn by Mr Vennis, and that despite a general strike in Greece they anticipated being in a position to serve that affidavit the following morning.

The deponents in their affidavits are noticeably coy about the identity of the shareholders, past and present, of the company, why it has never been explained and despite being asked by the petitioner's solicitors to provide answers to the question of ownership no information has been forthcoming. When Dimitri Samonas swore that he did not know by whom the shares in the company were held, in my judgment he was being less than frank, having regard to the fact that on 30 March 1984 at the shareholders' meeting he was a proxy for the shareholders and on 10 November 1986 he had told NatWest by letter that he had been consulting the shareholders of the company. If the Samonases were not the shareholders, why did they allow the negotiations with the bank for the financing of the cost of a bulk carrier to proceed on the basis that they were? The stipulation that the beneficial ownership should not change was pointless unless the Samonases, on whose verbal assurances the bank was asked to rely and did rely, were the owners. Why would Captain John Samonas have given a personal guarantee to pay the full cost of building the ship if he had no beneficial interest in the company which owned the ship? It is not a sufficient explanation to say, as he does, that the shipbuilder required it or that the company would find the money: why should he, and not the shareholders, be content to give such a huge guarantee?

Dimitri Samonas says that the Samonases resigned as directors on 15 August at a time when the company was able to pay and was paying its trade debts as they fell due. Apart from the inconsistency of this with the evidence of the failure to pay the July insurance premium, why did the directors resign then in flagrant breach of the loan agreement, providing as it did that there should be no change in the control of the company? Dimitri Samonas accepts that he continued to be involved in the affairs of the vessel, although he says only as a director of JSS as the London agent for the vessel. How were the new directors chosen? There is no evidence indeed that the new directors agreed to become directors. If they did, why is there no evidence whatsoever of any meeting by them or of any decision or act on their part?

There is no evidence as to how and why the agency of JSS was terminated in breach of the company's obligation under the first preferred mortgage apart from the statement that it was by mutual agreement with Esperos. Further, why if the agency of JSS was terminated on 21 November was Christos Samonas accepting on 23 November for the company Daiichi's exercise of the option to terminate the charterparty, and why on 24 November was JSS telling the insurance agents that the insurance premiums would not be paid? Is it really to be believed that Dimitri and Christos Samonas, in negotiating in December for the company as Christos Samonas now deposes, were acting only in their personal capacity at the request of Mr Vennis instead of acting as they had always done for the company? It was not revealed at the time that they were acting merely in their personal capacity.

In relation to Esperos, why if no Samonas owns any share in or exercises control or influence over Esperos are the only directors shown in the Panamanian Companies' Register members of the Samonas family? Captain John and Nikolas Samonas say they are non-executive directors but presumably there must be an executive director. Why, if they own no shares in the company, did they give personal guarantees as security for a guarantee of $5,000 given for Esperos by the Piraeus branch of NatWest? It is suggested by the Samonases that Mr Vennis is in control of Esperos but against that must be set evidence that in January 1987, when he was asked by that Piraeus branch to provide cash backing for that and another guarantee of £6,000, Mr Vennis said that he had to speak to London. Why on 5 February 1987, when pressed for a definite answer, did Mr Vennis say that the matter was out of his hands and that his 'boss' had told him that nothing would be decided?

There is no evidence to explain or justify the company's flagrant breach of its contractual obligations or of the steps which it has taken to avoid the arrest of the vessel.

The inevitable inference, to my mind, is that those in control of the company are deliberately seeking to keep the vessel out of the hands of the petitioner regardless of the insolvency of the company and the harm that is being done to the legitimate interests of the company's creditors. The purpose of all this may be seen from the open offer that has recently been made by the company by its solicitors: it seeks to force the petitioner to accept only $9m in total extinction of the petitioner's security and the petitioner releasing not only the company but also its present and past directors and officers. The conduct of those in control of the company seems to me to be nothing short of disgraceful.

The company's evidence, as counsel for the company was constrained to admit, was not as complete or as satisfactory as it might be. On the third day of this hearing, towards the close of her submissions, she applied for an adjournment for several days to enable further evidence to be put in to deal with the question to what extent the company had carried on business within the jurisdiction. I refused that application. It had been alleged in the petition as well as in the affidavit in support of the application for a provisional liquidator that the company had traded here, and the company has had ample time to complete its evidence. I have been indulgent in allowing evidence to be adduced in the course of this hearing and I must decide this application on the evidence that is now before me.

The first and major question is whether the court has jurisdiction to wind up the company notwithstanding that it is an overseas company. I start with the statutory provisions now to be found in Pt V of the Insolvency Act 1986 relating to the winding up of unregistered companies. The company is of course such a company. Section 221 (1) provides:

'Subject to the provisions of this Part, any unregistered company may be wound up under this Act; and all the provisions of this Act and the Companies Act about winding up apply to an unregistered company with the exceptions and additions mentioned in the following subsections.'

The provisions about winding up include s 125(1) which (so far as material) provides that the court should not refuse to make a winding-up order on the grounds only that the company's assets have been mortgaged to an amount equal to or in excess of the assets or that the company has no assets.

Section 221(5) provides:

'The circumstances in which an unregistered company may be wound up are as follows—(a) if the company is dissolved, or has ceased to carry on business, or is carrying on business only for the purpose of winding up its affairs; (b) if the company is unable to pay its debts; (c) if the court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up.'

The reader of those provisions without the benefit of judicial authority might be forgiven for thinking that the question whether for the purpose of exercising the statutory jurisdiction the court has jurisdiction to wind up an unregistered company falls to be answered by reference to the statutory conditions. In the present case what is asserted by the petitioner and is abundantly clear from the evidence is that the company is unable to pay its debts. Not only is there an unsatisfied judgment debt in excess of $14 million but it is common ground that the only known asset of the company, the vessel, is worth substantially less than that sum. On the company's own evidence of the vessel's value in November, it was worth a mere $7m. The petitioner puts the value of the Samjohn Captain somewhat higher, but even on the higher value it is clear that there is a substantial shortfall.

However, it is plain from authorities binding on me that the question of jurisdiction is not determined simply by reference to the statutory provisions and that there are what Megarry J in Re Cia Merabello San Nicholas SA [1972] 3 All ER 448 at 455, [1973] Ch 75 at 86 called the inherent requirements of jurisdiction to make a winding-up order in respect of a foreign company which have to be satisfied in addition to the statutory conditions. In that case Megarry J summarised the essentials of the relevant law relating to the existence of jurisdiction to make a winding-up order in what he called normal cases in respect of a foreign company ([1972] 3 All ER 448 at 460, [1973] Ch 75 at 91-92):

'(1) There is no need to establish that the company ever had a place of business here. (2) There is no need to establish that the company ever carried on business here, unless perhaps the petition is based on the company carrying on or having carried on business. (3) A proper connection with the jurisdiction must be established by sufficient evidence to show (a) that the company has some asset or assets within the jurisdiction, and (b) that there are one or more persons concerned in the proper distribution of the assets over whom the jurisdiction is exercisable. (4) It suffices if the assets of the company within the jurisdiction are of any nature; they need not be "commercial" assets, or assets which indicate that the company formerly carried on business here. (5) The assets need not be assets which will be distributable to creditors by the liquidator in the winding-up: it suffices if by the making of the winding-up order they will be of benefit to a creditor or creditors in some other way. (6) If it is shown that there is no reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to creditors from making the winding-up order, the jurisdiction is excluded.'

When leading counsel opened the petitioner's case to me, he, like junior counsel on the ex parte application, put it on the footing that jurisdiction was founded by the presence of assets within the jurisdiction because, he said, there were good claims against at least Dimitri, Christos and Nikolas Samonas that they had been guilty of fraudulent trading or wrongful trading within the meaning of ss 213 and 214 of the Insolvency Act 1986 which, at the suit of the liquidator, would be likely to produce a substantial sum of money by way of contributions to the company's assets. The question whether there are assets within the jurisdiction such as to give the court jurisdiction to wind up must, as counsel for the company submitted, and I accept, be determined as at the moment the petition is presented. But to my mind it is fallacious to reason that there are assets to found the jurisdiction because, if the court has jurisdiction and makes a winding-up order, assets will then arise (cf Siskina (cargo owners) v Distos Cia Naviera SA, The Siskina [1977] 3 All ER 803 at 825, [1979] AC 210 at 257).

Seeing the way the judicial wind was blowing, leading counsel for the petitioner then adroitly changed tack. He submitted that the existence of assets within the jurisdiction was not necessary to found jurisdiction. Whilst that is normally the way that both a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction and a benefit to the creditors are shown, it was not, he said, an essential requirement in every case. What was important, he submitted, was to satisfy the court of a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction. The first line of defence of counsel for the company was that the presence of assets within the jurisdiction must be shown.

Before looking at authority let me consider the rationality of that proposition. Take a case, no doubt unusual, where a foreign company is incorporated abroad but thereafter the only jurisdiction with which it has a close connection is this jurisdiction. For example, if the company has been trading here actively, incurring trade debts here, perhaps at a time when there was no prospect of paying in full the debts as they fell due, but then, fearing court proceedings a director causes all the assets of the company to be removed from the jurisdiction. In those circumstances why should not the English court have jurisdiction to wind up the company at the suit of a creditor if satisfied that there is a reasonable possibility of benefit resulting from the winding up? Why should the mere fact that the assets were removed, perhaps to a place which is not known, deprive the court of jurisdiction where there is no other jurisdiction with which the company has a closer connection? I cannot see any logical reason why the court should not have jurisdiction.

However, counsel for the company was able to rely on what was said in Banque des

Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) (in liq) v Kindersley [1950] 2 All ER 549, [1951] Ch 112. In that case a Russian bank had been dissolved in Russia in 1918. In 1932 Eve J made an order winding up the company on the basis that the bank's agent had registered the bank here in 1920. As any agency must have terminated with the company's dissolution the basis of Eve J's decision could not withstand a challenge. However, in 1949 the bank's liquidator brought an action against English defendants to recover sums alleged to be due to the bank. The defendants took out a summons to dismiss on the basis, in effect, that the bank did not exist and that the winding-up order was invalid. Harman J dismissed the summons on a ground that is not material to the present case but also held that the fact that the company had assets in this country conferred jurisdiction to make the winding-up order (see [1950] 2 All ER 105). The defendants appealed. The Court of Appeal would have differed from Harman J in respect of the ground on which he dismissed the summons but then went on to consider whether Eve J had jurisdiction to make the winding-up order on a ground other than registration. They considered whether it was a statutory condition for the exercise of jurisdiction to wind up a foreign company that it should have conducted business here and concluded that it was not. They then considered whether there was jurisdiction to wind up the bank which had been dissolved. Evershed MR said ([1950] 2 All ER 549 at 556-557, [1951] Ch 112 at 125-126):

'As a matter of general principle, our courts would not assume, and Parliament should not be taken to have intended to confer, jurisdiction over matters which naturally and properly lie within the competence of the courts of other countries. There must be assets here to administer and persons subject, or at least submitting, to the jurisdiction who are concerned or interested in the proper distribution of the assets ... The existence of assets here, the presence here of persons claiming as creditors of the plaintiff bank or said to be indebted to it, seem to constitute at least the indicia of a business in some sense formerly conducted here. Where, therefore, the circumstances exist which, on the general principle above referred to, would make the case appropriate for the exercise by our court of its winding-up jurisdiction, it would appear that the question whether the foreign corporation carried on business in this country would generally be academic unless it is also necessary to show that such business was carried on directly and from some established, or specified, place or places in this country.'

And the court went on to hold that it was not so necessary.

Counsel for the company fastens on the words 'There must be assets here to administer ...' but such words must be read in their context. Evershed MR was speaking in the context of a case where the presence of assets and creditors in this country was sufficient, as the Court of Appeal held, to confer jurisdiction on the English court. If he was attempting to lay down a universal rule then he was going beyond what was necessary for his decision.

That appears to be the way Megarry J in Re Cia Merabello San Nicholas SA [1972] 3 All ER 448, [1973] Ch 75 viewed what Evershed MR said. At the start of the passage which I have already cited he referred to the essentials as being those in normal cases. Earlier, he described as the usual essentials the presence of assets and creditors here (see [1972] 3 All ER 448 at 455, [1973] Ch 75 at 86). Again he said ([1973] Ch 75 at 88, cf [1972] 3 All ER 448 at 457):

'... a petitioner who can satisfy s 399 [of the Companies Act 1948 (the predecessor of s 221(5))] must normally go on and show that the company has assets of some sort here and that there are claimants for those assets over whom there is jurisdiction ...'

As he put it, it suffices if there are.

Megarry J was also not prepared to give the words of Evershed MR their literal a meaning that there must be assets to administer in the winding up. In the Merabello case the only asset here was a claim which under the Third Parties (Rights against Insurers) Act 1930 on a winding-up order would vest automatically in the petitioner in that case. That asset would never be administered in the liquidation. I respectfully echo Megarry J's words ([1972] 3 All ER 448 at 460, [1973] Ch 75 at 91):

b 'Words in a judgment must be construed in relation to the subject-matter of the case in question, and not as if they were Acts of Parliament.'

c Counsel for the company rightly pointed out that the ratio of the decision in Re Cia Merabello San Nicholas SA, unlike the present case, turned on the existence of an asset of the company within the jurisdiction immediately before the winding up. However, in Re Eloc Electro-Optieck and Communicatie BV [1981] 2 All ER 1111, [1982] Ch 43 Nourse J held that the court had jurisdiction to wind up a Dutch company which had no assets within the jurisdiction. In that case the Dutch company had traded in England but never had a place of business here. The petitioners were two employees whom the Dutch company dismissed. They recovered judgment against that company in 1978. The Dutch company ceased operating in 1979. On the hearing of the petition the Dutch company was not represented but in a reserved judgment Nourse J held that the court had jurisdiction to wind it up. He referred to Megarry J's summary of the essentials in a normal case and to the fact that the petitioners had applied to the Department of Employment for payment out of the Redundancy Fund but that under the statutory provisions no payment could be made until the company was wound up. He stated that there was a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the petitioner from the making of a winding-up order. He continued ([1981] 2 All ER 1111 at 1114-1115, [1982] Ch 43 at 48):

e 'The benefit would consist of assets coming into the hands of the petitioners not from the company but from an outside source which can only be tapped if an order is made. In the light of that consideration and of the facts, first, that the company did carry on business in England and Wales, second, that it employed the petitioners in that business, and, third, that the potential source of assets is directly related to that employment, there is, in my judgment, sufficient to found the jurisdiction of the court. To put it in another way, it would, in my judgment, be a lamentable state of affairs if the court's jurisdiction was excluded by the mere technicality that the assets in respect of which the reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the petitioners derived belonged not to the company but to an outside source. I think that support for this view is to be found in the fourth and fifth essentials in Megarry J's summary ([1972] 3 All ER 448 at 460, [1973] Ch 75 at 92) [and then Nourse J cited those essentials and continued:] That shows, first, that the assets can be of any nature and, second, that the consequential benefit accruing to a creditor or creditors need not be channelled through the hands of the liquidator. To my mind that confirms that the ownership of the assets by the company is not a matter of crucial importance. I must again observe that Megarry J's summary of the essentials was directed to normal cases.'

h And accordingly, he held that this was a case in which the court had jurisdiction to wind up a Dutch company.

j To my mind it is clear firstly that the assets to come into the hands of the petitioners in Re Eloc Electro-Optieck and Communicatie BV were not assets existing at the moment of presentation of the petition: they were the potential fruits of a claim that could only be made if the company was wound up. Secondly, the assets were never in any sense assets of the company. Nourse J had referred to an argument presented to him by counsel for the petitioners to the effect that there was no overriding requirement that the company should have assets within the jurisdiction and that what was important was the carrying on of business in the country (see [1981] 2 All ER 1111 at 1113, [1982] Ch 43 at 46-47).

Nourse J stated that he found it unnecessary to decide whether that proposition could be made out. But whilst he may not have decided the question whether the mere carrying on of business was enough, if I may say so with the greatest respect, the judge does seem to me to have decided that there is no universal requirement in every case that there should be assets within the jurisdiction to found the jurisdiction to wind up a foreign company. In an abnormal case like the Eloc case, the court has jurisdiction, even though there are no assets here. a

As I understand that decision therefore, it does support leading counsel's proposition for the petitioner that there need be no assets within the jurisdiction provided that there is a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction and provided that there is a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the creditors from the winding up. b

Counsel for the company submitted that Re Eloc Electro-Optieck and Communicatie was distinguishable on its facts. Of course, the facts were different. The source of the benefit was to come from a third party which had nothing to do with the Dutch company and the benefits would never accrue to the company but directly to the petitioners, but I cannot see why that should make the present case one less suitable for the court's jurisdiction. The benefit in the present case would consist of the contribution to the assets of the company to make up for losses caused by the wrongful or fraudulent trading of the company. Further, a substantial element in the fraudulent and wrongful trading claim would be the amount of interest that has continued to accrue and that is of course directly related to the petitioner's debt. Another factual difference from the Eloc case is that there the petitioners were ex-employees. But the fact that the petitioner here is a creditor relying on a debt incurred by the company under an agreement made here again does not seem to me to be a material difference. In both the Eloc case and the present case it is an important circumstance that there is said to have been the carrying on of business in this country by the company in question. c d e

Counsel for the company then said that the Eloc case was wrongly decided, firstly because it was inconsistent with Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) (in liq) v Kindersley [1950] 2 All ER 549, [1951] Ch 112. For the reasons which I have already given I do not accept that. She also said that it was wrongly decided because, for the court to have jurisdiction to wind up a foreign company with no assets here, the company has to have been trading here at the time the petition was presented. She relied by analogy on the statutory requirements for service on a foreign corporation in respect of which the ability to serve on that company at a place of business established by that company in this country has been held to be limited by the necessity to show that the company was carrying on business at the time of service. I cannot obtain any assistance from those specific statutory provisions or the authorities thereon, dealing as they do only with service. What Parliament has thought fit to provide in relation to service is likely to be governed by the necessity to bring that which has to be served to the notice of the foreign company. The question of jurisdiction seems to me to involve a wholly different concept, that is to say a sufficient connection with this country. I would add that no authority on jurisdiction has been cited to me to support the proposition of counsel for the company on this point. f g h

In the circumstances, I am prepared, consistently with the Eloc case to hold that the presence of assets in this country is not an essential condition for the court to have jurisdiction in relation to the winding up of a foreign company. In my judgment, provided a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction is shown, and there is a reasonable possibility of benefit for the creditors from the winding up, the court has jurisdiction to wind up the foreign company. i

I turn then to the question whether there is a sufficient connection with the jurisdiction. The following matters seem to me to provide such a connection. Firstly, the company incurred the debt on which the petitioner, an English company, relies under an English loan agreement negotiated and executed here and requiring performance here. Secondly, there is clear evidence that the company has carried on business in England. All the directors and officers of the company were resident in England at least until August 1986. All the negotiations for the loan from the petitioner were carried on in London, all the loan documents were executed in London and the only bank accounts of the company that are known were in London. Even as late as 18 November the company, when in breach of its contractual obligation it decided that the Daiichi freight should not be paid into the NatWest account, directed payment to an account with another London bank. Charterparties were negotiated and agreed here. In relation to the Daiichi charterparty, the petitioner's evidence, which is accepted by Dimitri Samonas, is that all the arrangements were made in London and the decisions were taken here by JSS for the company after reference to the Samonases. That shows that even in November, management decisions on the company's business were being taken in London. At least two business letters were written directly in the name of the company from JSS's offices and those offices were the address given to NatWest as the address of the directors of the company. Counsel for the company submitted that it was not sufficient for a company to trade here through agents but I do not follow this. If what was done was done in the name of and for the company I fail to see why that is not the company carrying on business here through its agents. She also referred me to the requirements that, under the loan agreement and the first preferred mortgage, notices under those documents were to be given to the company care of Esperos. She also relied on the agreements of 1 January 1985 for Esperos to be the manager and JSS to be the agent or sub-manager in respect of the Samjohn Captain. But there is no evidence that any act was done by JSS pursuant to that agreement, or that Esperos exercised any control whatever over JSS. In all their dealings with NatWest and the petitioner it was never suggested by the Samonases that JSS was merely acting as sub-managers or agents for Esperos as distinct from acting for the company. In my judgment therefore, it can be said, on the evidence that is before me, that at least until November 1986 the company has been effectively managed from London by the Samonas family and has carried on business here, either directly or through JSS. There is, I would stress, no evidence that the company has carried on business outside this country at all. The only business transacted at the one board meeting known to have taken place abroad in August 1986 was merely to accept the directors' resignations and to appoint other directors.

It is also appropriate for the court to consider whether any other jurisdiction is more appropriate for the winding up of this admittedly insolvent company. In my judgment, there is none. Counsel for the company accepts that Liberia is not a serious rival to this country for the purpose of jurisdiction. The company seems to have had nothing to do with Liberia after its incorporation. But she suggested that Greece might be a more appropriate jurisdiction. I do not accept that. Apart from the fact that the vessel flies a Greek flag and that notices under the loan agreement and first preferred mortgage are required to be sent to the company care of Esperos in Greece I cannot see on what basis Greece would be a more appropriate jurisdiction to wind up the company. In my judgment, for the reasons I have given, the company has a much closer connection with this jurisdiction.

I am therefore satisfied that, on the evidence that has been put before me, the company has a sufficiently close connection with the jurisdiction, and that there is no more appropriate jurisdiction for the winding up of the company which plainly ought to be wound up.

I turn next to the question whether there is a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to creditors from the making of a winding-up order. That such is the appropriate test appears from Re Cia Merabello San Nicholas SA [1972] 3 All ER 448, [1973] Ch 75 and Re Eloc Electro-Optiek and Communicatie BV [1981] 2 All ER 1111, [1982] Ch 43. Similarly in Re Allobrogia Steamship Corp [1978] 3 All ER 423 the company in that case had a claim of the same type as in the Merabello case and that was the asset which founded jurisdiction for the court. Slade J held that it was not necessary to show that the claim was one which was certain to succeed. It was sufficient to show that the claim had a reasonable possibility of success. a

In the present case leading counsel for the petitioner has submitted that there is a reasonable possibility of the liquidator recovering contributions to the assets of the company from members of the Samonas family under ss 213 and 214 of the Insolvency Act 1986. To my mind it is abundantly clear that those who have been in charge of the company since at least the end of October have been conducting the affairs of the company in a way that is likely to bring them within the scope of one or both of those sections, and whilst the 1986 Act does not state how much can be recovered under those sections, the additional costs and debts incurred at a time when the company should have ceased trading and given up the vessel provides a likely measure of those contributions. b

I did not understand counsel for the company to contend that ss 213 and 214 could not apply in the present case. She quarrelled about one item in the quantification of the costs and expenses incurred since November, but that is a comparatively minor matter. I recognise that the question whether the liquidator will wish to and will be able to succeed against the Samonases turns on disputed questions of fact in view of the apparent resignation of the Samonases of their directorships and the termination of JSS's agency. But I bear in mind the wide terms of those sections, for example, that for fraudulent trading someone who is knowingly a party to the fraudulent trading of the company may be liable and similarly for wrongful trading shadow directors may be held liable. On the evidence before me I would agree with leading counsel for the petitioner that there is a reasonable possibility of the liquidator succeeding in proceedings against at least Dimitri and Christos Samonases and they are resident in this country. I think it undesirable to say more on what may well have to be litigated at a later date. c

Accordingly I reach the conclusion that on the existing evidence before me there is a reasonable possibility of benefit accruing to the creditors from the winding up of the company. It seems to me therefore that the court has jurisdiction to make a winding-up order in relation to the company. d

Ought the court to exercise its power to appoint a provisional liquidator at this stage? Leading counsel for the petitioner submitted that I should because the single known asset of the company, the Samjohn Captain, is being kept out at sea and the debts of the company are thereby constantly increasing by over $5,000 per day. Further, he pointed to what was said by Esperos in the Greek proceedings, in particular that the company may be trying to sell the vessel. The provisional liquidator will, he submits, be able to exercise the wide powers now conferred on such an officer under ss 234 to 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 to obtain information to ascertain the whereabouts of the vessel and who are in control of her with a view to bringing the vessel back into responsible hands. e

This is an unusual application in that the court will normally only be looking to safeguard assets within the jurisdiction that are in jeopardy, but then this is a highly unusual case. Those in control of the company have behaved badly in flouting its contractual obligations in running up costs unnecessarily and in seeking to force the petitioner to accept far less than it is entitled to. In the meantime, the company's debts increase daily. In these special circumstances therefore it seems to me that it is appropriate to appoint a provisional liquidator. The Official Receiver would normally be appointed but because of the unusual tasks with which the provisional liquidator will be faced in seeking to recover the vessel, the petitioner has requested the appointment of Mr Houghton, a partner in Messrs Touche Ross & Co. The Official Receiver has indicated his acquiescence in such an appointment. I shall so order. f

Order accordingly. g

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

FOX, NICHOLLS LJ AND SIR DENYS BUCKLEY

15, 16, 17 OCTOBER 1986, 12 JANUARY, 25 FEBRUARY 1987

b Copyright – Infringement – Right of action – Incitement to make infringing copies – Defendants advertising and selling twin-deck tape recorders – Machines capable of being used for copying of copyright material – Defendants advertising machines in manner likely to encourage copying – Plaintiffs’ copyright material likely to be infringed – Plaintiffs bringing action alleging defendants inciting members of public to commit offence of making infringing copies – Plaintiffs seeking injunction and damages – Whether plaintiffs entitled to sue for injunction to restrain breach of criminal law – Whether plaintiffs having good cause of action – Copyright Act 1956, s 21(3).

c The first defendant manufactured twin-deck tape-recording machines which were sold by the second defendant. A tape-to-tape facility on the machines meant that they could be used to reproduce one tape directly onto another and they were advertised in a manner which was likely to encourage home taping and copying of copyright material. The plaintiffs, who were three record companies suing on behalf of themselves and other copyright owners in the music business, brought an action against the defendants seeking an injunction to restrain them from selling the machines without ensuring that the plaintiffs’ copyrights in sound recordings were not infringed by use of the machines. The plaintiffs subsequently sought to amend their statement of claim to allege that the first defendant had advertised and the second defendant had sold the machines in such a way as unlawfully to incite members of the public to commit an offence under s 21(3)^a of the Copyright Act 1956, which prohibited the making of infringing copies of a copyright work. The judge allowed the amendment, holding that the plaintiffs had an arguable case for both injunctive relief and damages arising out of the incitement. The defendants d appealed against the judge’s ruling.

e Held (Sir Denys Buckley dissenting) – A plaintiff was not entitled to sue for an injunction to restrain a breach of the criminal law unless either he was a member of a protected class for whose benefit or protection particular legislation had been passed or he had suffered damage special to him. Although a plaintiff might be entitled to an injunction if the defendant’s criminal activity infringed a property right of the plaintiff, in such a case it was the infringement of the property right that gave rise to the cause of action rather than any attempt to compel observance of the criminal law. In the absence of express statutory provision, persons other than the Attorney General acting ex officio or ex relatione had no standing to seek to enforce the criminal law by a claim in equity in the civil courts and the appropriate remedy was to bring a private prosecution. Since s 21(3) of the 1956 Act did not confer on a copyright owner a right to sue for breach of the section, the defendants’ incitement, if proved, did not confer on the plaintiffs the right to sue for an injunction and damages. It followed that the appeal would be allowed and that the amendment to the plaintiffs’ statement of claim would be disallowed (see p 159 j, p 160 a to d h j, p 161 e to p 162 b h j and p 169 h, post).

Interlocutory appeals and cross-appeal

By writ dated 16 November 1984 and an amended statement of claim the plaintiffs, CBS Songs Ltd (suing on its own behalf and on behalf of other members of Mechanical Rights a Society Ltd), EMI Records Ltd and Chrysalis Records Ltd (both suing on behalf of themselves and other members of British Phonographic Industry Ltd), sought, inter alia, an injunction against the defendants, Amstrad Consumer Electronics plc (Amstrad) and Dixons Ltd (Dixons), to restrain the defendants from parting with possession of tape recording machines with a tape-to-tape recording facility without taking such steps as were reasonably necessary to ensure that copyrights in sound recordings subsisting in the plaintiffs were not infringed. The plaintiffs also claimed damages. On 8 May 1986 b Whitford J, sitting in chambers, struck out parts of the statement of claim but gave the plaintiffs leave to amend the statement of claim to allege that the defendants had unlawfully incited members of the public to commit offences under s 21(3) of the Copyright Act 1956, and refused the defendants' applications to strike out the plaintiffs' action. The defendants appealed against the grant of leave. The plaintiffs cross-appealed against the striking out of parts of the statement of claim. The facts are set out in the c judgment of Nicholls LJ.

Michael Fysh for Dixons.

25 February. The following judgments were delivered.

e NICHOLLS LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Fox LJ). The Copyright Act 1956 creates rights of property and for their protection confers civil remedies and imposes criminal liabilities. The question arising on this appeal is whether copyright owners who, in respect of the acts complained of, cannot bring themselves within the scope of any of the civil remedies expressly conferred by the statute none the less have a cause of action in equity for the grant of an injunction to restrain defendants from carrying out acts which constitute criminal offences and which damage their copyrights, f this equitable jurisdiction being supplemented by the jurisdiction under Lord Cairns's Act (the Chancery Amendment Act 1858) to award damages in addition to or in lieu of an injunction.

Before the court are two appeals and a cross-appeal from an order of Whitford J of 8 May 1986. They represent the latest stage in what the judge aptly described as the battle g between Amstrad Consumer Electronics plc (Amstrad), the well-known manufacturer of electronics equipment, and those concerned to protect the interests of manufacturers and suppliers of tapes, with Dixons Ltd (Dixons), the well-known retailer of electronics equipment reluctantly tied, as its counsel put it, to Amstrad's coat tails.

h In 1984 Amstrad introduced onto the market three new models of tape-to-tape recording machines, designated TS39, TS87 and SM104. A feature of these models is that they have two cassette decks from which it is possible to reproduce from one tape directly onto another, at twice the normal playback speed. The machines, and this facility, were advertised on television and in the press in terms likely to encourage home copying of favourite tapes. Amstrad sells only to the trade, but in the advertisements Dixons was named as one of the well-known retailers from whom the Amstrad tape decks could be purchased.

i British Phonographic Industry Ltd (BPI) is a trade association whose members comprise record companies making most of the lawful records sold in this country. BPI wrote to Amstrad, and also to its principal trade outlets, asserting that by its advertisements Amstrad was encouraging the public to break the law by inviting them to acquire machines with the double-headed facility for the purpose of copying from tapes containing copyright works.

The upshot was two actions, in the course of which considerable procedural complications, not to say convolutions, have come about. Shorn of all matters not essential to the present appeals, the history is this. The first action, which I shall call 'the declaratory action', was brought by Amstrad against BPI. The writ was issued on 30 October 1984. The only substantive relief claimed was a declaration to the effect that by advertising and offering for sale and selling six specified models of audio systems, including the three I have mentioned, Amstrad had not acted unlawfully 'as alleged in that certain letter from the Defendants' solicitors to the plaintiffs' solicitors dated 26th October 1984 or at all'.

On 16 November 1984 the writ in the present action, which I shall call 'the second action', was issued by CBS Songs Ltd, EMI Records Ltd and Chrysalis Records Ltd. The first plaintiff was expressed to be suing on behalf of itself and of the other members of Mechanical Rights Society Ltd (MRS), and the second and third plaintiffs were expressed to be suing on their behalf and on behalf of all the other members of BPI. Amstrad is the first defendant and Dixons the second defendant.

In the statement of claim in the second action it is alleged that nearly all sound recordings available in this country are copyright and that nearly all the copyrights, or the exclusive licences under such copyrights, to reproduce sound recordings are owned by members of BPI, and also that nearly all the mechanical rights in musical works in this country are owned by or exclusively licensed to the members of the MRS, who comprise nearly all the publishers of music in this country. Having referred to the three new Amstrad models and their introduction onto the market, the statement of claim continues with an allegation that the primary purpose for which that equipment was designed was that the public would buy and use it to make copies of commercially available prerecorded tapes and gramophone discs. It is also alleged that machines purchased will be so used, in infringement of the copyrights in the tapes and recordings, and to the damage of the plaintiffs and those whom they represent, and that in practice, for reasons which are self-evident, the plaintiffs and those whom they represent are unable to stop such use or obtain legal redress for such infringements by individual members of the public.

The various alleged causes of action put forward are these: that Amstrad and Dixons have incited others to infringe copyright; that they have authorised others to infringe copyright; that they are liable, as accessories before the event or as joint tortfeasors, to the infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright; and that the equipment is being supplied in breach of a common law duty of care owed to copyright owners, and also in breach of an equitable duty of care not to allow goods likely to be used for infringement to pass out of Amstrad's and Dixons' hands. The principal relief claimed is an injunction restraining the defendants from parting with possession of the three models complained of—

'without taking such precautions as are necessary reasonably to ensure that copyrights in sound recordings or musical works owned or exclusively licensed to the plaintiffs or a member of [BPI] or [MRS] are not infringed by the use of such machines.'

The plaintiffs also claim an inquiry as to damages and an account of profits.

In a schedule to the defence served by BPI in the declaratory action, the statement of claim in the second action was set out in extenso, and in its defence BPI placed reliance on the matters set out in that statement of claim as justification for the accusations made by BPI in the letters to Amstrad and the trade to the effect that Amstrad was acting wrongfully in its advertising and sale of the new equipment. In this way the causes of action set up in the second action became issues also in the declaratory action.

The declaratory action came to trial comparatively speedily. In March 1985, shortly before the trial of the declaratory action was due to take place, proceedings in the second action were stayed until further order. In consequence, summonses which by then had been issued by Amstrad and Dixons for the striking out of the second action or, alternatively, to prevent the plaintiffs from suing in a representative capacity stood a adjourned.

The trial of the declaratory action took place in June 1985. Whitford J found in favour of BPI and dismissed the action. On 24 October 1985 an appeal by Amstrad to this court was dismissed. The judgments of Whitford J and of the Court of Appeal are reported (see [1986] FSR 159). All three members of the Court of Appeal (Lawton, Slade and Glidewell LJ) decided that none of the issues raised in the statement of claim in the second action
b and relied on by BPI in its defence in the declaratory action gave rise to any civil liability on the part of Amstrad. However, during the hearing a further point had been raised, namely that the putting out by Amstrad of the advertising material complained of might be capable of amounting to an incitement to commit the crime created by s 21(3) of the Copyright Act 1956. Section 21(3) provides:

c 'Any person who, at a time when copyright subsists in a work, makes or has in his possession a plate, knowing that it is to be used for making infringing copies of the work, shall be guilty of an offence under this subsection.'

The suggestion was that a tape recording is capable of being a 'plate' within the definition in s 18(3) and that once a person who is in possession of a tape recording consciously forms the intent to use it for the purpose of making an infringing copy he is d guilty of an offence under s 21(3). The Court of Appeal decided that it was neither necessary nor proper to adjudge whether Amstrad had committed the offence of inciting persons to commit the s 21(3) offence, but in its discretion refused to make the declaration sought by Amstrad.

This outcome placed BPI in the unsatisfactory position that, having obtained from the court the order it sought (the dismissal of the appeal), it was unable to seek to take the e matter further to the House of Lords, even though on all the substantive issues canvassed and decided in the action BPI had failed. BPI was left to derive such consolation as it could from the views expressed by the Court of Appeal that there was a possibility that Amstrad might have committed the criminal offence of inciting the offence prescribed by s 21(3).

After the trial of the declaratory action, the stay of the second action was lifted. On 4
f March 1986 the plaintiffs in the second action issued a summons for leave to amend the statement of claim in that action. On 8 May 1986 Whitford J had before him that summons and also the two striking-out summonses issued earlier by Amstrad and Dixons and which had meanwhile remained adjourned. The gist of the amendments which the plaintiffs wished to make to the statement of claim was to spell out and allege against g Amstrad and Dixons the ingredients of the incitement offence.

In short, at this hearing before the judge, Amstrad and Dixons asked that the second action should be struck out on the ground that all the issues raised therein had already been decided adversely to BPI by the Court of Appeal in the declaratory action, and those issues would be bound to be decided in the same way at the trial of the second action. They resisted the proposed amendments raising the incitement issue on the ground that h they disclosed no cause of action. Whitford J decided that on the incitement issue the plaintiffs had an arguable case for injunctive relief and for at least nominal damages in respect of Amstrad's and Dixons' alleged incitement. Accordingly he permitted the amendments to be made. Having considered the authorities, he expressed his conclusion:

i 'Although [counsel for Amstrad] repeatedly suggested that what the plaintiffs are seeking in the [second] action is damages for infringement of copyright by a route not open to them, in truth it seems to me that basically what they are trying to do by their amended statement of claim is to stop damage occurring, which, if they are right, is only likely to occur as a result of this allegedly criminal offence and which further is damage which they are unlikely ever to be able to prove and so recover. If incited so to do by the Amstrad advertisements purchasers of these equipments start recording from prerecorded cassettes in which some one or more of the plaintiffs hold a copyright interest, how in any given particular case is any particular person whose interests may have been affected ever going to discover or prove that any infringement has taken place? Over the years in many fields there has been an increasing tendency, particularly in the light of the total failure of penal proceedings to achieve any effective result, to accept that there are circumstances in which relief by way of injunction should be granted in civil proceedings. I am not persuaded that the [second] action, based on the statement of claim as amended, must necessarily fail; and, not being so persuaded, the amendments ought to be allowed to proceed.' a b

The judge also rejected the objection taken by Amstrad and Dixons that this was not a case for a representative action. He struck out those parts of the statement of claim which related only to the issues which this court had decided adversely to BPI in the declaratory action. He gave leave to appeal on all points. c

Pursuant to that leave there are now before the court appeals by all parties against the judge's decision.

I should say at once that counsel for the plaintiffs accepted that, by reason of the decision of this court in the declaratory action, the appeal by the plaintiffs (in respect of the striking out of parts of the statement of claim) cannot succeed in this court. What he seeks is to use this appeal as the means for bringing before the House of Lords the issues decided adversely to BPI by this court in the declaratory action, having been deprived of the opportunity to pursue those issues further in that action by the procedural quirk I have mentioned. d

I turn to consider whether the plaintiffs should have been granted leave to amend. In summary form the material amendments sought to be made are these. A new paragraph, para 6A, is sought to be added, alleging that all or nearly all the persons who use the equipment to make copies of commercially available prerecorded cassette tapes or gramophone discs will thereby be guilty of an offence under s 21(3), and some particulars are given in that regard. e

Paragraph 7, as it stands at present, reads:

'The said equipment has been advertised by [Amstrad] and sold by the Defendants in such a way as to incite members of the public to use it to make cassette recordings from pre-recorded tapes, gramophone discs and broadcast material, with a reckless disregard for the rights of the owners of the copyrights in the sound recordings and musical works contained therein.' f

It is proposed to add these words to the end of that paragraph:

'and in circumstances where (by virtue of the facts and matters referred to in paragraphs 2 and 6A) all or nearly all of the persons making such cassette recordings will be guilty of an offence under the said sub-section. The Plaintiffs will say that the Defendants have thereby unlawfully incited members of the public who buy the said equipment to commit offences under the said sub-section.' g

The relief sought is unchanged, save that the injunction would now inhibit Amstrad and Dixons from advertising and selling the machines in such a way as to incite members of the public to commit offences under s 21(3). h

Before turning to the law, I mention one procedural matter. Whether leave to amend should be granted or refused turns, in this case, on whether the statement of claim as sought to be amended will disclose a reasonable cause of action. In the course of his submissions, however, counsel for the plaintiffs indicated that on this he was content that this court should follow the same approach as in RCA Corp v Pollard [1982] 3 All ER 771, [1983] Ch 135. There, with some encouragement from counsel, this court decided a difficult and important issue of law on an appeal from the judge's refusal to strike out a statement of claim. Likewise here, counsel for the plaintiffs accepted that if, having heard the arguments, this court was satisfied that the plaintiffs' pleaded case as amended j a could not succeed as a matter of law the court should so hold and not leave the question of law to be decided at a later stage in the course of what no doubt would be a protracted and expensive trial. In the event we had the benefit of full argument on the incitement point.

The case of counsel for the plaintiffs was that there are circumstances in which a private individual can properly sue for an injunction to restrain breaches of the criminal law. He submitted that the law today is that whether or not a potential plaintiff can sue in respect of a breach of a statutory prohibition depends on the scope and language of the statute, and that in this regard there is a distinction between two different rights or remedies which statute may confer on persons for whose protection or benefit a statutory obligation or prohibition, backed by an express criminal law sanction, has been passed: (1) as a matter of construction a statute may give rise to a duty owed not merely to the world at large but also to a class of 'protected persons', the breach of which gives a member of the protected class a cause of action in tort for damages; and (2) a statute passed for the benefit of 'protected persons' which does not create any duty, and thus cannot give rise to a claim in tort for damages, may none the less entitle a member of the class of 'protected persons' to apply for an injunction: in such a case the plaintiff's claim is a claim in equity to enforce the observance of the criminal law.

counsel for the plaintiffs accepted that the present case does not fall within his category (1), but he submitted that it falls within his category (2).

In my view, there is no such category as that formulated by counsel as his category (2).

I consider first, in chronological order, the authorities relied on by counsel. He relied on three nineteenth century cases (Emperor of Austria v Day and Kossuth (1861) 3 De GF & J 217, 45 ER 861, Springhead Spinning Co v Riley (1868) LR 6 Eq 551 and Dixon v Holden (1869) LR 7 Eq 488) and on the recent decisions of the House of Lords in Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers [1977] 3 All ER 70, [1978] AC 435 and of the Court of Appeal in RCA Corp v Pollard [1982] 3 All ER 771, [1983] Ch 135.

In my view counsel for the plaintiffs is not assisted by the much discussed case of Emperor of Austria v Day and Kossuth. There the defendants appealed unsuccessfully from an order of Stuart V-C restraining them from making spurious Hungarian banknotes in this country and ordering the delivery up of notes already made. The three members of the court expressed their reasons in differing terms, but none of the reasoning supports the existence of counsel's category (2). Indeed, the case was not one where the acts complained of were criminal.

The basis of Lord Campbell LC's judgment was that the court has jurisdiction to protect property from an act threatened which, if completed, would give a right of action. That by 'right of action' he meant cause of action at law is apparent from his next words (3 De GF & J 217 at 240, 45 ER 861 at 870):

'I by no means say that in every such case an injunction may be demanded as of right, but if the party applying is free from blame and promptly applies for relief, and shews that by the threatened wrong his property would be so injured that an action for damages would be no adequate redress, the injunction will be granted.'

The reasoning of Knight Bruce LJ was to the same effect. He said that whether the acts complained of were criminal was not material: the preparation of the notes with the intention of issuing them in Hungary was by the law of England—

"'civilly unlawful,'" as regards rights of property, that is to say, the public revenues, the fiscal resources, the pecuniary means of the realm of Hungary, which rights the Plaintiff is entitled to represent here.'

(See 3 De GF & J 217 at 247, 45 ER 861 at 873.) The plaintiff was entitled therefore to the protection of the court 'according to its ordinary course in analogous cases, from the infliction of such a wrong' (see 3 De GF & J 217 at 248, 45 ER 861 at 873).

Before us counsel had some difficulty in identifying with any confidence the cause of action at law possessed in that case by the plaintiff. Passing off and injurious falsehood were suggested. But I do not think that it is material for me to pursue this. a

Turner LJ expressed himself in wider terms. He considered that the introduction of the spurious notes constituted an injury to the private rights of the plaintiff's subjects. He said (3 De GF & J 217 at 253-255, 45 ER 861 at 875-876):

'I agree that the jurisdiction of this Court in a case of this nature rests upon injury to property actual or prospective, and that this Court has no jurisdiction to prevent the commission of acts which are merely criminal or merely illegal, and do not affect any rights of property, but I think that there are here rights of property quite sufficient to found jurisdiction in this Court. I do not agree to the proposition, that there is no remedy in this Court if there be no remedy at law, and still less do I agree to the proposition that this Court is bound to send a matter of this description to be tried at law . . . If the property of an individual is affected by an undue and unauthorized use of his name, the law would no doubt give a remedy. I am not satisfied that the law would not give the same remedy in the case of the undue and unauthorized use of the name of a nation or state; but whether it would do so or not . . . I think . . . that the case falls within the jurisdiction of this Court.'

Thus Turner LJ expressly did not base his decision on the existence of a cause of action of law. d

If one stopped there, one might perhaps be forgiven for thinking that, on the basis of this reasoning, an argument could be mounted in the present case along the lines that, even though the incitement alleged did not found an action at law against Amstrad or Dixons for infringement of copyright, because the incitement constituted criminal acts which affected the plaintiffs' copyrights, a court of equity would restrain those acts at the suit of the copyright owners. e

However, and this is an important feature of this case, counsel for the plaintiffs accepted that it was now established that to enable a plaintiff to sue for an injunction to restrain a criminal act it is not enough for him to show that the criminal act interferes with some property interest of his. Having regard to the decision in Lonrho Ltd v Shell Petroleum Co Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 456, [1982] AC 173 as interpreted by this court in RCA Corp v Pollard [1982] 3 All ER 771, [1983] Ch 135 and in Rickless v United Artists Corp [1987] 1 All ER 679, [1987] 2 WLR 945, that concession seems to me to have been inevitable. f

This being so, I am unable to see how the views expressed in Emperor of Austria v Day and Kossuth assist the plaintiffs in the present case. I can find in that case no other proposition which might assist them. g

I am able to deal with the next two cases more shortly. Springhead Spinning Co v Riley (1868) LR 6 Eq 551 was a demurrer to a bill alleging that the printing and publishing of advertisements by the defendants for the purpose of intimidating workmen from entering the employment of the plaintiffs were unlawful acts, punishable by statute and as a common law crime. The relief sought was an injunction and damages. Malins V-C overruled the demurrer, relying mainly on the passage, set out above, in the judgment of Turner LJ in Emperor of Austria v Day and Kossuth 3 De GF & J 217 at 253, 45 ER 861 at 875. Malins V-C said (at 558): h

'The jurisdiction of this Court is to protect property, and it will interfere by injunction to stay any proceedings, whether connected with crime or not, which go to the immediate, or tend to the ultimate, destruction of property, or make it less valuable or comfortable for use or occupation.'

Dixon v Holden (1869) LR 7 Eq 488 was another decision of Malins V-C. In that case he applied the same principle when restraining the publication of a libel.

Here again, it seems to me that the concession rightly made by counsel destroys any value that these cases might, at first sight, seem to have for him. Given the concession, I cannot see what is left in these decisions which advances the present plaintiffs' case.

So I come to the recent authorities. In Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers [1977] 3 All ER 70, [1978] AC 435, as is well known, Mr Gouriet sought an injunction restraining the defendant union from endeavouring to procure any person to delay post in the course of transmission between this country and South Africa, contrary to statute. Mr Gouriet did not claim that he had any special interest in the transmission of such post, or that he would suffer any special damage from non-transmission. The House of Lords struck out the proceedings on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to grant Mr Gouriet the relief sought by him. Viscount Dilhorne made passing reference, without disapproval, to Springhead Spinning Co v Riley (1868) LR 6 Eq 551 but this was in the context of distinguishing from the instant case, where the plaintiff had not suffered any loss or damage, the 'long line of cases dealing with the rights of individuals to secure injunctions and declarations when their private rights are threatened' (see [1977] 3 All ER 70 at 92, [1978] AC 435 at 492–493). Lord Edmund-Davies made a statement to the same effect (see [1977] 3 All ER 70 at 104, [1978] AC 435 at 506).

I do not think those passages assist the plaintiffs. Apart from anything else, even if, read out of their context, these passages might, at first sight, be thought to countenance a proposition that a plaintiff can sue for an injunction to restrain a criminal act which interferes with some property right of his, this would afford no support for the proposition embraced by counsel's category (2). The two propositions are quite distinct.

Before coming to the last authority on which counsel for the plaintiff replied, RCA Corp v Pollard [1982] 3 All ER 771, [1983] Ch 135, I must refer to Lonrho Ltd v Shell Petroleum Co Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 456, [1982] AC 173, which was the subject of consideration in RCA Corp v Pollard.

It will be recalled that one of the questions before their Lordships in the Lonrho case was whether, although no breach of contract was involved, delivery to Southern Rhodesia by Shell and BP of petroleum products contrary to the sanctions order gave Lonrho a cause of action for damages, assuming Lonrho suffered loss in consequence of the activities of BP and Shell. In answering that question in the negative, in a speech concurred in by Lord Edmund-Davies, Lord Keith, Lord Scarman and Lord Bridge, Lord Diplock referred to the principle that the question whether legislation which makes the doing or omitting to do a particular act a criminal offence renders the person guilty of such offence liable also in a civil action for damages at the suit of any person who thereby suffers loss or damage is a question of construction of the legislation (see [1981] 2 All ER 456 at 460, [1982] AC 173 at 183). Having set out the terms of the sanctions order, he pointed out that the order created a statutory prohibition on the doing of certain classes of acts and provided the means of enforcement by prosecution for a criminal offence which was subject to heavy penalties. Lord Diplock continued ([1981] 2 All ER 456 at 461, [1982] AC 173 at 185):

'So one starts with the presumption laid down originally by Lord Tenterden CJ in Doe d Bishop of Rochester v Bridges (1831) 1 B & Ad 847 at 859, [1824–34] All ER Rep 167 at 170, where he spoke of the "general rule" that "where an Act creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner . . . that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner", a statement that has frequently been cited with approval ever since, including on several occasions in speeches in this House. Where the only manner of enforcing performance for which the Act provides is prosecution for the criminal offence of failure to perform the statutory obligation or for contravening the statutory prohibition which the Act creates, there are two classes of exception to this general rule.'

The first of the two exceptions stated by Lord Diplock was 'where on the true construction of the Act it is apparent that the obligation or prohibition was imposed for the benefit or protection of a particular class of individuals, as in the case of the Factories Acts and similar legislation' (see [1981] 2 All ER 456 at 461, [1982] AC 173 at 185). In that type of case those intended to be benefited who were injured by contravention of the statute had a right at common law against the person who contravened the statute.

I pause to observe that this is counsel for the plaintiffs' category (1), which it is admitted does not assist the plaintiffs in the present case. a

The second exception stated by Lord Diplock was—

'where the statute creates a public right (ie a right to be enjoyed by all those of Her Majesty's subjects who wish to avail themselves of it) and a particular member of the public suffers what Brett J in Benjamin v Storr (1874) LR 9 CP 400 at 407 described as "particular, direct and substantial" damage "other and different from that which was common to all the rest of the public".' b

He referred to Boyce v Paddington BC [1903] 1 Ch 109 as a case of a public right conferred by statute, and said ([1981] 2 All ER 456 at 461-462, [1982] AC 173 at 185-186):

'It is in relation to that class of statute only that Buckley J's oft-cited statement (at 114) as to the two cases in which a plaintiff, without joining the Attorney General, could himself sue in private law for interference with that public right must be understood. The two cases he said were: "first, where the interference with the public right is such as that some private right of his is at the same time interfered with . . . and, secondly, where no private right is interfered with, but the plaintiff, in respect of his public right, suffers special damage peculiar to himself from the interference with the public right." The first case would not appear to depend on the existence of a public right in addition to the private one; while to come within the second case at all it has first to be shown that the statute, having regard to its scope and language, does fall within that class of statutes which create a legal right to be enjoyed by all of Her Majesty's subjects who wish to avail themselves of it. A mere prohibition on members of the public generally from doing what it would otherwise be lawful for them to do is not enough.' c

I pause again to observe that the present case does not fall within this second exception.

Having concluded that the case before their Lordships' House fell within neither of the exceptions, Lord Diplock then considered the decision in Ex p Island Records Ltd [1978] 3 All ER 824, [1978] Ch 122, this having been relied on as showing that— f

'some broader principle has of recent years replaced those long-established principles that I have just stated for determining whether a contravention of a particular statutory prohibition by one private individual makes him liable in tort to another private individual who can prove that he has suffered damage as a result of the contravention'. g

Suffice it to say, Lord Diplock rejected the existence of any wider general rule.

I make one observation on this case before turning to RCA Corp v Pollard. Although the question before the House of Lords concerned the existence of a cause of action for damages, I read the passages cited above from the speech of Lord Diplock as intended to be a comprehensive statement of the circumstances in which, in general, some manner of enforcing performance of a statutory obligation or prohibition, other than prosecution for the criminal offence prescribed by the statute, is permissible. Their Lordships had before them, in the judgments in Ex p Island Records Ltd, references to the principle in equity said to be derived from cases such as Springhead Spinning Co v Riley (1868) LR 6 Eq 551, but Lord Diplock's speech contains no suggestion that, founded on these cases or otherwise, there might be a third exception to Lord Tenterden CJ's 'general rule', whereby a court of equity would grant an injunction and damages to an individual plaintiff in a case not within either of the other two exceptions. h

I come at last to RCA Corp v Pollard [1982] 3 All ER 771, [1983] Ch 135. The question in that case was the one left open by Lord Diplock in Lonrho Ltd v Shell Petroleum Co Ltd:

- whether recording companies have a cause of action against those making or distributing 'bootleg' records in contravention of the Dramatic and Musical Performers' Protection Act 1958. This court held that they do not. Thus the actual decision is not in point in the present case, but counsel for the plaintiff relied strongly on one passage in the judgment of Oliver LJ, where Oliver LJ set out three ways in which, until recently, a claim by the recording company to have a right to restrain the sale of 'bootlegged' recordings and for damages could have been framed ([1982] 3 All ER 771 at 779, [1983] Ch 135 at 150). He later stated the second of these as ([1982] 3 All ER 771 at 780, [1983] AC 135 at 150):

'where there is a breach of a statutory provision for the protection of a class of whom the plaintiff is one and he can show that he is specially damaged by the breach, he may bring proceedings to enforce, not his own civil right of action, but the public duty which has been interfered with or not observed.'

- c Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that that is this case.

I do not think that this passage in Oliver LJ's judgment can sustain the burden which counsel requires it to bear. As I read Oliver LJ's judgment, the three ways set out by him are his paraphrase of (1) Lord Diplock's first exception, (2) Lord Diplock's second exception and (3) the wider principle of equity upheld by the majority of the Court of Appeal in Ex p Island Records Ltd but rejected by the House of Lords in the Lonrho case.

- d These were the three principles which had so recently been the subject of exegesis by the House of Lords. I do not think that in his summary Oliver LJ could have been intending to depart from those principles, and to do so without any explicit indication that he was so doing and without stating his reasons for so doing.

In my view, therefore, the authorities relied on by counsel for the plaintiff do not establish his proposition. Furthermore, the proposition is contrary to established principle. In considering whether a plaintiff has a right to obtain an injunction in this area of the law, it is necessary to identify what is the legal or equitable right of the plaintiff whose violation the plaintiff is seeking to prevent: see Bremer Vulkan Schiffbau Und Maschinenfabrik v South India Shipping Corp [1981] 1 All ER 289 at 296-297, [1981] AC 909 at 979-980 and British Airways Board v Laker Airways Ltd [1984] 3 All ER 39 at 46, [1985] AC 58 at 81. The proposition under consideration identifies that right as a claim in equity to enforce the observance of the criminal law. The proposition is framed in this way, as I understand it, to avoid the argument that the plaintiffs are seeking to set up and enforce a private right in respect of infringement of copyright which is not provided for in the Copyright Act 1956.

- g But, apart from express statutory provision, persons other than the Attorney General (acting either ex officio or ex relatione) have no standing to seek to enforce, through a civil court, the observance of the criminal law as such: their remedy is to bring a private prosecution: see Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers [1977] 3 All ER 70 at 79, [1978] AC 435 at 477 per Lord Wilberforce. As Lord Eldon LC pointed out in Macaulay v Shackell (1827) 1 Bli NS 96 at 127, 4 ER 809 at 820 a court of equity has no criminal jurisdiction.

- h Of course, if the criminal activity will infringe a property right of the plaintiff, the plaintiff has standing to enlist the civil court's aid in preventing that infringement. But in assisting such a plaintiff the court is not compelling the observance of the criminal law as such: it is giving effect to a cause of action, at law or in equity, possessed by the plaintiff as owner of the property right. If a person threatens to steal another's car, the court would have jurisdiction to grant the owner of the car an injunction restraining that person from taking the car. But that injunction would not have the observance of the criminal law as its justification or purpose. The justification and purpose of such an injunction would be the restraint of the would-be thief from committing against the car owner the tort or torts which the theft of the car would involve. That the tort or torts would also give rise to criminal liability would be, essentially, irrelevant to the cause of action.

- j Furthermore, as appears from the rejection in Lonrho Ltd v Shell Petroleum Co Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 456, [1982] AC 173 of the views espoused by Lord Denning MR and Waller LJ in Ex p Island Records Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 456 at 463, [1982] AC 173 at 187, activity which is damaging to property of the plaintiff but which, if the activity were not criminal, would afford no cause of action to the plaintiff does not become remediable in civil suit at the investigation of the plaintiff by reason only that the activity is criminal. That the activity attracts criminal liability cannot by itself, in this field, convert into a cause of action acts which would otherwise not be sufficient for that purpose. (I confine my comments to the field of damaging a plaintiff's private rights of property, because different considerations apply elsewhere, for instance, where a party is seeking to enforce a contract, the making or performance of which is rendered illegal by statute.)

Whether the plaintiffs have any cause of action in respect of Amstrad's and Dixons' alleged incitement of others to infringe the plaintiffs' copyrights was not a matter argued before us. That was one of the questions decided by this court, in favour of Amstrad, in the declaratory action. The only question argued before us on the incitement issue was the narrow one of whether the alleged incitement of others to commit the s 21 offence gave rise to claims in equity as set out above. For the reasons I have stated, in my view it does not.

Counsel for the plaintiff sought to make his submission more attractive by confining the cases in which an individual has standing to obtain an injunction compelling the observance of the criminal law where the activity complained of would damage a property right to cases of a statutory prohibition enacted for the benefit or protection of a class of persons of whom the plaintiff is one. In my view, far from helping, this suggested limitation gives rise to further difficulties. In the first place, this limitation involves drawing a distinction between statutory crimes and common law crimes for which I can see no sound justification (and, in passing, I note that the crime alleged against Amstrad and Dixons is not a statutory one, but is the common law crime of incitement of others to commit an offence which is statutory in source).

Secondly, this limitation involves construing a statute, but leads to a result which attributes to Parliament a very odd legislative intention. The exercise required by counsel's category (1) is the familiar, if sometimes difficult, one of construing a statute to see whether a breach of the statutory prohibition or obligation makes the person committing the breach liable in damages at the suit of a person damaged thereby. Counsel's category (2) envisages that the court has undertaken that exercise and concluded (a) that the statutory prohibition or obligation was imposed for the protection or benefit of a particular class of persons, but (b) that the contravention of the prohibition or obligation gave rise to no right for a member of that class to sue for damages at law, yet (c) the contravention did give rise to a right for a member of the class to sue in equity for an injunction, with (because this also is claimed by counsel) a claim for damages added, by a sidewind, by Lord Cairns's Act.

I do not find this at all persuasive. I am unable to see what are the circumstances in which, or the purpose for which, Parliament would be concerned to draw the distinction between a claim for damages at law on the one hand, and a claim in equity for an injunction with damages in addition to or in lieu of an injunction on the other hand, and then enact a prohibition having the effect of conferring on members of the 'protected' class a right extending to the latter claim but not the former. Counsel conceded, in my view rightly, that s 21(3) does not itself confer on copyright owners a right to sue at law for damages for breach of a statutory duty. I can see no basis for construing the subsection in such a way that none the less committing the offence of inciting others to commit the s 21(3) offence has the effect of conferring on copyright owners a right to sue in equity for an injunction and damages in lieu of or in addition thereto.

In the end, therefore, for the reasons I have sought to state, in my judgment the plaintiffs' incitement claim formulated in the amendment is not legally sustainable. Accordingly, I would allow the appeals by Amstrad and Dixons, and discharge the judge's order giving leave to amend.

a For the further reason I have already stated, the question whether the plaintiffs have a good cause of action against Amstrad or Dixons otherwise than by reference to s 21(3) has not been argued before us, counsel accepting that on this he is bound to fail in this court. Accordingly, I would dismiss the plaintiffs' appeal and, since this would leave no live issue in the proceedings, strike out the writ and statement of claim. I would do so, I must confess, with a feeling of profound dissatisfaction. The narrow issue argued before us was the criminal incitement point, which is, in my view, misconceived. But the overall result of these appeals is that if the facts alleged against Amstrad and Dixons are correct, substantial manufacturers and distributors are, on a large scale, inciting others to infringe copyright in circumstances where the copyright owners have no practical remedy against the actual infringers, and there is nothing the copyright owners can do through the courts to stop them. If, indeed, that is so, the present state of the law is, in my view, gravely defective.

c SIR DENYS BUCKLEY. The facts of this case, and what I may perhaps call the strategic positions of the parties, have been set out in the judgment of Nicholls LJ, a draft of which I have already had an opportunity of reading. I will not recapitulate them. I remark, however, that the underlying cause of this action is the present apparent inefficacy of the law to protect those proprietary rights which statutes have conferred on owners of copyrights against widespread infringement of their copyrights by the use of modern electronic copying devices. Either the means and methods of detection and control require improvement or the very nature of copyright in works exposed to these risks of infringement calls for reconsideration. I understand that legislation in this field is already being considered.

e The appeals presently before us are interlocutory appeals. The defendants, Amstrad and Dixons, both seek to have the action stayed in limine. The plaintiffs seek to restore to their statement of claim certain passages struck out by Whitford J on 8 March 1986 on the ground that they no longer supported sustainable causes of action, having regard to the judgments given in this court on 29 October 1985 in the earlier action of Amstrad Consumer Electronics plc v British Phonographic Industry Ltd [1986] FSR 189 (the declaratory action), in which substantially the same issues were raised as in the present action.

f Counsel for the plaintiffs concedes that he cannot dispute in this court the correctness of the Court of Appeal's decisions of 29 October 1985 in the declaratory action, but he would seek to do so in any appeal to the House of Lords. He has not contended that in the event the reasons given by this court which would have resulted in its making the declaration asked for but for the circumstance which I shall next mention were obiter dicta. He does, however, seek to support before us the view that the plaintiffs have a cause of action against the defendants which was not originally pleaded in the statement of claim in this action but has been introduced by amendments permitted by Whitford J on 8 March 1986. This suggested cause of action was first propounded by counsel for the defendants in the Court of Appeal on Amstrad's appeal in the declaratory action (see [1986] FSR 189 at 208). It was on this account that the Court of Appeal, in the exercise of its discretion, refused Amstrad a declaration to the effect that it had acted lawfully in respect of the matters in issue in that action.

g In this state of affairs, the only live issue before us is whether (1) the plaintiffs have a reasonable chance of success on what I may call the new cause of action or (2) the plaintiffs having no reasonable chance of success in that respect and being unable to contend in this court that they have any reasonable chance of succeeding on any other pleaded cause of action, the action should be stayed in limine. Whitford J was not satisfied that the plaintiffs must necessarily fail on the new cause of action, and accordingly he allowed the amendments necessary to introduce it to the pleading and refused a stay.

j It will be convenient first to deal with the matter as between the plaintiffs and Amstrad.

The proposed new cause of action does not arise under the Copyright Act 1956, s 21(3) but is a consequence of the provisions of that subsection, which provides: a

'Any person who, at a time when copyright subsists in a work, makes or has in his possession a plate, knowing that it is to be used for making infringing copies of the work, shall be guilty of an offence under this subsection.'

It is to be observed that the offence so created does not consist of infringing the copyright: it consists of making or possessing a plate, knowing that it 'is to be used' for making infringing copies. b

Paragraph 6A of the amended statement of claim reads:

'All or nearly all of the person who use the said equipment to make copies of commercially available pre-recorded cassette tapes or gramophone discs will thereby be guilty of an offence under section 21(3) of the said Act. The Plaintiffs will say that: (a) any person who uses the said equipment to make such copies will necessarily at the time of such copying have in his possession (within the meaning of the said sub-section) the tape or disc being copied; (b) the tape or disc being copied as aforesaid will necessarily be a plate within the meaning of the said sub-section; (c) by virtue of the facts and matters referred to in paragraph 2, copyrights will subsist in all or nearly all of such tapes or discs being copied as aforesaid; and (d) by virtue of the facts and matters referred to in paragraph 2, all or nearly all of the persons making such copies will know the same to be infringing copies within the meaning of the said sub-section.' c

The facts and matters referred to in para 2 are these:

'... All or nearly all of the pre-recorded cassette tapes and gramophone discs (being tapes or discs in respect of which copyright subsists) commercially available in this country carry a warning notice to the effect that the unauthorised copying of the tape or disc is prohibited.' e

Paragraph 7 of the amended statement of claim reads:

'The said equipment has been advertised by the First Defendants and sold by the Defendants in such a way as to incite members of the public to use it to make cassette recordings from pre-recorded tapes, gramophone discs and broadcast material, with a reckless disregard for the rights of the owners of the copyrights in the sound recordings and musical works contained therein and in circumstances where (by virtue of the facts and matters referred to in paragraphs 2 and 6A) all or nearly all of the persons making such cassette recordings will be guilty of an offence under the said sub-section. The Plaintiffs will say that the Defendants have thereby unlawfully incited members of the public who buy the said equipment to commit offences under the said sub-section.' f

The allegation is that the defendants have unlawfully incited members of the public who buy 'the said equipment' (ie Amstrad's high-speed copying double cassette units, SM104, TS87 and TS39) to commit offences under s 21(3). h

Paragraph 7 of the amended statement of claim proceeds to set out in seven sub-paragraphs, (a) to (g), some material in the nature of particulars. I will not set these out in extenso. The sub-paragraphs are introduced by the words 'Pending discovery the Plaintiffs point to the following facts and matters'. These 'particulars' do not, in my view, have the effect of confining the plaintiffs to the matters so set out. Sub-paragraphs (a) to (c) refer to three published leaflets disseminated by Amstrad promoting the three equipments, drawing attention to the high-speed copying facilities, and saying, amongst other things: 'you can even make a copy of your favourite cassette.' j

Sub-paragraphs (d) and (e) relate to a newspaper advertisement and a television commercial broadcast put out by Amstrad to much the same effect as the leaflets. Suba paragraphs (f) and (g) relate to two occasions on which retail customers inquired about or bought Amstrad equipments of the relevant types from Dixons.

Counsel for Amstrad in his clearly presented argument in this court, as in the court below, contended that by this plea the plaintiffs are seeking to obtain a remedy for infringement which is nowhere provided in the Copyright Act 1953, and is consequently not available to them.

b In my view, this argument is founded on a misconception. I can see no ground on which it could be suggested that by selling its audio equipments, Amstrad has infringed any copyright in any work a recording of which might thereafter be copied by the use of such an equipment. (See, in this connection, that section of Lawton LJ's judgment on the appeal in the declaratory action, which is headed 'Knowledge and intent' ([1986] FSR 189 at 205).)

c Nor, for the purposes at any rate of the cause of action with which I am concerned, does the amended statement of claim contain any such allegation. The allegation is that, by selling its audio equipment and thus providing members of the public with the means to copy prerecorded tapes, in the very great majority of which copyright will subsist, and by seeking to promote the sale of those equipments by such advertisements as it used, Amstrad has unlawfully incited members of the public to commit offences under s 23(1).

d It is not, I think, contended that Amstrad has itself committed that offence; nor do I think that that could be suggested. The audio machines cannot come within the meaning of the word 'plate', which is defined in s 18(3) of the 1956 Act as including 'any stereotype, stone, block, mould, matrix, transfer, negative or other appliance'. Those last three words must, in my judgment, be construed ejusdem generis with the preceding words. An electronic copying machine of the kind with which we are concerned is not, in my e judgment, of that genus, and does not fall within any natural meaning of the word 'plate'.

So the question for us, in my view, is whether, if Amstrad is found in fact to have incited members of the public to commit offences under s 21(3), that conduct by Amstrad entitles the plaintiffs, or any of them, or any of the persons on whose behalf the plaintiffs f respectively purport to sue, to a remedy in a civil court.

If it is reasonably arguable that some civil remedy would or might be available, the defendants cannot be entitled to have the action dismissed or struck out, or stayed, at the present stage. For the purpose of considering the question, it should be assumed that Amstrad is guilty of incitement. Only if, on that assumption, the plaintiffs would nevertheless be bound to fail in securing any civil relief of a kind claimed can the defendants succeed. Counsel for the plaintiffs is content that we should entertain and g decide this question of law.

Counsel for Amstrad's sheet anchor on this part of the case is the House of Lords decision in Lonrho Ltd v Shell Petroleum Co Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 456, [1982] AC 173. In that case the defendant company, Shell, was alleged to have breached an order having statutory force, which prohibited the supply of oil to Southern Rhodesia. The plaintiff
 h company, Lonrho, asserted that this damaged a business of delivering oil by a certain pipeline which it carried on in Southern Rhodesia. Shell was held to have been guilty of no breach of contract with Lonrho. The question thereupon arose whether Shell was liable in tort.

The only reasoned speech delivered in that case was Lord Diplock's, with which the other members of the House of Lords who participated in the decision all agreed. In the j forefront of his reasons Lord Diplock said that it was well settled that the question whether legislation which makes the doing or omitting to do a particular act a criminal offence renders a person guilty of such offence liable also in a civil action for damages at the suit of any person who thereby suffers loss or damage is a question of construction of the legislation. He pointed out that the statutory order in question in that case created a statutory prohibition on the doing of certain classes of acts, and provided the means of enforcing the prohibition by prosecution for a criminal offence, and said ([1981] 2 All ER 456 at 461, [1982] AC 173 at 185):

'So one starts with the presumption laid down originally by Lord Tenterden CJ in Doe d Bishop of Rochester v Bridges (1831) 1 B & Ad 847 at 859, [1824-34] All ER Rep 167 at 170, where he spoke of the "general rule" that "where an Act creates an obligation, and enforces the performance in a specified manner . . . that performance cannot be enforced in any other manner" . . .'

Lord Diplock then went on to discuss two classes of exception to that general rule, all in the context of a statutory obligation or prohibition. The Lonrho case teaches this and, in my opinion, only this: where a statute, or a regulation having statutory force, creates a new statutory offence by imposing a new duty or a new prohibition on the public, or some section of the public, specifying a particular method of enforcing compliance, a court of construction will, in the absence of special considerations, such as give rise to Lord Diplock's two exceptions, impute to the legislature an intention that an offender shall not be liable in any other way than to that specified sanction or penalty, thus precluding the possibility of a claim in damages.

It will be observed that Lord Diplock, when he criticised what Lord Denning MR had said in Ex p Island Records Ltd [1978] 3 All ER 824, [1978] Ch 122, formulated the proposition of law from which he, Lord Diplock, was dissenting thus:

' . . . whenever a lawful business carried on by one individual in fact suffers damage as a consequence of a contravention by another individual of any statutory prohibition the former has a civil right of action against the latter for such damage' making clear that he was concerned with circumstances arising under a statute (see [1981] 2 All ER 456 at 463, [1982] AC 173 at 187).

That part of Lord Diplock's speech indicates what is, I think, an important distinction between the facts in the Lonrho case and those in the instant case.

There is no allegation in the present case that Amstrad has been guilty of any breach of a statutory prohibition, or of a failure to observe any statutory obligation, as there was in the Lonrho case and also RCA Corp v Pollard [1982] 3 All ER 771, [1983] Ch 135. There is, in the present case, no legislative provision which falls to be construed in order to identify the remedies available for any breach of it. What is asserted by para 7 of the amended statement of claim is that Amstrad has unlawfully incited members of the public to commit offences under s 21(3) of the 1956 Act, that is to say that Amstrad has been guilty of the common law criminal offence of inciting others to commit criminal acts (see 11 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 53). Can that give rise to a liability in tort on the part of the inciter in favour of anyone injured by a criminal act incited by him? We have been shown no authority to the contrary.

If A, without justification, induces B to commit a breach of a contract existing between B and C, whereby C is damaged, A may be liable to a claim in damages for tort at the suit of C. It seems to me at least arguable by analogy that, if A unlawfully incites B to commit an offence under s 21(3) which will, or may, damage C, the owner of a copyright which is liable to be infringed as a consequence of that offence, A may be held to be actually or potentially liable for damages in tort at the suit of C, at any rate if that damage is a foreseeable consequence of the unlawful incitement, and a fortiori if the consequence was intended or contemplated by A. If that is so, it cannot, in my judgment, be asserted that the amended statement of claim does not show a reasonable cause of action, that is a cause of action which is not bound to fail in any event.

It is true, however, that in this court counsel for the plaintiffs has disclaimed any intention to rely on a common law liability in tort, and has contented himself with asserting an equitable right to injunctive relief with (as I understand) a claim for damages under Lord Cairns's Act (the Chancery Amendment Act 1858) appended to it, so I will not rest my decision of this appeal on the ground of tort.

Counsel's argument in support of that equitable claim has been founded on Emperor of Austria v Day and Kossuth (1861) 3 De GF & J 217, 45 ER 861, Springhead Spinning Co v Riley (1868) LR 6 Eq 551 and Dixon v Holden (1869) LR 7 Eq 488.

The first of these was a decision of the Court of Appeal; the other two were decisions of Malins V-C in which he sought to apply the principles enunciated in the Emperor of Austria case. It is true that Malins V-C's two decisions have been the subject of criticism in later cases (see Prudential Assurance Co v Knott (1875) LR 10 Ch App 142 and Temperton v Russell [1893] 1 QB 435 at 438). But the Emperor of Austria case has never, so far as I am aware, been disapproved. It appears to be binding on us.

Turner LJ there, in a passage already cited by Nicholls LJ, regarded the importation of spurious Hungarian bank notes to Hungary as an injury to unidentified individuals in Hungary on whose behalf the plaintiff emperor could sue (see 3 De GF & J 217 at 253–254, 45 ER 861 at 875 at 876). The act complained of was not a criminal act by English law, but it was regarded by the court as an unjustified invasion of private property rights. Neither Lord Campbell LC nor Knight Bruce LJ seem to have considered that the absence of identification of the parties injured was a bar to relief. All three members of the court regarded themselves as exercising an equitable jurisdiction based on a risk of injury to property.

That decision appears to me to afford at least an arguable basis of support for the claim by counsel for the plaintiffs to injunctive relief in the present case, irrespective of whether the plaintiffs have a good common law cause of action for damages. I do not think that that decision is in any way affected by the Lonrho decision, or by anything said in RCA Corp v Pollard or in Rickless v United Artists Corp [1987] 1 All ER 679, [1987] 2 WLR 945, both cases concerned with statutory prohibitions.

I do not think the claim to damages under Lord Cairns's Act presents any difficulty. The award of such damages would be discretionary. If no damages could be recovered at common law, a court of equity might well regard this as a proper circumstance to take into account in the exercise of its discretion.

I am not entirely clear what stage discovery has reached in the action. It is not, I believe, complete. It is not, I think, impossible that the plaintiffs may want to make further amendments in their statement of claim as discovery proceeds.

Taking all these considerations into account, this case is not one in which I, for my part, would feel disposed to assume the task of determining on these interlocutory appeals the point of law which I referred to earlier. It seems at least possible, and indeed probable, that any decision on the trial of the action will be appealed as far as the House of Lords. I think that it is most desirable that, if and when that occurs, the relevant facts should all have been investigated and determined so that the House of Lords may be fully and precisely informed of the facts so as perhaps to be able to illuminate this area of the law.

I now turn to Dixons' appeal. Whereas Amstrad does not sell its audio equipments direct to retail customers, Dixons does so. Amstrad has advertised its equipments in print and by television; there is no assertion in the amended statement of claim that Dixons has done so. Dixons clearly has greater opportunities to make oral representations to retail customers than has Amstrad. Amstrad very possibly has the greater incentive to build up a market for the equipments. The facts of the two cases are different, and the findings whether either of the defendants has been guilty of any such incitement as is alleged may well be different. But the nature of the problems which arise in each case are very similar.

The allegation against Dixons in para 7 of the amended statement of claim is that Dixons has sold the equipments in such a way as unlawfully to incite members of the public to commit offences under s 21(3). Whether such has been the case must be a question of fact, or of mixed fact and law. It is not a pure question of law, the determination of which adversely to the plaintiffs might justify striking out in limine against Dixons.

Counsel for Dixons has submitted that the only specific events referred to in the amended statement of claim relating to alleged incitement by Dixons are the events mentioned in sub-paras (f) and (g) of the so-called particulars set out in para 7. These two sub-paragraphs may be thought to afford slender material for concluding that Dixons has incited members of the public to commit offences under s 21(3), but, as I have already observed, I do not think that, as the pleading stand, the plaintiffs are confined to that material in this respect. a

In these circumstances, and for the reasons which I have discussed, I for my part would not stay or strike out this action against either defendant. b

There remains the question whether the action can properly proceed as a representative action. The question can, I think, for present purposes, be formulated in this way. If a large number of potential plaintiffs all have distinct but similar causes of action against a potential defendant arising out of a particular act or course of conduct on the part of that defendant, which are alleged to give rise to relief of the same kind, though not necessarily of the same measure in the case of each potential plaintiff, can one or a number of those potential plaintiffs sue as representing themselves and all or a number of the rest of the potential plaintiffs? c

A leading authority in this field is Duke of Bedford v Ellis [1901] AC 1, [1900-3] All ER Rep 694, which related to Covent Garden market. Six plaintiffs, who were growers of fruit, flowers, vegetables, roots and herbs, sued on behalf of themselves and all other such growers. They alleged that the defendant, the Duke of Bedford, who owned and managed the market, had contravened the Covent Garden Market Act 1828 (9 Geo 4 c cxiii), which governed the management of the market. The Act established preferential rights to use certain pitches at the market in favour of growers of the products in question at rates of rent and toll more favourable to growers than those prescribed for middlemen traders. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration as to the construction of the Act, injunctive relief restraining breaches of the Act and an account of the amounts by which growers were alleged to have been severally overcharged. The defendant applied interlocutorily claiming that the action could not be pursued as a representative action. That interlocutory application was carried to the House of Lords, where it was held that the action was properly brought as a representative action. d

The leading speech was delivered by Lord Macnaghten, who said ([1901] AC 1 at 8, [1900-3] All ER Rep 694 at 697): e

‘Given a common interest and a common grievance, a representative suit was in order if the relief sought was in its nature beneficial to all whom the plaintiff proposed to represent.’ f

He drew attention to the fact that all the growers had the same rights, for which they relied on one and the same Act of Parliament. g

Similarly, in the instant case the plaintiffs, and all the persons who they purport to represent, have statutory rights of the same character under the Copyright Act 1956 which the action is designed to protect from infringement resulting from the conduct of the defendants which is complained of. They share, in my judgment, a common interest and a common grievance, such as Lord Macnaghten had in mind. The relief which is primarily claimed is injunctive in a form which would benefit the plaintiffs and all whom they purport to represent in the same way, that is to say by protecting them from the risk of infringements incited by the defendants. h

As Whitford J has pointed out, there would be likely to be formidable difficulties in the way of discovering the precise measure of any damage already suffered by any individual copyright owner. It seems improbable that any claim to damages will be pursued, but it seems to me that the possibility of such a claim is no greater bar to a representative action than was the claim to an account in Duke of Bedford v Ellis (see also EMI Records Ltd v Riley [1981] 2 All ER 838, [1981] 1 WLR 923, where, in an i infringement action, representative plaintiffs claimed an inquiry as to damages as well as an injunction).

- a It has been argued that a representative action is not permissible where there is a claim to damages, because each claimant would have to establish his individual damage. We were referred to Markt & Co Ltd v Knight Steamship Co Ltd [1910] 2 KB 1021, where a claim in damages was brought against the owners of a ship lost at sea by plaintiffs suing on behalf of themselves and other owners of cargo on board the ship, which was also lost.
- b The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiffs could not sue in a representative capacity. Vaughan Williams LJ said (at 1029):

- c '... in the present case there is no common origin of the claims of those who shipped goods on board the Knight Commander—the contracts were constituted by the bills of lading, which manifestly might differ much in their form, and as to the exceptions, and probably would vary somewhat according to the nature of the goods shipped.'

Fletcher Moulton LJ said (at 1035): '... where the claim of the plaintiff is for damages the machinery of a representative suit is absolutely inapplicable'; but he subsequently made clear that what he had in mind was a case in which damages was the sole relief sought (at 1040). Buckley LJ, who dissented on the ground that any difficulty about the action continuing as a representative action could be cured by an amendment of the pleadings, said (at 1045):

'It may be, and I think it is the case, that in a representative action the plaintiff must be in a position to claim some relief which is common to all, but it is no objection that he claims also relief personal to himself.'

- e In the instant action, the claims of the plaintiffs and those of the persons whom they purport to represent all have a common basis; damages are not the sole relief claimed and can, in my opinion, be regarded as a quite subsidiary form of relief, capable of being pursued by any individual claimant taking out a summons under any order for an inquiry that the court might make to have his individual claim in damages assessed; and the major relief claimed is common to all the plaintiffs and those whom they purport to represent.

In my judgment, this action has been properly framed as a representative action.

- f For these reasons I, for my part, would dismiss the defendants' two appeals in their entirety. In consequence of the decision of this court in the declaratory action, I would also dismiss the plaintiffs' appeal. If this interlocutory appeal is taken to the House of Lords, it will be open to the plaintiffs to seek to have those words which have been deleted from the statement of claim restored. If after trial any party wishes to appeal, it might be thought that the case would be a suitable one for the leap-frog procedure. This, to some extent, would mitigate the expense of those unfortunately duplicative proceedings.

- g FOX LJ. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgment of Nicholls LJ. I agree with it, and do not wish to add to it.

Defendants' appeals allowed. Plaintiffs' cross-appeal dismissed.

10 April. The Court of Appeal granted the plaintiffs leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

MILLETT J

19 FEBRUARY, 10 MARCH 1987

Sale of land – Title – Defect – Disclosure of defect – Local land charge – Notice of charge – Purchaser deemed to have made searches and inquiries – Contract at auction for purchase of freehold property – Property subject to local land charge – Contract containing condition that purchaser deemed to have searched local land charges register – Purchaser failing to make search and unaware of local land charge – Vendor serving notice to complete – Whether vendor able to show good title – Whether vendor required to make full and frank disclosure of incumbrance – Whether purchaser deemed to have notice of land charge – Law of Property Act 1925, s 198(1) – National Conditions of Sale (20th edn), condition 11.

The defendant was the owner of a house which she had purchased knowing it to be subject to a charge relating to an improvement grant which had been paid to her predecessor in title. The charge was registered in the register of local land charges and could be removed on payment being made to the local authority. The defendant put the property up for auction, where the plaintiff agreed to purchase it for £16,000 under a contract incorporating the National Conditions of Sale (20th edn), condition 11 of which provided that the purchaser 'shall be deemed to have made Local Searches and Enquiries and to have knowledge of all matters that would be disclosed thereby and shall purchase subject to such matters'. The plaintiff did not search the local land charges register before the auction and was unaware of the charge. When the plaintiff did discover the charge it refused to complete and the defendant served a notice to complete. The plaintiff subsequently obtained the removal of the charge and indicated that it was willing to complete, but the defendant then refused to complete unless the plaintiff paid interest on the purchase price from the date of the notice to complete. The plaintiff sought a declaration that the defendant had not been entitled to serve the notice to complete because, having regard to the charge, she had not been able to show good title at that date. The defendant relied on condition 11 and s 198(1)^a of the Law of Property Act 1925, which provided that registration of a local land charge constituted 'actual notice' of the charge 'to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected'.

Held – (1) The defendant had failed to show good title to the property at the date of completion of the contract, notwithstanding the wording of condition 11, because the defendant, as vendor, was subject to the equitable rule that, if there was a defect in title or an incumbrance of which the vendor was aware, he could not rely on exempting conditions in the contract unless he made full and frank disclosure of the existence of the defect or incumbrance. Since the defendant had been aware that the charge had been registered when she had purchased the property, it had been incumbent on her to disclose the existence and nature of the charge before the contract with the plaintiff was concluded, and in the absence of such disclosure the conditions of the contract could not be relied on by her (see p 174 h and p 175 c to e, post); dictum of Wills J in Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co v Butler (1885) 15 QBD at 271 applied.

(2) The 'notice' which a person derived from registration under s 198(1) of the 1925 Act could not be equated with knowledge sufficient to imply a term into an open contract for the sale of land, since such an implication depended on the purchaser's state of mind, whereas notice under s 198(1) was not concerned with such matters and, in the absence of actual knowledge, could not support the necessary implication. Accordingly, the defendant could not rely on s 198(1) to relieve her from her obligation to make full and

- a frank disclosure of the existence of the registered charge before relying on the conditions of sale (see p 177 e f j and p 178 f, post); Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract [1927] All ER Rep 635 distinguished.

- (3) It followed that the defendant had not shown a good title before the removal of the charge and was thus not entitled to interest on the balance of the purchase money, and a declaration to that effect would be granted. Furthermore, specific performance of the contract would be ordered on payment by the plaintiff of the balance of the purchase price less the cost of removing the charge from the register (see p 178 h, post).

Summons

- e On 3 December 1985 the plaintiff, Rignall Developments Ltd, contracted to purchase from the defendant, Gulseren Halil, a freehold property at 218 Bellenden Road, Peckham, London SE15, for the sum of £16,000 of which £1,600 was paid as deposit. The plaintiff objected to an adverse entry against the property in the local land charges register and refused to complete. On 31 December 1985 the defendant served the plaintiff with a notice to complete. The plaintiff obtained the removal of the charge on 14 April 1986 and then expressed willingness to complete. The defendant then refused to complete unless the plaintiff paid interest on the purchase price from 31 December 1985. The plaintiff issued a summons seeking, inter alia, a declaration that the defendant had not shown good title to the property until 14 April 1986 and so was unable to claim interest, and an order of specific performance on payment of the balance of purchase price without interest. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- h 10 March. The following judgment was delivered.

MILLETT J. For 60 years, ever since the judgment of Eve J in Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract [1927] 2 Ch 379, a prudent purchaser has searched the register of local land charges before contract, and has not relied exclusively on making his search in the course of the normal process of investigation of title between contract and completion. Recently, however, the time taken by many local authorities, particularly in London, to reply to inquiries and to deal with applications for official searches of the registers kept by them has become a scandal which threatens to impede the proper working of a free market. Where land is sold by auction, it may be impossible for prospective bidders to obtain official searches in the time available. Where residential property is sold by private treaty, delay can cause havoc with the long chain of transactions which may be involved. There is a growing and useful practice for the vendor's solicitor to obtain and supply the purchaser's solicitor with a copy of the entries on the register at the same time as the draft contract. The present case calls for reconsideration of the consequences of the purchaser's failure to search the register or to obtain copies of the entries thereon before contract, and the correctness of the decision in Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract has been challenged. a

The case concerns a freehold dwelling in Peckham known as 218 Bellenden Road (the property). At an auction held on 3 December 1985 the plaintiff agreed to purchase the property from the defendant for £16,000 and paid a deposit of £1,600 to the auctioneers as stakeholders. The contract incorporated the National Conditions of Sale (20th edn) as well as certain general and special conditions. These included the following. General condition 11: b

'The Purchaser shall be deemed to have made Local Searches and Enquiries and to have knowledge of all matters that would be disclosed thereby and shall purchase subject to such matters.' c

Special condition 5:

'The property is also sold subject to any matters which might be disclosed by a Search and/or Enquiries of the relevant Local Authority either at the date of sale or at the date of completion and (whether or not he has carried out any such Search and/or Enquiries) the Purchaser shall be deemed to buy with full notice and knowledge of all such matters, and shall not raise any objection thereon or requisition relating thereto.' d

The date fixed for completion was 31 December 1985. The plaintiff did not complete on that date because of a subsisting entry on the register of local land charges to which it took objection. The defendant, relying on the conditions which I have read, denied that this was an objection which the plaintiff was entitled to raise, and served notice to complete. e

The plaintiff's solicitors eventually obtained the removal of the entry, but not until 14 April 1986. The plaintiff then sought to complete, but the defendant refused to complete unless the plaintiff paid interest on the balance of the purchase price since 31 December 1985, which the plaintiff declined to do. The amount involved was small, and the sensible course would have been for the parties to complete and leave the question of interest to be resolved later. Instead, both sides took up entrenched positions, and the sale has still not been completed. The plaintiff now seeks specific performance on payment of the balance of the purchase price, but without interest; and the defendant seeks to rescind the contract and forfeit the deposit. The case turns on whether the defendant had by 31 December 1985 shown a good title to the property in accordance with the contract, and this depends on whether the plaintiff was entitled to object to the entries on the register, notwithstanding the conditions of the contract which I have read. f

At all material times the property was let to a protected tenant, and it was sold to the plaintiff subject to the tenancy. In 1978 the freehold owner had applied to the local authority for an improvement grant under the Housing Act 1974. The application was accompanied by a certificate of availability for letting dated 10 November 1978. It was approved on 4 April 1979, and registered in the register of local land charges on 6 April 1979. The date which the local authority in due course certified as the date on which the property first became fit for occupation, after the completion of the relevant works (the certified date) was 2 June 1980. The grant was paid on 15 February 1982. g

The plaintiff had not searched the register of local land charges prior to the auction, and was unaware of the entries it contained. They were not disclosed by the defendant. On 11 December 1985 the plaintiff's solicitors applied to the local authority for an official search of the register, and on the same day they submitted requisitions on title. One of these asked whether any improvement grant had been obtained in respect of the property. The defendant's solicitors replied, disputing the plaintiff's right to make the h a inquiry, and claiming that it was barred by the contract. Without prejudice to that contention, however, they disclosed that there was with the deeds a search dated October 1984, which revealed that a certificate of availability for letting had been issued on 10 November 1978 and an improvement grant had been paid on 15 February 1982. Eventually the plaintiff's solicitors received the official certificate of search, which confirmed the existence of the relevant entries. They disclosed the dates of the certificate of availability for letting and of the approval and payment of the grant, but not the certified date.

b The proprietorship register at the Land Registry shows that the defendant was registered as proprietor of the property with title absolute on 1 November 1984. It does not disclose whether she was a purchaser for value; but a donee does not normally investigate his donor's title, and, from the proximity of the dates, I infer that the search of the local land charges register, made in October 1984, was made on her behalf at the time of her acquisition of the property, and that she was.

c The significance of the entries on the register cannot be understood without reference to the relevant provisions of the Housing Act 1974. With immaterial passages omitted, they are as follows:

d '73.—(1) ... where an application for an improvement grant ... has been approved by a local authority, the provisions of this section shall apply with respect to the occupation, during the period of 5 years beginning with the certified date (in this section referred to as "the initial period"), of the dwelling ... to which the grant relates ...

e (3) For the purposes of this section, the following are "qualifying persons" in relation to a dwelling, namely—(a) the applicant for the grant and any person who derives title to the dwelling through or under the applicant, otherwise than by a conveyance for value ...

f (4) In any case where the application for the grant was accompanied by a certificate of availability for letting with respect to the dwelling, it shall be a condition of the grant that throughout the initial period, (a) the dwelling will be let or available for letting as a residence, and not for a holiday, by a qualifying person ...

g 75.—(1) The provisions of this section shall apply in any case where, under or by virtue of any provision of this Part of this Act, a condition (in this section referred to as a "grant condition") is imposed as a condition of a grant.

(2) If and so long as a grant condition remains in force—(a) it shall be binding on any person ... who is for the time being the owner of the dwelling to which the grant relates ...

(3) ... a grant condition shall be in force throughout the period of 5 years beginning on the certified date ...

h (5) A grant condition shall be treated as not being registrable by virtue of section 15 of the Land Charges Act 1925 but, as soon as may be after an application for a grant has been approved, any condition of that grant shall be registered in the register of local land charges ...

(6) In this Part of this Act "the certified date", in relation to a dwelling in respect of which an application for a grant has been approved means the date certified by the local authority by whom the application was approved as the date on which the dwelling first becomes fit for occupation after completion of the relevant works to the satisfaction of the local authority.

i 76.—(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect in the event of a breach of a condition of a grant (in this section referred to as "the relevant grant") at a time when the condition is binding on the owner of the dwelling concerned by virtue of section 75(2) above.

(2) Where the relevant grant related to a single dwelling, an amount equal to the amount of the relevant grant, together with compound interest thereon as from the certified date, calculated at the appropriate rate . . . shall, on being demanded by the local authority, forthwith become payable to the authority by the owner for the time being of the dwelling . . .

(4) Nothing in subsection (2), or as the case may be, subsection (3) above, shall prevent a local authority from determining not to demand any such amount as is referred to in that subsection, or from demanding an amount less than that which they are entitled to demand under that subsection.

(5) Upon satisfaction of the liability of an owner of a dwelling to make a payment under this section to a local authority in respect of a breach of a condition of a grant, the condition shall cease to be in force with respect to that dwelling . . .

77.—(1) If, at any time while a condition of a grant remains in force, the owner of the dwelling to which the condition relates . . . pays to the local authority by whom the grant was made the like amount as would (on a demand by the local authority) become payable under section 76 above in the event of a breach of that condition, all conditions of the grant shall cease to be in force with respect to that dwelling . . .

The definition of 'qualifying person' in s 73(3)(a) has the result that a grant is repayable on any sale of the property during the initial period, even though the property continues to be occupied by a protected tenant. The object evidently is to prevent short-term speculators from buying properties, improving them at the expense of the ratepayers and then selling them at a profit which reflects the expenditure of public money. The sale to the defendant in 1984, if, as I infer, she had bought the property, and the present sale to the plaintiff, if within the initial period, would both constitute breaches of a condition of the grant and make the grant repayable. The certified date did not appear on the register but, from the information available to the plaintiff's solicitors in December 1985, it must have seemed probable that there had been a breach of condition in 1984, and possible that another would occur if completion took place on 31 December. In those circumstances, the plaintiff refused to complete in the absence of confirmation from the local authority that it would not seek to recover the amount of the grant from the plaintiff, or from the defendant that, if required, she would repay it out of the proceeds of sale.

On 14 April 1986 the local authority's legal department, whose dilatoriness had largely caused the problem, finally notified the plaintiff's solicitors that the initial period had expired in June 1985 that there would not be a breach of grant condition if the plaintiff completed its purchase, and that it had given instructions for the entries on the register of local land charges to be removed. The plaintiff then offered to complete, and the parties adopted the positions I have described.

The defendant relied on the express terms of the contract. The property, it was submitted, was not sold free from incumbrances, but subject to the entries on the register of local land charges; and the plaintiff had no right to object to them. The defendant had, therefore, shown a good title to that which she had agreed to sell, and was entitled to serve notice to complete. Moreover, by general condition 11 the plaintiff was deemed to have searched the register and to have knowledge of the entries thereon.

It is, however, a well-established rule of equity that, if there is a defect in title or incumbrance of which the vendor is aware, the vendor cannot rely on conditions such as those in the present case unless full and frank disclosure is made of its existence. The leading authority is Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co v Butler (1885) 15 QBD 261. Wills J said (at 271):

'The 4th condition provides that the property is sold subject to any matter or thing affecting the same, whether disclosed at the time of the sale or not. Such a condition, however, does not relieve the vendor from the necessity of disclosing any incumbrance or liability of which he is aware, but simply protects him if it should afterwards turn out that the property is subject to some burden or right in favour of a a third person of which he is unaware . . . It would be nothing short of a direct encouragement to fraud if a vendor were at liberty by a condition of this kind to sell to a purchaser as an absolute and unburdened freehold a property which he knew to be subject to liabilities which would materially reduce its market value . . . In honesty and in law alike he was bound to give the purchaser full and fair information what it was that he had for sale, and was inviting him to buy, and having failed to do so, he cannot insist upon the bargain procured by the suppression of material facts affecting the nature of the subject of sale. I entirely acquit the defendant of anything like intentional misconduct, but in the preparation of the particulars of sale he unfortunately relied upon his solicitor, who, as I cannot help believing, was under the mistaken impression that he could better the position of the vendor by abstaining from making himself acquainted with the contents of the earlier deeds in his possession, and open to his perusal.'

c As that case shows, the knowledge of the vendor's solicitor is treated as that of the vendor, and it is no answer for him to say that he has not read the contents of his own conveyancing file. In the present case, therefore, the defendant must be taken to have known of the entries on the register, since a search had been made on her behalf at the time of her purchase and a copy of the entries was with the deeds in her solicitor's possession. To entitle her to rely on the relevant conditions of the contract in these d circumstances, it was incumbent on her to disclose the existence and nature of the entries to the plaintiff before contract. Had the information disclosed in the answers to requisitions been included in the particulars of sale, there could have been no objection to conditions precluding all further inquiry and making the sale subject to the entries in question. In the absence of such disclosure the conditions cannot be relied on. It is hardly e necessary to add that the equitable principle cannot be circumvented by the inclusion in the contract of a condition deeming the purchaser to have searched the register and to know of its contents. The purchaser's acceptance of such a condition is on the basis that the vendor has made the disclosure required of him.

f In answer to this, it was first submitted on behalf of the defendant that the conditions of grant did not create an incumbrance or burden on the property, but only a personal liability on the owner. But the grant is repayable on demand by the owner for the time being of the property, so that the potential liability binds successive owners of the property affected (which is why it is required to be registered) and in my judgment that is enough. Then it was submitted that the entries on the register were only 'bare' entries, without any reality behind them. Unknown to the parties, it was said, the initial period had expired, so that the grant was not repayable and the entries were obsolete. In fact g that appears to be incorrect if, as I infer, there had been a breach of grant condition in 1984. As I read the statutory provisions, once there has been a breach of grant condition during the initial period, repayment may be demanded, even after the expiration of that period, from the owner of the property at the date of the demand. But in any case, neither the entries on the register nor the defendant's answers to requisitions disclosed h the certified date or showed that the initial period had expired. It was for the defendant to show a good title to the property free from the risk that repayment of the grant might be demanded from the plaintiff, and she failed to do so.

Next it was submitted that the plaintiff could have inspected the register before the auction, that a prudent purchaser would have done so, and that there was no reason for equity to come to the assistance of the imprudent. I cannot accept that submission. In Faruqi v English Real Estates Ltd [1979] 1 WLR 963 the equitable principle was applied in j a case where the relevant documents were made available for inspection and the vendors had given the purchasers a fair and proper opportunity of seeing what they were buying. But, as Walton J pointed out, any purchaser reading the conditions of sale would be entitled to assume that, while there were no doubt entries on the register, they were only the usual sort of entries which would not adversely affect the value of the property (at 968). That observation applies with equal force to the present case.

As to the plaintiff's alleged imprudence, the modern practice of making pre-contract searches dates only from 1927 and is a result of the decision in Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract [1927] 2 Ch 379. But, even if that is the only safe and prudent course, why should the purchaser's imprudence relieve the vendor of the obligation of candour? a

Finally, and most formidably, reliance was placed on s 198(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, as amended by the Local Land Charges Act 1975. That deems the registration of any instrument or matter in any local land charges register to constitute 'actual notice of such instrument or matter, and of the fact of such registration, to all persons and for all purposes connected with the land affected . . .' b

Equity, it was submitted, and I agree, does not insist on the performance of idle rituals, and does not require a vendor to disclose to a purchaser matters already known to him. For this submission to help the defendant, however, the actual notice, of which s 198 speaks, must be equated with knowledge. That is the crucial equation which was made in Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract. c

In that case, land was sold free from incumbrances. In accordance with normal conveyancing practice, the purchaser's solicitor did not search the local land charges register until after exchange of contracts and shortly before the date fixed for completion. He then discovered that the local authority had resolved to prepare a town planning scheme. The resolution had been registered as a local land charge, but neither the vendor nor the purchaser was aware of its existence at the date of the contract. d

The purchaser applied for a declaration that the vendor had not shown a good title to the property sold in accordance with the contract and for repayment of the deposit. Her application was dismissed by Eve J and the Court of Appeal on the ground that a resolution to prepare a town planning scheme did not operate to impose a subsisting incumbrance on the land affected. At first instance, however, Eve J gave a second ground for this decision, on which the Court of Appeal expressed no opinion, that even if the registered resolution was an incumbrance, it was an incumbrance of which the purchaser must, under s 198, be deemed to have contracted with actual notice, and she was therefore precluded from refusing to complete the contract. He said ([1927] 2 Ch 379 at 387): e

[The vendor] has only to point to the section . . . to show that when the contract was entered into vendor and purchaser must alike be deemed to have known of the existence of the incumbrance which the purchaser insists on as a good ground for avoiding the contract.' (My emphasis.) f

Eve J thus equated the actual notice attributed to the purchaser by s 198 with knowledge for the purpose of the well-known rule that, in the case of an open contract for the sale of land, a purchaser cannot object to an irremovable incumbrance of which he was aware at the date of the contract. An incumbrance is irremovable if the owner of the land is not entitled as of right to procure its discharge by the payment of money. The rule rests on implication. A person who knows that a property has some incurable defect or is subject to some irremovable incumbrance, and yet contracts to buy it, must impliedly be taken to have agreed to accept the vendor's title despite the existence of that defect or incumbrance. To this extent the implication in an open contract that the property is sold free from incumbrances is negated. (Normally, the purchaser's knowledge of the state of the title cannot deprive him of the benefit of an express term that the land is sold free from incumbrances. Eve J attributed this to the parol evidence rule, but it would, I think, be more accurate to attribute it to the obvious impossibility, even if the evidence were received, of implying a term inconsistent with an express term of the contract.) The rule has no application to an incumbrance like that in the present case, which can be removed on payment: see s 77 of the 1974 Act. The purchaser's knowledge of such an incumbrance is not inconsistent with the vendor's obligation to make the payment necessary to obtain its discharge on completion: see Re Gloag and Miller's Contract (1883) 23 Ch D 320. Hence the crucial importance of the contractual provisions on which the defendant relies. g

This part of Eve J's judgment represents an alternative ground for his decision, and cannot be dismissed as merely obiter. It has stood for nearly 60 years, but not without challenge. It was greeted at the time by conveyancers with consternation and incredulity. Its interpretation of s 198 was described as 'startling' and its effect as 'revolutionary'. It has since been subjected to severe criticism by the editors of Emmett on Title (see, e.g. 19th edn (1986), para 1.013) and other eminent conveyancers. It has led to a change in conveyancing practice, which is both inconvenient and time-consuming, and which is unlikely to be adopted by those who buy at auction or who contract before consulting solicitors. For such purchasers, the decision constitutes a potential trap. Even in ordinary sales by private treaty, the need to search the local land charges register before contract rather than at the same time as the other registers, that is to say shortly before completion, is inconvenient and entails a delay which can put the contract at risk. Pre-contract searches of the land charges register, to which s 198 also applied, are, of course, impractical, since registration in that register (unlike the local land charges register) is effected against the name of the estate owner for the time being, and until contract it is not known against what names the search should be made.

These problems, aggravated by the reduction in the statutory period of title from 30 to 20 years, led to the reversal of the relevant part of Eve J's decision by s 24 of the Law of Property Act 1969, following the Law Commission Report on Land Charges Affecting Unregistered Land (Law Com no 18). That section, however, does not apply to local land charges, in respect of which pre-contract searches are feasible and had by 1969 become normal practice. In relation to local land charges, therefore, the decision in Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract has not been reversed by statute, but neither has it been confirmed thereby.

In my judgment, the equation of the actual notice referred to in s 198 with the state of mind required for terms to be implied into an open contract is deeply suspect. I find it impossible to reconcile with principle or authority. If a purchaser knows, or even mistakenly believes, that he cannot expect to obtain a title free from incumbrances, and yet enters into a contract of purchase on that basis, the inference is obvious. But the inference depends on his state of mind, which may be affected by error, or ignorance, or forgetfulness. Notice (even actual notice), however, has nothing to do with the person's state of mind, and is not affected by such matters. In the absence of knowledge, notice cannot support the necessary inference.

This is neatly demonstrated by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ellis v Rogers (1885) 29 Ch D 661. In that case the purchaser knew before he entered into the contract that the land was subject to restrictive covenants, but he wrongly believed that they had been extinguished when the land had been compulsorily acquired by a railway company. He later discovered that the covenants were still extant and would bind him if he completed. When he refused to complete, the vendor contended that, having known of the existence of the covenants from the outset, the purchaser must be taken to have agreed to accept the title subject to them. The Court of Appeal rejected this contention. As Cotton LJ put it (at 671):

'The vendor knew nothing of the covenants. The purchaser knew of them, but thought they had been discharged, so that both parties were contracting on the footing that a good title was to be made, and as a good title cannot be made, the purchaser is not bound.'

This shows that notice and knowledge are not synonymous. The purchaser had actual notice of the existence of the covenants. Had he completed before discovering his error, he would unquestionably have been bound by them as a purchaser with notice. His ignorance of their continuing subsistence, while negating any inference which might otherwise have been drawn from his knowledge of them, would not avail him against the covenantee, for it would not affect his notice of them.

There are two further grounds for suspecting Eve J's reasoning. Firstly, in Ellis v Rogers 29 Ch D 661 at 666 Kay J pointed out that to force the title on the purchaser it is essential that he should have knowledge, not only of the existence of the incumbrance, but of the vendor's inability to remove it. Section 198 cannot help with this. Unless consciously aware of the existence of an incumbrance, a purchaser cannot form any useful opinion on the vendor's ability to remove it. a

Secondly, it is unlikely that the notice attributed to the purchaser by s 198 was intended to have any greater effect than actual notice would have had before 1926; and notice of equities before 1926 had nothing to do with the relationship of vendor and purchaser or with the interpretation and effect of their contract of sale. It was concerned exclusively with the enforcement of third parties' rights. The fundamental rule of equity is that an equitable interest is binding on everyone, except a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The Land Charges Act 1925 substituted registration for notice, and was likewise concerned exclusively with the protection of third parties' rights. Section 198 of the Law of Property Act 1925 forms an integral part of the machinery of registration. In this context, the natural reading of s 198 is that registration constitutes actual notice to all persons and for all purposes for which such notice is material, that is to say for the purpose of the enforcement of third parties' rights against the land affected. b

In the present case the defendant asks me not merely to apply the decision in Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract, but to extend it by applying it in a different though closely related context. There, both vendor and purchaser were equally ignorant of the existence of the local land charge: it constituted an irremovable incumbrance; and the question was whether s 198 had the effect of modifying the vendor's contractual obligation to make a good title. Here, the defendant, through her solicitor, knew of the existence of the entry on the register; she could have procured its removal by repaying the grant if necessary; and the question is whether her failure to disclose what she knew prevents her from relying on the express terms of the contract. I cannot think that a vendor who knew of the existence of a registered charge, and who deliberately deceived the purchaser by telling him that there was no such charge, or that it was not registered, could escape liability for fraud by claiming that by virtue of s 198 the purchaser must be taken to have had actual notice of the truth. Similarly, I am not prepared to hold that a vendor who knows of a registered charge, and who wishes to make the sale subject to it, is exonerated by s 198 from his obligation to make full and frank disclosure of its existence before he can take advantage of an appropriate condition of sale. c

It is, therefore, not strictly necessary to reach any conclusion whether the decision in Re Forsey and Hollebone's Contract can be supported where the existence of a registered local land charge is unknown to the vendor at the date of contract, so that it is not unconscionable for him to rely on a special condition of sale without disclosing it, or where it represents an irremovable defect of title, so that he does not need to rely on any special condition. Such cases can be dealt with as and when they arise. In my judgment, the reasoning of the decision is too unsound to permit of any extension, however logical, to a situation not directly covered by it. d

I shall grant a declaration that the defendant failed to show a good title in accordance with the contract before 14 April 1986 and that the defendant is not entitled to interest on the balance of the purchase money; and I shall grant a decree of specific performance of the contract on payment by the plaintiff of the balance of the purchase price, less the costs of the plaintiff of obtaining the removal of the relevant entries on the local land charges register. e

Declarations and order accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

DILLON, GLIDEWELL LJ AND SIR EDWARD EVELEIGH

b

Contract – Unfair terms – Exclusion of liability for negligence – Surveyor – Surveyor making report to building society for mortgage application – Survey carried out negligently – Report containing disclaimer of responsibility – Purchaser relying on report – Surveyor knowing purchaser likely to rely on report – Whether fair and reasonable for surveyor to rely on disclaimer – Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, ss 2(2), 11(3).

The plaintiff applied to a building society for a mortgage to enable her to purchase a house. She paid an inspection fee of £38.89 and signed an application form which stated that a copy of the survey report and mortgage valuation obtained by the society would be given to the plaintiff. The form contained a disclaimer to the effect that neither the society nor its surveyor warranted that the report and valuation would be accurate and that the report and valuation would be supplied without any acceptance of responsibility.

The society instructed the defendant surveyors, who carried out the inspection. In due course the plaintiff received a copy of their report, which contained a disclaimer in terms similar to those on the application form. On the strength of the report the plaintiff purchased the property. In their inspection the defendants failed to notice that the chimney breasts had been removed and 18 months after the plaintiff purchased the house the flues collapsed, causing substantial damage. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for negligence and was awarded damages in the county court. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending that it was 'fair and reasonable', within ss 2(2)^a and 11(3)^b of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, for them to rely on their disclaimer of liability.

Held – A professional surveyor who prepared a report on a property for a building society knowing that the potential purchaser would be supplied with a copy of the report and was likely to rely on it without instructing his own surveyor was not entitled to rely on an all-embracing disclaimer of liability for negligence if his inspection was carried out without reasonable care because he had failed to exercise a reasonable degree of skill and competence. Although the defendants were under no duty to provide a full structural survey they were under an obligation to carry out a reasonably careful visual inspection and had that been done the defect which caused the damage would have been discovered. Accordingly, although the disclaimer would otherwise have been effective to relieve the defendants of liability, it would not in the circumstances be 'fair and reasonable', within ss 2(2) and 11(3) of the 1977 Act, for them to rely on it, because they knew that the report would be sent to the plaintiff and that she was likely to rely on it (see p 184 h, p 185 b to e, p 186 h to p 187 a d to g, post).

Appeal

The defendants, Eric S Bush (a firm), appealed against the decision of Mr Gerald Draycott sitting as an assistant recorder in the Norwich County Court on 17 April 1986 whereby in an action brought by the plaintiff, Jean Patricia Smith, against the defendants for damages for professional negligence in relation to a survey carried out by their senior partner, Mr Cannell, in relation to 242 Silver Road, Norwich, he awarded the plaintiff the sum of £4,379.97 damages including interest. The facts are set out in the judgment of Dillon LJ.

13 March. The following judgments were delivered.

DILLON LJ. The defendants in this action, a firm of surveyors, appeal against a judgment against them for damages for professional negligence awarded to the plaintiff by Mr Gerald Draycott, sitting as an assistant recorder, at the trial of this action in Norwich County Court on 17 April 1986. The appeal raises a question of some general importance as to the application of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977.

The story begins in 1980. At that time the plaintiff lived at Coulsdon in Surrey in a house which she owned and which was subject to a mortgage in favour of the Abbey National Building Society. She decided, however, to move to Norwich. Her personal circumstances were that she was a state enrolled nurse, but had been working for some months as a clerk for a well-known firm; she had divorced or was separated from her husband, and she had two children, both living with her, a girl of 15 and a boy of 12.

She found a purchaser for her house in Surrey, and she also offered for a house at Horsham St Faiths near Norwich. But that purchase fell through. By the beginning of October 1980 she was, as the judge's note of her evidence records, desperate to get another house in Norwich, because she had been offered a good price for her house in Surrey and did not want to lose her purchaser. She then found the house with which this action was concerned, 242 Silver Road, Norwich. It was on offer at an asking price of £17,250, but the vendor said that he already had someone else interested at that price, and so she agreed to buy the house, subject to contract, for £17,500. It was a terraced house, some 70 years old, at the lower end of the housing market, but the plaintiff regarded it as suitable for herself and her children as it was well decorated, had central heating, and she could move in without doing any work to it.

To raise the price she needed a mortgage, and so on 6 October 1980 she applied to the Abbey National for a mortgage and completed their standard mortgage application form. In fact she only required a mortgage for £3,500 which was well below the price of the house, but nothing turns on that.

Under s 25 of the Building Societies Act 1962 (now s 13 of the Building Societies Act 1986) a building society which makes an advance on the security of a freehold or a leasehold property has to get a report from an appropriately experienced person as to the value of that property and as to any matter likely to affect the value thereof. Building societies satisfy this requirement either by instructing firms of surveyors in general practice or by using their own in-house employed surveyors. In the present case, the Abbey National instructed the defendants, a firm of surveyors and valuers carrying on practice in Norwich; they acted by their senior partner, Mr Cannell, a chartered surveyor who was amply qualified for the job.

b It has always been the case that applicants for mortgages are required by the building society to pay the fees for the valuation reports which the societies are by the statute required to get. It used for many years to be the practice that the building societies refused to disclose the reports to the applicants, on the footing that they were only obtained for the building societies' own purposes. But this practice gave rise to widespread discontent in that applicants could not see why they should not have copies of reports for which they had paid. Before October 1980, therefore, the building societies had adopted instead a new practice of making copies of the reports available to the applicants for mortgages, but with extensive disclaimers of liability.

c In accordance with this new practice, there was included on a somewhat lengthy set of declarations just above the place where the plaintiff signed the mortgage application form the following:

d 'I/We have read the Notes for the guidance of Mortgage Applicants and accept that if the loan is approved the Mortgage Guarantee Policy Premium will be added to the Loan. I/We accept that the Society will provide me/us with a copy of the report and mortgage valuation which the Society will obtain in relation to this application. I/We understand that the Society is not the agent of the Surveyor or firm of Surveyors and that I am making no agreement with the Surveyor or firm of Surveyors. I/We understand that neither the Society nor the Surveyor or the firm of Surveyors will warrant, represent or give any assurance to me /us that the statements, conclusions and opinions expressed or implied in the report and mortgage valuation will be accurate or valid and the Surveyor(s) report will be supplied without any acceptance of responsibility on their part to me/us.'

f Just below her signature it is recorded that she had paid the inspection fee which was £36.89. There is a somewhat similarly worded disclaimer of liability in printed notes for the guidance of mortgage applicants which it was the practice of the Abbey National to supply to all mortgage applicants, but I need not refer to those notes because the disclaimer there adds nothing to what appears in the mortgage application form, as above set out, and in the copy of the defendants' report which was supplied to the plaintiff as mentioned below.

g Mr Cannell inspected the property on 8 October 1980. It is common ground that he was not required to carry out a structural survey. What he was required to do was to make a reasonably careful visual inspection of the property, and to fill in the Abbey National's standard printed form headed 'Report and Mortgage Valuation'. Mr Cannell h said that he would usually spend about half an hour on an inspection for a building society; that was generally in line with the evidence, as to their own practice, given at the trial by two other experienced surveyors, Mr Manwaring and Mr Wreford. It seems that thousands of such inspections and reports are made by surveyors for the purpose of building society mortgage applications every year over England and Wales as a whole.

j A copy of Mr Cannell's report was sent by the Abbey National to the plaintiff under cover of a letter from the Abbey National dated 9 October 1980. The report gives the value of the property for mortgage purposes, with vacant possession, as £16,500. It answers affirmatively the printed question whether the property was readily saleable for the purposes of owner occupation and was likely to remain so at or about the mortgage valuation. The report states that the property had been modernised in recent years to a fair standard and that no essential repairs were required. The report amply warrants the plaintiff's reaction to it, as expressed in her evidence at the trial:

'The impression I got from the Report was that I was very pleased with it; it did not show anything seriously wrong with the property'.

On the third page of the copy of the report sent to the plaintiff there was the disclaimer on which the defendants particularly rely, distinctively printed in red, whereas the rest of the form is printed in black. It is as follows:

'TO THE MORTGAGE APPLICANT(S):

IMPORTANT

1. THIS DOCUMENT IS NOT A MARKET VALUATION. IT IS NOT AND SHOULD NOT BE TAKEN AS, A STRUCTURAL SURVEY. It has been obtained by the Society from a qualified surveyor or firm of surveyors to comply with Section 25 of the Building Societies Act 1962.
2. If you are purchasing the property, you will receive a notice that the Society does not warrant that the purchase price is reasonable.
3. This is a report to the Society by its surveyor(s) and neither the Society nor the surveyor(s) give any warranty representation or assurance to you that the statements, conclusions and opinions expressed or implied in the document are accurate or valid.
4. The surveyor(s) has/have made this report without any acceptance of responsibility on his/her part to you.'

The plaintiff admits that she read this.

The plaintiff then proceeded to buy the property. She was forced by her vendor to increase her offer to £18,000, but nothing turns on that. She did not have any other survey of the property done because, as she said in evidence and the judge accepted, she relied on the building society survey.

Unfortunately, in his inspection of the property Mr Cannell overlooked a serious defect. He noticed that the chimney breasts in two of the first floor rooms, including the main bedroom, had been cut away, but it did not occur to him to check whether that had been done in a way which left the chimneys adequately supported. Had it occurred to him to check, it would have been easy to have done so (since there was a trap door through which he could have looked into the roof space with the aid of the ladder he had with him) and it would have taken him no more than ten minutes. Had he checked he would have seen at once that the brickwork of the chimneys had been left unsupported by the removal of the chimney breasts. The absence of adequate supports meant inevitably, as explained by Mr Manwaring at the trial, that the flues would collapse at some time. The house was thus in truth a dangerous structure, and unfit for habitation until adequate support for the flues had been provided.

Some 18 months later, at about 10.30 pm on 1 June 1982, the inevitable happened. One of the flues collapsed through the main bedroom and landing ceilings, bringing down part of another flue with it. Rubble came down the stairs into the lounge. Fortunately the plaintiff was downstairs at the time; had she been in her bed she might have been killed or seriously injured. The building work to get the place right was put in hand at once by the plaintiff, but it was five weeks before she could move back into her bedroom.

By this action the plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants for the negligence of Mr Cannell in failing to check whether the removal of the chimney breasts had left the chimneys without adequate support and consequently failing to give in his report correct advice as to the condition of the property. The assistant recorder upheld the plaintiff's claim, and awarded her £4,379.97 damages, including interest.

On this appeal two points only are raised to which I shall come. The defendants do not dispute the assistant recorder's findings (i) that in preparing his report Mr Cannell owed a duty of care to the plaintiff, apart from the disclaimers which I have mentioned, since he knew that she was likely to rely on his report, (ii) that she did indeed rely on his report, (iii) that he was negligent in the sense that in carrying out a reasonably careful visual inspection of the property he ought to have looked to see whether the chimneys a above had been left with adequate support after the removal of the chimney breasts and (iv) that there was no contributory negligence on the plaintiff's part.

The defendants do not in this court dispute the amount of damages awarded in the court below, if liability is established.

b The defendants submit, however, (1) that the disclaimers, ie the provisions set out above in the form of mortgage application signed by the plaintiff and in the notice in red on the copy of Mr Cannell's report which was supplied to the plaintiff, have the effect of absolving the defendants from all liability for negligence which would otherwise have fallen on them and (2) that the 1977 Act does not preclude the defendants from relying on the disclaimers because, they submit, the requirement of reasonableness under s 11(3) of the 1977 Act is satisfied in relation to the disclaimers.

c The assistant recorder held against the defendants on issue (1) because he found that it was an implied condition of the disclaimers that if the disclaimers were to apply there should have been a complete visual inspection of all parts of the fabric of the house. In other words, the disclaimers would have applied if Mr Cannell had looked into the roof space but had then negligently failed to see what was plain before his eyes there, but they did not apply as he negligently failed to look into the roof space at all. Counsel for the d plaintiff in this court have, rightly, felt unable to support the reasoning of the assistant recorder on this issue, but they have submitted that the wording of the disclaimers is not sufficiently explicit to exempt the defendants from liability for negligence. They say that so far as the defendants' position is concerned (as opposed to the Abbey National's position) the disclaimers merely told the plaintiff that the defendants had not carried out a full structural survey of the property and that she had no contract with the defendants.

e Reference was made in a general way in the course of argument to the well-known line of authorities, stemming from Alderslade v Hendon Laundry Ltd [1945] 1 All ER 244, [1945] KB 189 in which the courts have considered the principles which are applicable to clauses which purport to exempt one party to a contract from liability to the other party for the consequences of the first party's own negligence. Assuming, however, that f those are the principles which ought to be applied to the construction of these disclaimers, I find it impossible to conclude that the disclaimers do not cover tortious liability of the defendants for negligence. The final words in the notice on the copy of the report supplied to the plaintiff: 'The surveyor(s) has/have made this report without any acceptance of responsibility on his/their part to you' and the corresponding words at the end of the declaration in the form of mortgage application are really meaningless if they do not extend to responsibility or liability in negligence. If authority is required, it is to

h At common law, as is recognised in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 586–587, 595, [1964] AC 465 at 492, 504 per Lord Reid and Lord Morris, where there is no contract the assumption of a duty of care can by appropriate words be avoided, eg where a reference is given 'without responsibility'; and where a report is supplied subject to stipulations disclaiming responsibility the recipient cannot accept the report and ignore the stipulations. Apart, therefore, from the 1977 Act, the disclaimers relied on would, in my judgment, have provided an effective defence for the defendants against the plaintiff's claim.

j I turn, therefore, to consider issue (2), the effect of the 1977 Act. The relevant sections of the 1977 Act are as follows:

'2.—(1) A person cannot by reference to any contract term or to a notice given to persons generally or to particular persons exclude or restrict his liability for death or personal injury resulting from negligence.

(2) In the case of other loss or damage, a person cannot so exclude or restrict his liability for negligence except in so far as the term or notice satisfies the requirement of reasonableness . . .

II . . . (3) In relation to a notice (not being a notice having contractual effect), the requirement of reasonableness under this Act is that it should be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on it, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining when the liability arose or (but for the notice) would have arisen . . .

Under s 11(5) the onus is on those claiming that a contract term or notice satisfies the requirement of reasonableness to show that it does.

The assistant recorder includes in his judgment a finding that he had not been satisfied by the defendants that in all the circumstances of this case it would be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on the disclaimers. But this is tacked on to the section of his judgment which deals with the quantum of damages and it may relate back to the assistant recorder's view that the disclaimers were inadequate because Mr Cannell had never looked into the roof space at all.

The question is whether the requirement of reasonableness, referred to in s 2(2) of the 1977 Act is satisfied, i.e. whether, on the words of s 11(3), it is fair and reasonable to allow reliance on the disclaimers, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining at the relevant time. In view of the generality of the words 'all the circumstances', counsel for the defendants concedes that the court is not limited to considering merely the questions whether the notice referred to in the section was sufficiently clearly brought to the attention of the person concerned or was sufficiently clearly expressed for that person to have been able to understand it.

Whether in any particular case it is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances to allow reliance on a notice excluding liability for negligence must, of course, depend on the circumstances of the particular case. In that sense no case is a precedent for any other case. But the circumstances of the present case are very ordinary, and we are told that there were many other cases waiting the outcome of this appeal. That is not surprising considering the number of building society surveys that are carried out. It appears that it is the practice of very many, if not all, building societies to include as a matter of course in their printed forms disclaimers, to protect the society itself and its surveyors from all liability, in substantially the same terms as the disclaimers in the present case.

It is common ground that it was no part of Mr Cannell's duty to carry out a full structural survey of the house, and this was understood by the plaintiff. She knew that she was taking a chance on there being no hidden defects in the house which would not have been apparent on a reasonably careful visual inspection of the house. To hold that the surveyor in such a case as the present cannot rely on the disclaimers does not involve extending the surveyor's obligations so as to make it incumbent on him to detect such hidden defects. His obligation is still merely to carry out a reasonably careful visual inspection.

But where he is dealing with a property at the lower end of the market and he knows that the purchaser is likely to rely on his report, and not instruct his or her own surveyor, I find it very difficult to see why it should be fair and reasonable to allow him to rely on an automatic blanket exclusion of all liability for negligence if his visual inspection of a property turns out not to have been reasonably careful.

The defendants have urged various considerations as showing that it is fair and reasonable that they should be allowed to rely on the disclaimers. They are all general considerations, unrelated to the particular facets of this case, and they are said to warrant an automatic blanket exclusion of all liability to mortgage applicants for negligence in respect of building society surveys. They say, for instance, they, the surveyors, never meet the mortgage applicants and so have no opportunity of clarifying or explaining anything they may have put in a report for a building society. They say also that it is of great benefit to the mortgage applicants that the report required by a building society under the statute, before it can agree to make a mortgage advance, should be available a quickly and cheaply, and they suggest that neither of these ends will be attained if the surveyor has always in his mind the fear of litigation and the need to satisfy his insurers. They also naturally point to the fact that the interests of the building society, merely as mortgagee and the interest of the purchaser as owner of the equity of redemption are not the same; but this point is greatly weakened when it is seen that the report covers such questions, in which the purchaser is vitally interested, as the marketability of the property and whether urgent repairs to the property are required.

b Giving full consideration to all that has been urged by counsel for the defendants, I cannot see that it is fair or reasonable that a professional surveyor making a mortgage report at the lower end of the property market, when he knows that the would-be purchaser who is applying for a mortgage on the property has paid the fee for the report, will be supplied with a copy of the report and is likely to rely on the report and so is not likely to instruct any other surveyor, should be able to rely on any general disclaimers, c such as those in the present case, unrelated to any special factors affecting the particular property, to exempt him from liability to the purchaser for negligence if it should happen that he, the surveyor, carries out his visual inspection of the property without due care.

d It may be different, I express no opinion, where the mortgage applicant who chooses to rely on a building society's surveyor's report, despite having read such disclaimers, is himself a surveyor or a lawyer who understands these matters. So far as the plaintiff was concerned, and I fancy this would go for most purchasers, I do not think she would have seen any reason to incur the additional cost of instructing a second surveyor after she had read the copy of Mr Cannell's report.

e I do not doubt that Mr Cannell, when he makes a visual inspection of a property with a view to making a mortgage report to a building society, intends to act with reasonable care. I do not see why he should not be liable in damages like any other professional man who fails to show reasonable care if on a particular occasion he has failed to take reasonable care in his inspection.

I would accordingly dismiss this appeal.

f GLIDEWELL LJ. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgment of Dillon LJ. I gratefully adopt his recital of the facts, including the relevant documents.

There are two issues in this appeal: (1) on their face, did the words of the disclaimer suffice to prevent any duty of care being owed by the defendants to the plaintiff? (2) if so, did the disclaimer satisfy the requirement of reasonableness in the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, ss 2(2) and 11(3).

g (1) The effect of the disclaimer

h The documents which are particularly important are the declaration on the mortgage application form signed by the plaintiff and the notice at the end of the defendants' report of 8 October 1980, below their valuation. Dillon LJ has set this out in his judgment. The plaintiff said in evidence that she read this notice. We are thus not concerned with the question whether the disclaimer was brought to her attention. Clearly it was.

The reason which the assistant recorder gave for holding that the disclaimer was not sufficient to avoid responsibility, ie that there was an implied condition that, if the disclaimer is to apply, there should have been a complete visual inspection, is unsound. Counsel for the plaintiff did not attempt to rely on it.

i Counsel's argument is that the disclaimer did not cover liability for negligence. If that is correct, the disclaimer did not cover anything. The plaintiff was never in a contractual relationship with the defendants. If they were or could be liable to her, that liability could only be in the tort of negligence, which is how the plaintiff's claim is framed.

The payment by the plaintiff of £36.89 was not a payment of a fee for the provision of a report to her. The building society required the inspection, report and valuation by a surveyor for their own purposes and to comply with s 25 of the Building Societies Act 1962. At 6 October 1980 the only contract was a promise by the building society to obtain a report and valuation and then consider whether to make to the plaintiff the mortgage loan she required in consideration of the payment of £36.89 to them. a

In my view, the wording of the disclaimer set out in the notice on the defendants' report and valuation did suffice to prevent the defendants' owing any duty of care to the plaintiff. In other words, it was so worded as to relieve them of all liability in negligence. b

(2) Did that notice satisfy the test of reasonableness in the 1977 Act?

In other words, is it 'fair and reasonable to allow reliance on it, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining' at 8 October 1980, i.e. the date of the report? This is a question of policy, which could sensibly be answered either way.

The argument for the plaintiff, as it eventually emerged, is that it is necessary to distinguish between a disclaimer of liability for not doing something which the defendants were not purporting to do, i.e. carrying out a full structural survey, and doing incompetently that which Mr Cannell was purporting to do, i.e. making a visual inspection sufficient to reveal any state of disrepair which would affect the value of the property, to ascertain the general condition of the property, and to place a value on it. It is submitted that it is unfair to exclude liability for negligence in the latter category. c

Counsel for the defendants has two main arguments on this. (a) The lack of support for the chimney flues in the roof space and the chimney stack above would only have been revealed by a full structural survey, not by a visual inspection of the sort Mr Cannell was carrying out. In my view this is not correct. The judge accepted the evidence of Mr Manwaring, a chartered building surveyor called as an expert witness for the plaintiff, that the fact that the chimney breasts had been removed (which Mr Cannell observed) should have put him on inquiry as to whether the flues and stack above had been left unsupported. That inquiry would have involved no more than putting his head and shoulders through the trap door into the roof space, when the lack of support would at once have been apparent. The judge said that it would have taken no more than ten minutes to check, and that Mr Cannell should have looked through the trap door but did not. I agree with him. In my view Mr Cannell was guilty of lack of proper care in doing the sort of inspection he was purporting to do. (b) That Mr Cannell was carrying out the inspection for, and reporting to, the building society and for nobody else. Counsel argues that it is not fair or reasonable that the defendants should be under any duty of care to a potential purchaser, with whom they had no contractual relationship, simply because the building society chose to supply a copy of their report to the plaintiff. This is the nub of the case. If a surveyor's inspection is completely carried out, a potential purchaser who chooses not to commission his own inspection, despite the warning notice, will obtain the benefit of the report. But, counsel argues, he cannot justifiably complain if the inspection failed to reveal some defect which a reasonably competent inspection should have revealed. d

It is my opinion that this argument fails because its basic premise is incorrect. While it is true that the surveyor carried out his inspection and wrote his report and valuation because he was commissioned to do so by the building society, he knew that a copy of his report would be sent to the plaintiff and that most probably she would rely on his report and valuation without obtaining any other advice. In my judgment a professional man, who knows that a potential purchaser of a house (herself possessed of no special skill) will most probably rely on his skill and competence, should not be allowed to relieve himself of liability if he fails to exercise a reasonable degree of skill and competence in the task on which he is engaged. h

In agreement with Dillon LJ I would thus hold that, in so far as the disclaimer excluded liability for negligence in the carrying out of the limited sort of inspection Mr Cannell was engaged to do and was purporting to do, the notice of disclaimer did not satisfy the a requirement of reasonableness within ss 2(2) and 11(3) of the 1977 Act. For this reason I, too, would dismiss the appeal.

SIR EDWARD EVELEIGH. Section 2(1) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 prevents the defendant firm from excluding 'liability for negligence except in so far as the term or notice satisfies the requirement of reasonableness'.

b In the present case it is first necessary to decide whether or not there would be liability for negligence apart from the notice which seeks to exclude that liability.

The words in red displayed prominently in the report are not simply a disclaimer of liability. They also constitute a warning that the report is of limited value as a survey report. If the plaintiff had relied on the report to an extent which would be unreasonable bearing in mind the warning, there would be no liability on the defendants and no need to consider the efficacy of a notice excluding liability.

c However, in so far as the words constitute a warning, they do not in my opinion warn a person to place no reliance at all on the report. They do not say that it is dangerous to rely on the report for what it purports to be or for what it says.

d The report did not reveal what a valuation report would have revealed if properly prepared, albeit for its limited purpose. On the contrary, it asserted that the property was readily saleable for the purpose of owner occupation. The plaintiff relied on it in this respect but the report did not merit even that degree of confidence. The warning, in my opinion, was not such as to make it unreasonable for the plaintiff to rely on the report as she did. Therefore, the defendants will be liable to the plaintiff unless the notice is effective to exclude liability.

e In this court counsel has not sought to argue that the defendants would not have been liable in the absence of a notice of disclaimer. None the less, I have analysed the position because I think it is important to bear in mind the basis of the defendants' liability when considering whether or not it would be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on the notice, having regard to all the circumstances obtaining when the liability arose.

f A relevant part of the circumstances obtaining when liability arose was the fact that the report stated that the house was readily saleable for the purpose of owner-occupation and was likely to remain so. There was no warning that this assertion was unreliable. It would have been perfectly simple to discover the dangerous state of the premises. No structural survey was needed for that. The least attention to the task that the plaintiff was entitled to expect from the defendants would have revealed the fault. The defendants' fault can hardly be regarded as a mere accidental error or omission.

g I therefore am of the opinion that it would not be fair and reasonable to allow reliance on a disclaimer which might, I know not, be effective in other circumstances.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to House of Lords refused.

FAMILY DIVISION

LATEY J

Divorce – Foreign decree – Recognition by English court – Recognition of foreign judgment – Judgment conclusive between the parties – Jewish get divorce obtained in London – ‘Judgment of confirmation’ by rabbinical court in Israel – Whether Jewish get divorce capable of recognition by English court – Whether statutory provisions relating to reciprocal enforcement of foreign judgments applying to judgments of marital status – Whether Jewish get an extra-judicial proceeding – Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933, s 8(1) – Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973, s 16(1).

The wife married her first husband in 1968 in Israel. In 1974 they settled in England. The marriage subsequently broke down and on 2 June 1977 they went to the Beth Din, a religious court staffed by rabbis, in London where the husband granted and the wife accepted a Jewish get divorce, ie a paper stating that the marriage was dissolved according to Jewish law. A rabbinical court in Israel subsequently issued a ‘judgment of confirmation’ certifying that the requirements of the get had been complied with according to Jewish law. On 7 August 1978 the wife went through a ceremony of marriage with another man. On the breakdown of that relationship the wife presented two petitions, firstly a petition (which was not defended) for a decree of nullity of the second marriage, on the ground that her first marriage had not been validly dissolved according to English law, and secondly a petition for a decree of divorce in respect of her first marriage, on the ground of five years’ separation. The first husband contested that petition, contending that the marriage had been dissolved by the get together with the judgment of confirmation, which was entitled to recognition under s 8(1)^a of the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933 because it was ‘conclusive between the parties thereto in all proceedings founded on the same cause of action’.

Held – On its true construction, s 8(1) of the 1933 Act did not apply to judgments of marital status, since such judgments did not solely affect the ‘parties thereto’ but had a wider significance and affected the interests of others, such as the state and any children of the marriage. Furthermore, the ‘cause of action’ in the proceedings before the court was not the same as that which had been before the rabbinical court and accordingly, s 8(1) had no application. The get was an extra-judicial proceeding and as such was expressly excluded by s 16(1)^b of the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 from validly dissolving the wife’s first marriage under English law because the get was not a proceeding instituted in an English court of law, with the result that the second marriage was void. Both petitions would therefore be granted (see p 190 g h and p 192 a to d, post).

d The petitioner, Louise Rachel Maples (formerly Melamud) (the wife), presented two petitions. The first, filed on 2 April 1984 and amended on 15 January 1986, prayed for the dissolution of her marriage with her first husband, Mr Yair Melamud, which had taken place on 3 September 1968, on the ground that they had been separated for five years or more. The first husband contested the petition on the ground that the marriage had been validly dissolved by a Jewish get divorce obtained from the Beth Din, London on 2 June 1977 coupled with a 'judgment of confirmation' issued by the Haifa Rabbinical Court on 31 July 1977 which ought to be recognised under the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1933. The wife's second petition filed on 31 May 1985 was an undefended petition for a decree of nullity of the ceremony of marriage between the wife and Mr Stephen Maples on 7 August 1978 at the registry office in St Albans, on the ground that her marriage to the first husband had not been dissolved according to English law. The facts are set out in the judgment.

g LATEY J. The petitioner (the wife) presents two petitions. She asks for a decree of nullity of her ceremony of marriage with Mr Maples on 7 August 1978; and she asks for a decree of divorce of her marriage with Mr Melamud on 3 September 1968. The result of both petitions depends on whether a Jewish get divorce dissolved the marriage according to English law.

h What happened was this. In September 1968 the wife and Mr Melamud married in Haifa. The wife's mother was Jewish; her father was British and Christian. Mr Melamud is Jewish. There are two children, boys: Eytan (born 27 July 1970), 16½ years old and Daniel (born 23 October 1974), 12 years old.

j Between 1968 and 1974 they lived together in Haifa. Then, in September 1973, there was the Yom Kippur War and the husband was called up as an army reservist. In January 1974 the wife's father died and her mother was ill. In May 1974 the wife and Eytan came to England. At that time the wife was carrying Daniel. In August 1974, on release from the army, the husband joined them in England and obtained employment here. In October 1974 Daniel was born, and in 1973 they bought a house in London.

It is convenient to say here, that after the issues on the petitions are decided there will, or may, be financial issues to be decided; and they may involve questions of conduct. At this stage I am dealing solely with the two petitions and the question of marital status they involve.

Late in 1976 and early in 1977 the marriage went adrift. For present purposes the reasons do not matter. Divorce was discussed. The husband, Mr Melamud, was ready to agree to a Jewish get divorce, but not to an English civil divorce which would have involved allegations of one kind or another being made, which neither wished to make against the other. So, after preliminary inquiries, on 2 June 1977 they went to the Beth Din, Tavistock Square. There, with the formalities which are required duly complied with, the husband granted and the wife accepted a get, a paper stating and acknowledging that their marriage was dissolved according to Jewish law. The wife went to live with Mr Maples. On the advice of the Beth Din, Mr Melamud wrote to the rabbinical court at Haifa. On 31 July 1977 the District Rabbinical Court of Haifa issued a 'judgment of confirmation' of the London Beth Din divorce; a 'judgment of confirmation' is how the Hebrew is translated in the translation prepared for these proceedings.

The wife and Mr Maples wanted to marry. The Registrar General refused to authorise a marriage between them because of his understanding of the position in English law. The wife says she told the husband about this and asked for a civil divorce. Her husband refused that but said he would 'sort it out'.

In April 1978 the husband, when next in Haifa, went to the Rabbinical Court and there emerged another 'judgment of confirmation', which omitted mention that the divorce had taken place in the Beth Din in London. It is agreed that this was a colourable transaction with no materiality to the issues in this case; but it sufficed to enable the wife and Mr Maples to go through a ceremony of marriage, though the Registrar General wrote a cautionary letter stressing that it was questionable whether the marriage would be valid in English law. On 7 August 1978 the wife and Mr Maples went through a ceremony of marriage.

This brief history omits much which may be relevant in any ancillary financial proceedings. As I have said, I am dealing now solely with the two petitions concerned with matrimonial status.

The wife now petitions (1) for a decree of nullity of the ceremony of marriage with Mr Maples, on the ground that her marriage with Mr Melamud was not dissolved according to English law; Mr Maples does not contest that petition, (2) for a decree of divorce of her marriage with Mr Melamud on the ground that they have been separated for five years or more. Mr Melamud contests the petition, on the ground that their marriage was in fact validly dissolved. He accepts that if he is mistaken about that, she is entitled to a divorce decree on the ground of five years' separation.

Both petitions depend on one question only: was the get, coupled with the judgment of confirmation, a dissolution of the marriage valid in English law? The experts in Israeli law are agreed that the granting by the husband of the get, and the acceptance of it by the wife, at the Beth Din in London effectively and finally dissolved their marriage according to Israeli law.

This was an extra-judicial proceeding and, if the matter stopped there, it would have no validity in English law by reason of the provisions of s 16(1) of the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973. This provides:

'No proceeding in the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man shall be regarded as validly dissolving a marriage unless instituted in the courts of law of one of those countries.'

It is a simple, straightforward enactment. The proceeding in the Beth Din, London, was not a proceeding instituted in an English court of law. It is, no doubt, because of this that the guidance issued by the Jewish Marriage Council and the Beth Din, London stresses the importance, indeed the necessity, of obtaining a civil divorce in the courts.

So, the get of 2 June 1977 is only valid in English law if there is some basis of recognition other than pursuant to the 1973 Act. For Mr Melamud it is contended that a For the wife it is contended that the 1933 Act does not provide any such basis.

Counsel remarked that the decision may have far-reaching implications for the Jewish community, and probably for the Muslim and other communities, here where there is extra-judicial 'divorce'. They have researched widely and have argued the case fully and helpfully.

b Counsel for Mr Melamud bases his contention on a passage in the judgment of Sir John Arnold P in the Court of Appeal in Vervaeke v Smith (Messina and A-G intervening) [1981] 1 All ER 55 at 89–90, [1981] Fam 77 at 125–126. In that passage Sir John Arnold P sets out the relevant sections of the 1933 Act which led him to the view that, contrary to its seeming tenor, the Act does apply to judgments of marital status.

c It is to be observed, firstly, that what the President said was obiter. Secondly, that on this particular point he was in a minority. Both Cumming-Bruce and Eveleigh LJ were doubtful whether the 1933 Act applied to matrimonial cases involving judgments of status. The fact that matrimonial causes are mentioned in the Act could be explained on the basis that money judgments in matrimonial causes are envisaged. Thirdly, the 'judgment' in that case was a decree of nullity given in the Belgian courts.

d Counsel for the husband accepts that the get granted at the Beth Din was what dissolved the marriage in Israeli law, and that he cannot rely on that as dissolving the marriage in English law, or, of course, as something to which the 1933 Act could apply. But he submits that the 'judgment' in the Haifa Rabbinical Court is covered by the Act.

e What did that 'judgment' do? It did not dissolve the marriage. The marriage had already been dissolved in Israeli law by the get in England. That is agreed. All it did was to certify that the requirements for a valid get (valid, that is to say, in Israeli law) had been met at the Beth Din. It would be strange indeed, if that certification could be registered and recognised under the 1933 Act as validly dissolving the marriage in English law.

Counsel for the wife argues that the whole ring and tenor of the 1933 Act concerns commercial and tortious situations and the normal range of civil actions not involving status.

f In the field of matrimonial law there are express statutory provisions dealing with validity and recognition of divorce and nullity decrees: the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations Act 1971 and the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973. Are the provisions of those Acts outflanked by the 1933 Act? The language of the relevant parts of that Act, especially s 8(1), is convoluted and difficult to fathom, at any rate in this context. I am not alone in finding it so. Lord Reid described it as 'obscure'. In Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810 at 817, [1975] AC 591 at 617 Lord Reid said:

h 'It is said that the effect of these obscure words in s 8(1) is to make the section apply to all judgments which would come within the terms of s 1(2) if condition (b) were omitted. Besides the fact that this would be a very odd way of bringing in another section of the Act that cannot be right. If (b) is omitted then s 1(2) would apply to every kind of judgment including judgments on status, family matters and in rem. No one suggests that s 8 was meant to deal with them.'

Those dicta were obiter but, coming from such a source, they are powerful and persuasive.

j Sir John Arnold P, in the Vervaeke case said that s 8 'is not framed so as to yield up its meaning easily or quickly' (see [1981] 1 All ER 55 at 89, [1981] Fam 77 at 125). In Dicey and Morris on the Conflict of Laws (10th edn, 1980), vol 2, p 1075 it is described as a 'tortuously drafted provision'.

In my opinion, it can indeed lead to the interpretation which Sir John Arnold P reached in the Vervaeke case. But if that is the correct interpretation it has odd results, some of which I have already described.

But in my judgment, looking at the relevant provisions as a whole, the correct interpretation is that the 1933 Act does not apply to judgments of marital status. a

As well as those already mentioned, there are other indications pointing in that direction. There are the words in s 8(1), omitting immaterial words, 'a judgment . . . shall be recognised . . . as conclusive between the parties thereto in all proceedings founded on the same cause of action . . .' A decree or judgment affecting marital status has a wider significance than solely to 'the parties thereto'. The state has an interest. So may others: children, for example. Nor is 'cause of action' apt language for such proceedings. In the instant case, in fact, the 'cause of action,' if it can be so described, in these proceedings is not the same as that in the Rabbinical Court in Haifa. b

Counsel for the wife advanced some further supplementary arguments. I do not reject them, but I think it unnecessary to repeat them.

For the reasons already given, in my judgment the 1933 Act does not apply to the Haifa judgment or certification. It follows that s 16(1) of the 1973 Act does apply, and that the get did not, in English law, validly dissolve the Melamud marriage. Accordingly, the ceremony of marriage with Mr Maples was void and on that petition there will be a decree of nullity. c

The marriage with Mr Melamud has irretrievably broken down and they have lived apart for more than five years. On that petition there will be a decree of divorce.

There will be a declaration that there are the two relevant children, Eytan and Daniel, and a certificate of satisfaction as to the arrangements for their care. d

To provide for certain possibilities and contingencies, counsel have asked that there be findings as to the parties' domicile at material times. Evidence has been given and the position is clear, in my judgment: Mr Melamud's domicile of origin was Israel and he has at no time abandoned it; that is conceded. The wife's father was and remained domiciled in England and that was her domicile of origin. She retained it until she married Mr Melamud. In January 1974 she ceased to be dependently domiciled in Israel but in fact remained so until some time after she came, and then he came, to live in England later in 1974. In 1975 they bought their house in London. The marriage went wrong. Her domicile of choice withered away during those years, and before the Beth Din get she had reverted to her domicile of origin in England, and she has never abandoned it. e

JOHN MOWBRAY QC SITTING AS A DEPUTY JUDGE OF THE HIGH COURT

13 MARCH, 8 APRIL 1987

Administration of estates – Distribution – Shares – Gift of shares in private company – Majority shareholding – Majority shareholding worth more per share than minority shareholdings – Beneficiary entitled to 46/80ths of estate – Whether beneficiary entitled to 46/80ths of shares in company or to 46/80ths of value of estate – Whether trustee required to sell company on open market and distribute proceeds in specified proportions.

The testator owned 999 of the 1,000 shares in a company of which he was chairman, the one remaining share being held by his wife. The testator died on 8 December 1979 and by his will the shares formed part of his residuary estate, which was bequeathed to his wife and other beneficiaries in specified proportions, the wife's share being 46/80ths, with the result that she claimed to be entitled to 574 shares. The shares were never transferred to the wife, who died on 26 January 1982. By her will she left her whole estate to D, who requested the executor of both estates to transfer the 574 shares to him. Other beneficiaries objected on the ground that since the majority shareholding was worth more per share than the other shares D would be getting a greater value than 46/80ths of the testator's estate if the shares were transferred to him. The objecting beneficiaries submitted that all 999 shares should be sold on the open market and the proceeds divided among the beneficiaries according to their respective proportions. The executor sought the court's determination whether the 574 shares could be transferred to D or whether they should be sold on the open market.

Held – Although as a general rule a person entitled to an aliquot share of an estate was entitled to insist on a corresponding part of the estate property being distributed to him intact if it was readily divisible, rather than the whole property being sold and the proceeds distributed, the trustees of an estate were bound to hold an even hand among the beneficiaries and not to favour one as against the others. Accordingly, since the majority shareholding which D had requested be transferred to him was worth markedly more per share than the minority holdings, whether taken singly or as a whole, so that D would receive more than 46/80ths of the estate if the 574 shares were transferred to him, the executor's duty was to sell all the shares on the open market and then distribute the proceeds according to the proportions specified in the will (see p 197 c to g, p 198 h and p 199 a b d to f, post).

Originating summons

By summons dated 1 July 1986 the plaintiff, Lloyds Bank plc (the bank), sought (i) the determination of the question whether in the due administration of the estate of Rowland Smith (the testator) it was the duty of the bank (a) to comply with the request of the first defendant, Vernon Terence Dudley Duker, that the bank transfer to him at least 574 shares of £1 each in Rowland Smith Hotels Ltd out of the testator's holding of 999 shares in that company, or (b) to comply with the request of the second, third and fourth defendants, Violet Rose Smith, Leslie Brian Smith and Irene Lilian Smith, that the bank sell all the testator's holding of 999 shares in the open market, or (c) to take some other (and if so, what) steps in relation to such shareholding, and (ii) such further direction as might be given by the court concerning all or any of the 999 shares. The other respondents to the summons were the fifth and sixth defendants, Joan Muriel Belleini and Irene Madge Gladman, who together with the second, third and fourth defendants were the minority beneficiaries of the testator's estate. The facts are set out in the judgment.

8 April. The following judgment was delivered.

JOHN MOWBRAY QC. The late Mr Rowland Smith was the registered holder of all but one of the 1,000 issued shares in Rowland Smith Hotels Ltd, and his wife, Mrs Smith, held the other. Mr Smith was chairman of the company and Mrs Smith was a director too. It is a private company and it owns the Palace Hotel at Torquay, which is a well-known luxury hotel with (as counsel on instructions agreed) 142 rooms set in 25 acres of grounds.

Mr Smith died on 8 December 1979. He made a will on 15 March 1973 and Mrs Smith and Lloyds Bank plc (the bank) proved it as his executors on 12 May 1980. Mr Smith's 999 shares in the company fall into his residuary estate. In cl 8 of his will he gave these directions about it:

'MY TRUSTEES shall hold the remainder of my estate Upon Trust either to retain or sell it on the following trusts: (a) To pay debts estate duty and executorship expenses (b) If my said Wife shall survive me by one calendar month to pay to her one half of what is left absolutely and beneficially but if she shall not survive me this half shall accrue to the other half and be dealt with as is provided in clause 8(c) of this my Will (c) To divide the other half of what is left into five equal parts and to pay one of such parts to each of the following person or persons absolutely and beneficially: (i) My Brother Arnold Smith and his Wife Violet Smith equally between them (ii) My Brother Brian Smith and his wife Irene Smith equally between them (iii) My Sister Doris Smith (iv) My Sister Muriel Belleini (v) Mrs. Irene Gladman of 17 Rowben Close London N20 PROVIDED that if any of them shall die in my lifetime (whether before or after the date of this my Will) leaving issue living at my death and who attain the age of Twenty-one years such issue shall take by substitution that which such deceased person would have taken had he or she survived me.'

a Mr Smith's brother, Mr Arnold Smith, and his sister, Miss Doris Smith, died before him without leaving any issue to take under the proviso, so their shares lapsed into a partial intestacy. Also there was a deed of family arrangement on 7 July 1980 under which Mr Smith's sister, Mrs Belleini, transferred her interest to her daughter, Miss Belleini. The result was that Mr Smith's residuary estate, including his shares in the company, became divisible like this:

	Mrs Arnold Smith	4/80ths
	Mr Brian Smith	7/80ths
	Mrs Brian Smith	4/80ths
	Miss Belleini	11/80ths
	Mrs Gladman	8/80ths

c I shall call the fractions I have just mentioned 'the 1/80th fractions'. (It is common ground that two of them were mistakenly transposed in para 12 of an affidavit of a Mr Kirkby of the bank which is before me.)

d Mr Smith's shares in the company are not needed to pay his debts, testamentary expenses or taxes. Mrs Smith asked the bank in writing to transfer 574 of the shares to her, together with if possible a further 100 shares, but no such transfer was made. (574 is the nearest whole number to 46/80ths of 999.) Mrs Smith did not live for long after her husband. She died on 26 January 1982. By her will, which she had made on 21 August 1952, long before Mr Smith acquired the company, she had appointed the bank her executor and left her whole estate to Mr Duker, who is now the managing director of the company. The bank proved her will on 28 October 1982. The shares in the company had still not been distributed (though one was transferred to Mr Duker as nominee so that e there should be two members of the company), and Mrs Smith's will gave Mr Duker the right to her 46/80ths of Mr Smith's residuary estate as well as her own one share in the company.

f Mr Duker asked the bank to proceed with the transfer of at least 574 of the shares in the company to him. Other beneficiaries of Mr Smith's residuary estate objected and the bank has issued an originating summons asking whether it is its duty to comply with Mr Duker's request or to sell all the shares in the open market. It is common ground that on any such sale Mr Duker should be at liberty to buy.

g The whole net estate is ready for immediate distribution. I assume, for the purpose of answering the question, that anyone entitled to an aliquot part of such an estate as this is normally entitled to insist on a corresponding part of any easily divisible property being distributed to him as it is, rather than the whole property being sold and the money proceeds distributed. Other beneficiaries, if they like, can ask the executors to sell their parts of the property, or they can do it for themselves.

h What the other beneficiaries say here is that if the shares are transferred out in the 1/80 fractions, Mr Duker will not take 46/80ths of the total value received by all the beneficiaries as a group, but much more, because a majority holding is worth more per share than a minority holding.

i I turn first to consider whether that is so on the evidence about values before me. This is not very full and not entirely satisfactory, but I can make a finding about values which will serve my purpose. I have no proper valuation of the hotel. Mrs Arnold Smith's solicitor got some indications about it, though, from a firm of surveyors and valuers who are well known in this field. The solicitor asked what a formal valuation would cost. A gentleman from the firm telephoned her, and said, and now I quote from her affidavit:

'... that they would charge a quarter per cent of the value plus VAT. He could not quote an exact charge for such a valuation but for a four star hotel of approximately 140 rooms in 25 acres in a popular resort in the South of England he thought the charge would amount to about £7500 plus VAT.'

That is more than Mrs Smith is prepared to pay, but it will be seen that the charge quoted would indicate a valuation of £3m. Then the solicitor asked her informant, and I quote from her affidavit again— a

‘... what sort of figure he would expect the Palace Hotel, Torquay to fetch on the open market. He said on the information he had he could not express a firm view, but that from his knowledge of recent hotel sales he would guess a value based on about £25000 per bedroom for a four star hotel in Torquay such as the Palace Hotel.’ b

That would make £3½m. I have no expert evidence of the value of the company, but its balance sheet at 30 September 1985 is in evidence, and I do not think that the price which would be fetched by the company as a whole from anyone who wanted to retain and run the hotel would be markedly different from the value of the hotel. That would make each share worth £3,000 or £3,500, though perhaps some allowance would have to be made for tax on the capital gain standing unrealised on the building, above its acquisition price of £627,420. c

There is nothing in the evidence to counter these obvious deductions from the solicitor's affidavit, so it seems safe to make them. I do not think that a holding of only 574 of the 1,000 issued shares would be as high as 574/1000ths of the value of the hotel, notwithstanding the company's article no 19(A) which gives the holder of a majority of the shares summary power to remove and appoint directors. d

In a winding up I think two sets of capital gains tax might be payable and the holder of 574 shares acting alone could not pass a winding-up resolution to unlock the net assets. On the other hand the other shareholders would jump at the chance of joining in such a resolution, for reasons which will shortly appear.

I should expect the asset value of the hotel to find at least a substantial reflection in the value of a holding of 574 shares in the company. The value would also, I think, reflect at least to some extent the after-tax operating profits of recent years, as shown in the audited accounts, even though none have been distributed as dividends. They were about £181,000 in the years to September 1984 and 1985 and have apparently improved since. e

The votes of a minor holding of shares, for instance, the 50 shares which would represent Mrs Arnold Smith's 4/80ths, or the 87 which would represent Mr Brian Smith's 7/80ths, could not unlock the assets, so such a holding could not be expected to reflect the asset value to any appreciable extent. f

What is more, none of the minority holdings can be expected to participate in dividends for the foreseeable future, if Mr Duker takes 574 shares. That appears from a letter which his (and the company's) accountants wrote to Mrs Arnold Smith on 13 February 1986. I shall read it. It says: g

‘Dear Mrs. Smith,

Palace Hotel, Torquay—Shares

Further to our letter on 21st January, our client wishes us to provide you with further information concerning the shares in Rowland Smith Hotels Limited: 1. It is the opinion of the Executors that the shares in the Company should be allocated pro-rata to the residuary legatees of the Estate of Rowland Smith. 2. This opinion is supported by Counsel's Opinion which has been reiterated recently despite the alternative advice which has been given to some of the “minority” beneficiaries. 3. We believe that in the light of Counsel's Opinion and the offer made by our client, the Court would be unlikely to recommend a sale of the Hotel but should it take this step there are doubts as to whether such a sale could be enforced having regard to the structure of the Company. 4. Although profitability is now running at a more satisfactory level, in order to maintain the Hotel in a competitive position, the Directors have embarked on a number of major projects. Accordingly, profits will need to be retained in the business for the foreseeable future and shareholders are unlikely, therefore, to receive dividends during this time. 5. In view of the lack h a of good dividend prospects, the value of the minority shareholdings in the Company is certainly substantially lower than the offer of £403 per share recently made to you by our client.'

b As I understand it, Mr Duker offered £403 a share to all the other beneficiaries, and has subsequently increased this offer to £510 a share. (Counsel for the minority beneficiaries' confirmed this on instructions.) At that price, the minority's 425 shares would be worth a total of £216,750. The minority could, on any view, insist on their joint holding of 425 shares being sold as a single block, and I think that en bloc they might fetch more than that. None the less, the want of any dividends for the foreseeable future, and the inability of the buyer of any minority block to force a dividend would be bound to have a definite depressing effect on the value of the holding.

c Mr Duker could not be expected to join in a winding-up resolution, and he would not need dividends, because he could pay himself a salary as managing director.

d So, though the state of the evidence does not enable me to make any precise finding about values, I can find this much, which is all I need for the present purpose: the value per share of a holding of 574 shares in the company is markedly higher than the value per share of a holding even of 425 shares. The result is that, if Mr Duker takes 574 shares, the value of what he takes will be markedly more than 46/80ths of the aggregate values of his and the other holdings.

e Is that finding of fact enough to override what I am assuming is the normal rule by which Mr Duker would be entitled to call for a transfer of 574 of the shares? It seems clear to me that such a transfer would not be in accordance with Mr Smith's will. When he gave one half of his residuary estate to his wife and the other half to his brothers and sisters and others, he must have meant half by value. The partial intestacy does not affect the meaning of the will. No one is suggesting that the shares should be distributed otherwise than in the 1/80th fractions.

To bring about a fair division in the 1/80th fractions, according to values, it would be necessary for the bank to sell all 999 shares and distribute the money proceeds in those fractions.

f How do the authorities stand on such facts? Counsel for Mr Duker said they require a distribution of the 574 shares to Mr Duker and forbid any sale. He urged that they establish the general rule stated in Snell's Principles of Equity (28th edn, 1982) p 233 like this:

g 'The general rule is that in the absence of some good reason to the contrary a person who is indefeasibly entitled to a share in divisible personality is entitled to have his share transferred to him, even if the property is held on trust for sale with power to postpone sale and the transfer would diminish the value of the other shares.'

h For that proposition Snell, and counsel for Mr Duker, cite Re Marshall, Marshall v Marshall [1914] 1 Ch 192, [1911-13] All ER Rep 671, Re Sandeman's Will Trusts, Sandeman v Hayne [1937] 1 All ER 368 and Re Weiner's Will Trusts, Wyner v Braithwaite [1956] 2 All ER 482, [1956] 1 WLR 579. There is also a useful summary by Walton J in Stephenson (Inspector of Taxes) v Barclays Bank Trust Co Ltd [1975] 1 All ER 625 at 637-638, [1975] 1 WLR 882 at 889-890, which was adopted and commented on by Goff J in Crowe v Appleby (Inspector of Taxes) [1975] 3 All ER 529 at 537, [1975] 1 WLR 1539 at 1543 and which is to the same effect. I was helpfully referred to these two later authorities by counsel who appeared for the minority beneficiaries.

i Those authorities all concerned the case where only one out of several aliquot parts of an estate had become distributable. I am assuming that the same rule applies in a case like the present where all are immediately distributable. Nevertheless, as Snell indicates, the rule is not without exceptions. The general rule requiring a distribution was applied in the first three authorities I have mentioned, but in Re Marshall [1914] 1 Ch 192 at

199–200, [1911–13] All ER Rep 671 at 674–675 Cozens-Hardy MR recognised that it could be excluded by ‘special circumstances’ and in Re Sandeman’s Will Trusts [1937] 1 All ER 368 at 371 Clauson J said the court would not order a transfer if there was some good ground to the contrary, and a little later he said (at 373):

‘I can conceive that there might be circumstances—they would have to be very special—which would justify the court in refusing to give effect to the plaintiff’s rights.’

The plaintiff there was the beneficiary whose aliquot part had become distributable. Likewise in Re Weiner’s Will Trusts [1956] 2 All ER 482 at 486, [1956] 1 WLR 579 at 584 Harman J recognised that special circumstances could justify him in holding up the shares.

Are the circumstances in the present case such as to require the bank to sell all 999 shares, rather than distributing 574 of them to Mr Duker? To answer this question, I need to see what kind of circumstances would exclude his normal right to have this aliquot part of the shares distributed to him. Clauson J ruefully said in Re Sandeman’s Will Trusts [1937] 1 All ER 368 at 372:

‘The court has, I think, been rather careful never to define in precise terms exactly what would be good ground to the contrary.’

The first three decisions I have named do not, as decisions, throw any light on the question whether the discrepancy between share numbers and values is to be considered a sufficiently special circumstance to exclude the general rule. The reason is that there was no such discrepancy in those cases. In all of them, beneficiaries immediately entitled called for transfers of their aliquot parts of a block of shares held in residue by the trustees, and this was ordered. In Re Marshall the block only formed about a sixth of the issued shares in a public company with some 360 shareholders. It was not suggested (and could not have been) that shares in the part of the block to be distributed were worth more per share than the shares retained. The block of shares in Re Sandeman’s Will Trusts was a controlling interest which carried 1,018 out of the 1,927 votes which would be cast at general meetings of a private company. Half the estate was distributable, and half the holding was ordered to be distributed. Nothing at all seems to have been said about differential share values, and naturally enough, because the half distributed would have had just the same value per share as the half retained. In the third case, Re Weiner’s Will Trusts the block in the estate was 75% of the shares in a private company and 45% of this was ordered to be distributed. Again, the shares in such a holding could not have been worth more per share than the shares in the 55% of the block that remained with the trustees.

I accept Re Sandeman’s Will Trusts and Re Weiner’s Will Trusts as authorities which ought to be followed at first instance that the general rule is not excluded by the fact that the distribution breaks up a controlling interest, and so reduces the value of the whole.

I assume that is correct, and if that were the only reason for ordering a sale of the 999 shares as a whole in the present case, the decisions in Re Sandeman’s Will Trusts and Re Weiner’s Will Trusts would be against it. But it is not the only reason for a sale in the present case, as I see it. The operative reason is that, if the shares were transferred out in the 1/80th fractions, Mr Duker would get a greater value per share than the other beneficiaries and so would get more than his 46/80ths of the total value received by the beneficiaries as a body.

I have not had much help from dicta in the authorities I have mentioned. In Re Marshall [1914] 1 Ch 192 at 199, [1911–13] All ER Rep 671 at 674 Cozens-Hardy MR gave it as the reason why the general rule did not apply to land that to allow one of the beneficiaries to take an undivided share of the land would be detrimental to the others, because it would leave them with undivided shares, which would be worth less than their proper proportion of the proceeds of sale of the entire estate. But the later authorities have decided that with shares in a private company it is no objection that those remaining undistributed lose value, so I am not able to build on Cozens-Hardy MR's dictum.

a I have not found any helpful dicta in the later authorities.

I can, though, get some help from another general principle. I mean the principle that trustees are bound to hold an even hand among their beneficiaries, and not favour one as against another, stated for instance in Snell p 225. Of course Mr Duker must have a larger part than the other beneficiaries. But if he takes 46/80ths of the shares he will be favoured beyond what Mr Smith intended, because his shares will each be worth more than the others'. The trustees' duty to hold an even hand seems to indicate that they should sell all 999 shares instead. Counsel for the minority beneficiaries pointed out that it is this duty which imposes a trust for sale under the first branch of the rule in Howe v Earl of Dartmouth, Howe v Countess of Aylesbury (1802) 7 Ves 137, [1775-1802] All ER Rep 24. Here, too, it points in the direction of a duty to sell.

b Counsel for Mr Duker pointed out that, if Mr Duker's shares are sold, immediate capital gains tax will be incurred on the unrealised capital appreciation which has accrued since the death of Mrs Smith (or it may be Mr Smith) whereas if the bank transfers them to Mr Duker as a residuary legatee no capital gains tax will be immediately payable. This is something I must take into account, though I think it might be tempered to some extent by a sale of the whole company realising more per share than even a majority holding of 574 shares.

c I must bear counsel for Mr Duker's point in mind but I have in mind, too, some things which point the other way, which I can summarise from what I have already said. A block of 574 shares would be worth markedly more per share than any minority holding, so that if Mr Duker took 46/80ths of the shares, he would have markedly more than that fraction of the total value of all the shareholdings. His accountants have indicated that, in that event, no dividends would be paid for the foreseeable future. Consequently, the shares of the minority beneficiaries would yield no income to them or to anyone who bought their holdings, whereas Mr Duker, as controlling shareholder and managing director, could take an income by way of salary without declaring a dividend for the other beneficiaries.

d In all the circumstances, to prevent the unfairness which would result from a transfer of 574 of the shares to Mr Duker, and to ensure that he takes 46/80ths of the residuary estate measured by value, I consider that the bank should not transfer any of the shares to him, but should sell all 999 on the general market, Mr Duker being left free to become the buyer.

Charity – Proceedings – Parties – Permissible parties – Person interested in charity – Executors of will of founder of charity – Founder conveying land on valid charitable trusts during her lifetime – Executors covenanting not to institute proceedings to enforce or challenge performance of trusts – Executors subsequently challenging performance of trusts – Whether executors ‘person interested in charity’ for purposes of charity proceedings – Whether executors bound by covenant not to institute proceedings to challenge performance of trusts – Charities Act 1960, s 28(1).

In 1976 the deceased conveyed certain farmland to the defendant college on charitable trusts for certain educational purposes. After the conveyance various disputes arose between the college and the deceased which were taken up by her executors after her death. In 1982 the executors and the college executed a deed of compromise to resolve the dispute and the executors covenanted that they would not institute or instigate any proceedings to enforce or challenge performance of the trusts created by the 1976 conveyance. Subsequently the executors brought an action against the college seeking an order that the college furnish full particulars and accounts of its administration of the charitable trusts and, if it should appear that the college had been in breach of its duty in the administration of the trusts, that it be ordered to pay an appropriate sum to the trust and be removed as trustee and replaced by persons nominated by the executors. The college applied to have the executors’ action struck out, contending that the executors had no interest in the charity and that they were in any event bound by the deed of compromise not to institute the proceedings. The executors contended (i) that as representatives of the founder of the charity they had an interest in seeing that the charity was administered in accordance with the trusts imposed by the conveyance and that accordingly, they were a ‘person interested in the charity’ within s 28(1)^a of the Charities Act 1960 and (ii) that the covenant was not binding on them since it was contrary to public policy for executors to contract that they would not invoke the jurisdiction of the court for the enforcement of charitable trusts.

Held – On the true construction of s 28(1) of the 1960 Act a person who could not in any circumstances be a beneficiary of the charity or take any interest under the trusts applicable to the property of the charity could not be a ‘person interested in the charity’. Since it was clear that the executors had no interest in the charity and could not in any sense be regarded as beneficiaries under any of the charitable purposes of the trusts, it followed that they had no locus standi to bring the action. Furthermore, there was no public policy which restrained the executors from entering into the covenant in the deed of compromise not to invoke the jurisdiction of the court for the enforcement of the

(1) ‘Charity proceedings may be taken with reference to a charity either by the charity, or by any of the charity trustees, or by any person interested in the charity, or by any two or more inhabitants of the area of the charity, if it is a local charity, but not by any other person . . .’

(8) In this section “charity proceedings” means proceedings in any court in England or Wales brought under the court’s jurisdiction with respect to charities, or brought under the court’s jurisdiction with respect to trusts in relation to the administration of a trust for charitable purposes . . .’

- a charitable trusts, and the proceedings were in breach of that covenant. Accordingly, the summons would be struck out (see p 202 b and p.203 b d to f, post).

Adjourned summons

- d By an adjourned summons dated 7 February 1987, the first defendant, the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, applied for an order pursuant to RSC Ord 18, r 19 that the originating summons dated 19 September 1986 issued by the plaintiffs, Anthony David Bradshaw and Anne Rosemary Fowler, the executors of the will of Enid Lewis deceased, against the college and the second defendant, the Attorney General, be struck out. The facts are set out in the judgment.

David Unwin for the college.

- e D G Cracknell for the executors.

Christopher McCall QC for the Attorney General.

- f HOFFMANN J. This is an application by the first defendant, the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, under RSC Ord 18, r 19 to strike out the plaintiffs' summons on the grounds that it is vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court or, alternatively, that the plaintiffs have no locus standi to bring the proceedings.

- g The plaintiffs are the executors of the will of Enid Lewis deceased. In 1976 the deceased conveyed certain farmland to the college on charitable trusts. These are set out in para 3 of a conveyance dated 12 May 1976 and include trusts for certain educational purposes concerning Welsh ponies, cattle and other farm animals, the advancement of the science of agriculture generally, use as a farming centre for the education of students at the college and the general purposes of the college. It appears that the property has since been sold and applied to this last purpose. These trusts are all admitted to be valid charitable trusts.

- h After the conveyance to the college various disputes arose between the college and the deceased which, after her death, were taken up by her executors, the plaintiffs in this action. Litigation ensued. On 12 August 1982 the executors, the college and certain other parties executed a deed of compromise to resolve their differences. By para (1) of the second part of the fifth schedule to the deed the executors covenanted that they would not—

- i 'at any time hereafter institute or be relator or relators in or instigate or assist in any action or proceedings to enforce or challenge performance of the trusts created by the 1976 Conveyance.'

By their originating summons in this action the executors claim, firstly, an order that the college furnish full particulars and accounts of its administration of the charitable trusts and, secondly, if it should appear that the college has been in breach of its duty in the administration of the trusts, that the college be ordered to pay an appropriate sum to the trust and that the college be removed as trustee and replaced by five persons nominated by the executors.

The grounds for this application to strike out are, firstly, that the plaintiffs as executors have no interest in the charity and, secondly, that they are bound by the deed of compromise not to institute these proceedings.

In my judgment, it is plain that the executors have no interest in this charity. Neither they nor the estate of the deceased could in any sense be regarded as beneficiaries under any of the charitable purposes, nor could the land comprised in the conveyance in any circumstances revert to the deceased's estate. The executors therefore have no more interest in the charity than any other member of the public. The guardian of the public interest in the enforcement of charities is the Crown, represented by the Attorney General. No attempt has been made to institute relator proceedings. The Attorney General has not been asked to give his fiat, and he appears by counsel in support of the college's application to strike out.

These are charity proceedings within the meaning of s 28 of the Charities Act 1960, that is to say they are proceedings 'brought under the court's jurisdiction with respect to trusts in relation to the administration of a trust for charitable purposes'. By s 28(1) such proceedings may be taken by 'any person interested in the charity'.

Counsel who appeared for the executors said that this provision created an exceptional locus standi in addition to that of the Attorney General for the particular kind of proceedings mentioned in s 28, namely the enforcement of the trusts. The question is, however, what is meant by a 'person interested'. No definition has been attempted in any previous case. In Haslemere Estates Ltd v Baker [1982] 3 All ER 525, [1982] 1 WLR 1109 Megarry V-C was concerned with a claim that a party who had a contract for the grant of a lease of property owned by a charity was a person 'interested' in the charity. The Vice-Chancellor said ([1982] 3 All ER 525 at 536-537, [1982] 1 WLR 1109 at 1122):

'Now I do not aspire to define the meaning of the phrase "any person interested in the charity" in this context. That I shall leave for others; I am merely concerned to find a safe resting place for my decision in this case . . . I do not think that to contract with the trustees of a charity turns the contractor into a "person interested in the charity", even if the contract relates to land or other property of the charity. I do not think that the phrase includes every tenant of charity land, or those who have easements or profits or mortgages or restrictive covenants over charity land, or those who contract to repair or decorate charity houses, or those who agree to buy goods from the charity or sell goods to the charity. An interest which is adverse to the charity is one thing, an interest in the charity is another. Those who have some good reason for seeking to enforce the trusts of a charity or secure its due administration may readily be accepted as having an interest in the charity, whereas those who merely have some claim adverse to the charity, and seek to improve their position at the expense of the charity, will not. The phrase, I think, is contemplating those who are on the charity side of the fence, as it were, however much they may disagree with what is being done or not being done by or on behalf of the charity. The phrase does not refer to those who are on the other side of the fence, even if they are in some way affected by the internal affairs of the charity.'

Counsel for the executors said that his clients are on the charity side of the fence. They have what they regard as a good reason for seeking to enforce its trusts. Megarry V-C was, however, only concerned to exclude those persons whose interests were adverse to the charity. Not everyone who volunteers himself as interested in the proper administration of the trust will be a person 'interested' within the meaning of s 28(1). But counsel for the executors submitted that the executors, as representatives of the founder of the charity, must have an interest in seeing that the charity was administered in accordance with the trusts imposed by the conveyance to which the deceased had been a party. He referred me to Encyclopaedia of the Laws of Scotland (1927) vol 3, para 500, in a which it is said that 'The heir-at-law or the executor of the founder of a charity has an interest which entitles him to see that the trust is properly administered'. I do not think, however, that authority on the law of Scotland is any help in deciding this question. The two systems of law are in this area very different. In my view, there is no authority in English law for any such retention of an interest in the charity by the founder.

b Even assuming, which, as I have said, I do not accept, that the settlor could have been a person interested on the grounds that she would wish to see the trusts of the charity enforced, I do not see how an interest of this kind could have been transmitted to the executors. Executors succeed to the property of the deceased, not to her spirit and disembodied wishes. It is perhaps pertinent that RSC Ord 93, r 6(2), which exceptionally requires the settlor to be joined in an application under the Variation of Trusts Act 1958, limits the requirement to cases in which the settlor is alive. Similarly, s 2(4) of the Charities Act 1985, which provides that the trustees of a charity which it is sought to vary under the terms of that provision—

c 'must take such steps as are reasonably open to them to secure the approval to the proposed alteration of [the] objects of any person identifiable as having been the founder of the charity'

d is, in my judgment, plainly confined to cases in which the founder is still alive.

d Without, as Megarry V-C said in Haslemere Estates Ltd v Baker, in any way wishing to essay a definition of a person interested, I do not consider that a person who could not in any circumstances be a beneficiary of the charity or take any interest under the trusts applicable to the property of the charity can be within that expression. Accordingly, in my judgment, the summons must be struck out.

e If I am wrong on the question of locus standi, I would, in any event, strike out the proceedings on the ground that they are in breach of the covenant. The action seems to me to fall squarely into what the executors covenanted not to do. Counsel for the executors submitted that the covenant was not binding on the executors because it was contrary to public policy for the executors to be able to contract that they would not invoke the jurisdiction of the court for the enforcement of the charitable trusts. I see no public policy which restrains them from entering into such a covenant. So far as the enforcement of the trust is a matter of public interest, the guardian of that interest is the Attorney General. So far as they are seeking to enforce some interest of their own, there is no reason why they should not contract not to do so. The summons will, therefore, be struck out.

g Order accordingly.

KERR LJ AND SIMON BROWN J

University – Visitor – Jurisdiction – Refusal by university to award degree – Academic staff appointing examiners to assess thesis – Applicant claiming examiners not qualified to assess thesis – Applicant petitioning visitor – Visitor refusing to intervene – Whether visitor having unfettered discretion not to intervene – Whether court should order visitor to intervene.

The applicant, a student for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at a university, submitted a thesis at the end of her studies. The thesis was considered by two examiners appointed by the university's academic staff in accordance with the relevant statutes and regulations. Following consideration of her thesis and a further re-examination the university refused to award the applicant a doctorate and offered instead the lower degree of Master of Philosophy. The applicant then petitioned the visitor of the university on two occasions challenging the refusal to award her a doctorate, on the grounds that the appointed examiners had not been properly qualified to assess her thesis because they did not specialise in her academic discipline, with the result that her thesis had been misjudged. On both occasions the visitor declined to intervene and dismissed the petitions. The applicant sought judicial review by way of certiorari to quash the visitor's decisions, contending that the visitor had exercised a merely supervisory jurisdiction with regard to the appointment of examiners by the academic staff, whereas it was incumbent on the visitor to investigate all contested issues in full in the same way as the courts did when determining disputes between litigants.

Held – Since the powers of a university visitor fell to be exercised in an almost infinite variety of situations, the mode in which the visitor exercised his powers had necessarily to be left to his discretion, subject to his acting judicially. Accordingly (per Kerr LJ), there were situations where a merely supervisory jurisdiction was the only proper exercise of visitatorial powers, while conversely (per Simon Brown J), the visitor in exercising his untrammelled jurisdiction to right wrongs and redress grievances might on occasion be required to act as an appellate tribunal where it would be inappropriate for the court, exercising its review jurisdiction, to investigate the merits. However, since the appointment of examiners by the academic staff involved matters of purely academic, scientific or technical judgment which the staff were in a unique position to exercise, the visitor had been right to defer to their decision since it was not plainly wrong. It followed that the application would be dismissed (see p 213 b to h, p 214 c, p 216 a, p 217 b, p 219 c d and p 220 g to p 221 d f g, post).

- h 13 May. The following judgments were delivered.

j KERR LJ. This is an application for judicial review by Miss J Vijayatunga pursuant to leave given by Forbes J on 19 February 1985. The applicant seeks to challenge the dismissal by the visitor of London University of two petitions which challenged the university's refusal to award her the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in zoology. It appears that this is the first challenge to the exercise of the so-called visitatorial jurisdiction for just under 200 years, since R v Bishop of Ely (1788) 2 Term Rep 290, [1775–1802] All ER Rep 70 by what is now the machinery of judicial review.

The university is governed by the University of London Act 1978 and the statutes set out in Sch 2 to that Act. Section 6 of these statutes provides that '[Her] Majesty in Council shall be the Visitor of the University'. By an Order in Council dated 24 November 1981 Her Majesty referred the first petition to a Committee of the Lords of the Privy Council for consideration and report, and it is not in dispute that this delegation also covered the applicant's second petition, which was for a rehearing of the first petition. The committee consisted of Lord Brightman, Mr Fred Mulley (subsequently Lord Mulley) and Mr Mark Carlisle QC, MP. The committee reported to Her Majesty that the prayers in the first petition should be refused, as they were by Order in Council dated 16 March 1983, and dismissed the second petition for a rehearing on 26 October 1984. Counsel who is instructed by the Treasury Solicitor on behalf of the visitor, made some brief submissions at our invitation in connection with the identity of the visitor in the present case. I will refer to these in a moment, but for the present it is sufficient to say that I accept his submission that the jurisdiction of this court to hear the present application is not affected by the identity of the visitor. Moreover, in referring to the facts and contentions it will be convenient, albeit strictly inaccurate, to refer to the Committee of the Lords of Privy Council (the committee) as though it had itself been acting in the capacity of the visitor; and I hope that I may also be forgiven if I refer to a visitor in general as 'he' for convenience.

The history

The applicant held honours degrees in Science from the Universities of Reading and Salford. In September 1974 she became a research assistant to Professor R P Dales, the head of the department of zoology of the University of London. In October 1975 she registered as an internal student at Bedford College, one of the schools of the university, for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy (PhD) in zoology, her supervisor being Professor Dales. For this purpose it was necessary for her to submit a thesis under a title approved by her supervisor. Over the next three to four years she prepared one under the title 'Lysosomes in the coelomocytes of three species of polychaete annelids with particular reference to Nereis diversicolor'. The subject matter, to use lay terms, was a study of cell constituents (lysosomes) in the free cells (coelomocytes) found in the body cavity of three species of ragworm, in particular the species nereis diversicolor.

It seems that the applicant learned in July 1979, shortly before she completed her thesis, that Professors P B Gahan and S J Holt of the University of London might be appointed as her examiners. The applicant was unhappy about this choice, because she did not regard either of them as qualified to examine for a PhD in zoology, as explained hereafter. She said, and subsequently wrote, that she had mentioned this to Mr Turnbull, the registrar of Bedford College, and had then been told that Professor Dales had informed Mr Turnbull that these professors would not be her examiners. Counsel who appeared on behalf of the university, told us that he had no instructions about this incident. However, when these professors were in fact appointed as her examiners shortly thereafter and she had submitted her thesis to them in August 1979, she wrote to Mr Turnbull on 5 September 1979 to express her unhappiness about this choice, and mentioned the earlier conversation referred to above, though adding that she did not feel that she could strongly object at that stage.

On 5 November 1979 the applicant attended a viva voce conducted by Professors Gahan and Holt as part of her examination. On 7 November Professor Dales wrote a most unfortunate letter to the applicant. He said that Professor Holt had come to see him with copies of the thesis issued to the examiners 'together with a list of page numbers on which the many corrections must be made before they can make their recommendations to the university'. Professor Dales went on:

'As I understand the University regulations, these corrections must be made within one calendar month following the viva (5 November), that is, not later than 5 December 1979.'

- It is convenient to interrupt the history at this point to deal with the implications and consequences of this letter. In their report to Her Majesty, to which I will refer for convenience, albeit again inaccurately as 'the decision', the committee were highly critical of the terms of this letter. Although counsel for the applicant rightly abandoned any reliance on it in the course of his submissions to this court, in fairness to the applicant this unfortunate aspect should be emphasised, since it probably triggered off her subsequent resentment and suspicions, as reflected in the lengthy history that followed.
- a* In that connection it is also unfortunate that the applicant appears to have been on bad terms with Professor Dales, though we do not know the reasons for this.

- The committee said in their decision that they had no doubt that this letter from Professor Dales was a source of justifiable grievance on the part of the applicant and that it was misleading and unfair to her as a candidate. The reason was that the references to the regulations, and to the requirement for corrections to be made within one month pursuant to them, could only reasonably be understood as intended to refer to what was then reg 24.7 (now reg 25.7). This applied and referred to a thesis submitted by PhD candidates which, apart from the need for minor amendments, was 'otherwise adequate' for the grant of this degree. That, undoubtedly, was how the applicant understood the letter, whereas, as pointed out in the committee's decision, its terms were 'regrettable' and it 'was almost certain to be misunderstood'. However, the committee also added
- d* that, albeit with regret, they had reached the conclusion that they could not advise intervention by the visitor on the ground that, notwithstanding the terms of this letter and the fact that the applicant made the required corrections in time, she was informed by the academic registrar of the university on 14 December 1979 that she had failed her PhD.

- In his opening of the application counsel for the applicant relied on this aspect, which
- e* had formed a prominent part of the grounds for judicial review. But after the matter had been discussed in the course of his opening and he had reflected on it overnight, he rightly concluded that the committee's decision, that they could not grant any relief to the applicant beyond expressing their strong regrets, was not open to any criticism, let alone relief by way of judicial review. Counsel for the applicant had to accept that the unfortunate terms of the letter could not found an estoppel or any other basis for
- f* contending that the applicant thereupon became entitled to the grant of a PhD as of right. He also agreed that he had to accept that, despite the terms of the letter, the applicant had in fact failed to satisfy her examiners. Indeed, the fact that her thesis had been misjudged by her examiners, on the ground that they were unqualified to judge it properly, was the essence of the applicant's complaint throughout. The implications of the unfortunate letter of 7 November 1979 accordingly cease to play any part in these
- g* proceedings beyond remaining a cause for regret and no doubt providing some explanation for all that followed.

- I then return to the history. When writing to the applicant on 14 December 1979 with the unexpected news that she had failed her PhD, the academic registrar informed her that she had been adjudged to have reached the standard required for the award of the degree of MPhil and that it would be open to her to apply for this within two months.
- h* However, the applicant did not accept this offer. On 20 December 1979 she wrote to the Vice-Chancellor and applied for a re-examination. This second chance had been available to unsuccessful candidates in the higher degrees for some years unless the Vice-Chancellor considered their application to be frivolous. The prescribed procedure was for the appointment of a board of examiners consisting of the original examiners and at least
- j* two others from outside the University of London. The regulations provided that their decision was final. The additional examiners in the present case included Professor Mitcheson, then chairman of the board of studies in zoology at London University, Professor Lloyd of Keele University who acted as chairman, and Dr Dean of Brunel University. Apart from pointing out that this board included the original examiners, which counsel for the applicant rightly accepted was a recognised practice and in itself unobjectionable, the applicant has at no time raised any criticism of the qualifications of the additional three examiners. She was re-examined in May 1980. Unfortunately she was again unsuccessful, and in June 1980 she again declined to accept the offer of a degree of MPhil. a

In November 1981 the applicant submitted a petition to the visitor which had been settled by counsel on her behalf. The relief which she requested was to the effect that in all the circumstances she should be awarded a PhD or the opportunity of a further re-examination. For the purposes of the hearing her solicitors asked for discovery from the solicitors acting for the university, and in particular for the disclosure of the examiners' reports. This was refused on the ground that such reports are regarded as confidential, and an application to the committee for an order for their production was also unsuccessful. The applicant's first petition was heard on 25 February 1983. She was represented by counsel, but the petition was dismissed on 16 March 1983 as already mentioned. During the remainder of 1983 the applicant then lodged a complaint with the European Commission of Human Rights in Strasbourg, but this was ruled to be inadmissible in April 1984. On 11 May 1984 she submitted a second petition to the visitor for a rehearing of her first petition. She represented herself on this application, and it was heard and dismissed on 26 October 1984. She then applied for leave to move for judicial review in January 1985. After an original refusal by Hodgson J she obtained leave from Forbes J in February 1985. However, Thomas v University of Bradford was then on its way through the courts and clearly of great relevance for present purposes. Accordingly, in November 1986 Russell J ordered by consent that the present application should be stood out pending the decision of the House of Lords in that case. The appeal in that case was heard by the House of Lords in December 1986 (see [1987] 1 All ER 834, [1987] 2 WLR 677). b

As can be seen from this lengthy history, the applicant clearly feels that she has a considerable grievance. Apart from what has already been said by the committee in relation to the letter from Professor Dales to which I have referred, which may well be the mainspring of all that followed, it should also be mentioned that we have been shown a number of subsequent testimonials from zoologists at other universities expressing the view that her original thesis had been worthy of the grant of a PhD. However, while these matters naturally cause us to feel some sympathy with the applicant, it also goes without saying that they cannot affect the principles which fall to be applied to her application for judicial review. f

As to this, the nature of the relief requested by the applicant takes various forms, including certiorari, mandamus and declaratory orders. In effect, the applicant claims that the committee's decisions on both petitions should be quashed and that the committee should be ordered either to grant the relief prayed for in the first petition or to rehear the whole matter. g

Thomas v University of Bradford

This recent decision of the House of Lords is a landmark and of fundamental importance to the nature and scope of the authority exercised by visitors of foundations such as universities. I must briefly refer to the facts. The plaintiff had been appointed a lecturer in sociology at the University of Bradford. In the result she became an employee of the university under a contract of service and a member of, and holder of office in, the university, which was a charitable foundation and consequently subject to the jurisdiction of a visitor. When the university purported to dismiss her she brought an action in the Chancery Division for a declaration that the decision to dismiss her was ultra vires and void by reason of non-compliance with the disciplinary rules and procedures contained in the university's charter and various statutes, ordinances and regulations incorporated into her contract. She also claimed damages for breach of contract or alternatively arrears of salary. The university originally applied for an order to stay the proceedings under h a RSC Ord 18, r 19 or the court's inherent jurisdiction on the ground that the plaintiff should first have petitioned the visitor. In the absence of any relevant provision as to the visitor's identity, such as is to be found in the statutes of London University, the visitor was the Crown as founder of the University of Bradford. In such cases the visitatorial powers are exercised on behalf of the Crown by the Lord Chancellor or such other person as he may advise Her Majesty to nominate. The university's application for a stay was refused at first instance, and that decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. In the b House of Lords the university was given leave to amend by claiming an order to strike out the statement of claim on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the action. That was the effect of the decision of their Lordships. This is correctly summarised as follows in the headnote of the report ([1987] 2 WLR 677):

c '... that where the dispute related to the correct interpretation and fair administration of the domestic laws of the university, its statutes and its ordinances, it fell within the jurisdiction of the visitor and not the courts of law notwithstanding that its resolution would affect the plaintiff's contract of employment for she was not relying upon a contractual obligation apart from an obligation of the university to comply with its own domestic laws; that, accordingly, her claim fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the visitor, subject to the supervisory jurisdiction of the d High Court, and therefore the court lacked jurisdiction in the first instance to intervene and the plaintiff's action should be struck out.'

The speeches of Lord Griffiths and Lord Ackner, with which the other members agreed, reviewed a long line of authorities dealing with the nature and scope of the jurisdiction of visitors. In that connection counsel for the applicant emphasised and relied on the e exclusivity and breadth of the jurisdiction in support of his main submission that a visitor was obliged to investigate disputes and grievances brought to his attention to the same extent and in the same depth as disputes which are litigated in the courts. I will deal with this later on, together with the consequential submissions founded on it. But it is convenient at this stage to refer to some of the main passages on which counsel for the applicant relied, before I come to those which deal directly with the issue going to f the jurisdiction of this court, exercising the power of judicial review over the decisions of visitors.

On the scope of the visitatorial jurisdiction the earliest of the cited cases was Philips v Bury (1694) Skin 447, [1558-1774] All ER Rep 53. Counsel for the applicant relied in particular on a passage in which Holt CJ pointed out that the jurisdiction conferred on visitors is 'an appointment of law' (see Skin 447 at 483, [1558-1774] All ER Rep 53 at g 58), and also on the following passage cited by Lord Griffiths in Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 842, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 686, where the judgment of Holt CJ (as reported in 1 Ld Raym 5 at 8, 91 ER 900 at 903) was summarised as follows:

h '... the office of visitor by the common law is to judge according to the statutes of the college, to expel and deprive upon just occasions, and to hear appeals of course. And from him, and him only, the party grieved ought to have redress; and in him the founder hath reposed entire confidence that he will administer justice impartially, so that his determinations are final, and examinable in no other court whatsoever.'

j Next, if authority be needed for the proposition that a visitor must act judicially in the exercise of his powers, then this is to be found in the decision of R v Bishop of Ely 2 Term Rep 290 at 336, 100 ER 157 at 181. Counsel for the applicant also relied on a passage from the argument of Sir Samuel Romilly in Ex p Kirkby Ravensworth Hospital (1808) 15 Ves 305 at 311-312, 33 ER 770 at 772, which Lord Griffiths in Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 842, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 686 described as 'long accepted as authoritative'. The complete passage reads as follows:

'A visitor is the Legislator and the Judge: a Judge, not for the single purpose of interpreting laws, but also for the application of laws, that are perfectly clear: requiring no interpretation; and, farther, for the interpretations of questions of fact; involving no interpretations of laws. It is within his province, as a judge of fact as well as law, to ascertain the fact . . .'

The last of the cases prior to Thomas v University of Bradford on which counsel for the applicant relied was Thomson v University of London (1864) 33 LJ Ch 625, from which Lord Griffiths also cited a passage in the judgment of Kindersley V-C (see Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 846, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 681). This included the following (33 LJ Ch 625 at 634):

' . . . whatever relates to the internal arrangements and dealings with regard to the government and management of the house, or the domus, of the institution, is properly within the jurisdiction of the Visitor, and only under the jurisdiction of the Visitor, and this Court will not interfere in those matters . . .'

Then counsel for the applicant relied on the following important passage from the speech of Lord Griffiths itself ([1987] 1 All ER 834 at 843, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 694):

'I can see no reason why the visitor as judge of the laws of the foundation should not have the power to right a wrong done to a member or office holder in the foundation by the misapplication of those laws. The visitor would be a poor sort of judge if he did not possess such powers. Suppose, first, a case in which on appeal the visitor concluded that there had been no "good cause" for the dismissal of a member of the academic staff and ordered the reinstatement of the member; I cannot entertain a doubt that the visitor would have power to order payment of arrears of salary between the date of dismissal and reinstatement. Suppose, second, a case in which the visitor concluded there had been no "good cause" for the dismissal but relations between the dismissed member and the other members of the academic staff had so deteriorated that it would be inimical to the general health of the university to order reinstatement. Why in these circumstances should the visitor not proceed to right the wrong done to the member by ordering that a monetary recompense should be paid by the university in lieu of reinstatement. No doubt in calculating the sum he would be guided by those principles that the courts have worked out in cases of wrongful dismissal in which the courts refuse to enforce a contract of service wrongfully terminated but give monetary recompense instead, which the law labels as damages. To deny a visitor such a power is to deny him one of the fundamental functions of a judge which is to right a wrong, in so far as money can.'

Lord Ackner dealt with the same issue as follows ([1987] 1 All ER 834 at 851, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 697):

'In order to consider the scope of the visitorial jurisdiction the historic basis and justification for the jurisdiction must first be considered. An eleemosynary corporation is a corporation founded for the purpose of distributing the founder's bounty. The purpose of the visitor's jurisdiction is the supervision of the internal rules of the foundation so that it is governed in accordance with those private laws which the founder has laid down to regulate the objects of his benefaction. Clearly, this supervision cannot be restricted merely to interpreting the statutes. For the supervision to be effective it must involve ensuring that the statutes, properly interpreted, are also being properly applied and observed.'

At the end of his speech Lord Ackner said ([1987] 1 All ER 834 at 852, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 698):

- a 'As regards the visitor's jurisdiction to award "damages" I see no practical problem. The visitor in the course of his supervisory jurisdiction must be entitled, in order to ensure that the domestic law is properly applied, to redress any grievance that has resulted from the misapplication of that domestic law.'

My reason for adding this passage to the other citations is that counsel for the applicant questioned the use of the word 'supervisory' in characterising the visitor's jurisdiction, and I will return to this point later on.

- b I then turn to the important passages in Thomas v University of Bradford which deal with the supervisory jurisdiction exercisable by the courts by way of judicial review over the decisions of visitors. In that context Lord Griffiths said ([1987] 1 All ER 834 at 849–850, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 695):

- c 'Finally, there is the protection afforded by the supervisory, as opposed to appellate, jurisdiction of the High Court over the visitor. It has long been held that the writs of mandamus and prohibition will go either to compel the visitor to act if he refused to deal with a matter within his jurisdiction or to prohibit him from dealing with a matter that lies without his jurisdiction. On mandamus see R v Bishop of Ely (1794) 5 Term Rep 475, 101 ER 267 and R v Dunsheath, ex p Meredith [1950] 2 All ER 741, [1951] 1 KB 127 and on prohibition see R v Bishop of Chester (1747) 1 Wm Bl 22, 96 ER 12 and Bishop of Chichester v Harward and Webber (1787) 1 Term Rep 650, 99 ER 1300. Although doubts have been expressed in the past as to the availability of certiorari, I have myself no doubt that in the light of the modern development of administrative law, the High Court would have power, on an application for judicial review, to quash a decision of the visitor which amounted to an abuse of his powers.'

- e Apart from the authority which this passage carries in any event, it is clear from the following paragraph at the conclusion of Lord Griffiths's speech that it formed part of the ratio of his decision. He continued as follows ([1987] 1 All ER 834 at 850, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 696):

- f 'These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the visitatorial jurisdiction subject to which all our modern universities have been founded is not an ancient anachronism which should now be severely curtailed, if not discarded. If confined to its proper limits, namely the laws of the foundation and matters deriving therefrom, it provides a practical and expeditious means of resolving disputes which it is in the interests of the universities and their members to preserve.'

- g Finally in this connection, in concluding that the plaintiff's action must be struck out, Lord Ackner said ([1987] 1 All ER 834 at 852, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 698):

'Accordingly, in my judgment, her claim falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the visitor, subject always to judicial review.'

- h While these passages obviously leave no doubt as regards the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the present proceedings in principle, I should briefly deal with two other matters to which counsel for the visitor referred for the sake of completeness, since they relate to our jurisdiction.

The identity of the visitor in this case

- i Counsel for the visitor made it clear that in his submission no question of immunity from suit was involved in this case on the ground that the visitor was Her Majesty in Council. There was no question concerning the immunity of Her Majesty in her personal capacity, nor the possible immunity of the Queen in Council in the course of the exercise of legislative or prerogative powers by the sovereign. Counsel for the visitor submitted that the visitatorial jurisdiction exercised in the present case by virtue of the statutes scheduled to the University of London Act 1978 was analogous to subordinate legislative powers exercisable by Order in Council, which were susceptible to review by the courts on the ground of being ultra vires (see eg R v HM Treasury, ex p Smedley [1985] 1 All ER 589 at 593, [1985] QB 657 at 667 per Sir John Donaldson MR). Counsel for the visitor also pointed out that in a large number of cases, where the statutes or other provisions governing foundations did not designate any visitor, the visitatorial powers were vested in the Crown, but were nevertheless clearly subject to judicial review.

I accept the effect of all these submissions.

The jurisdiction to issue certiorari

Since Lord Griffiths referred, in Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 850, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 695, to past doubts on this question, counsel for the visitor also dealt with it briefly. He pointed out that in Picarda The Law and Practice Relating to Charities (1977) p 431 it is stated that, while the courts had limited judicial control over visitors' decisions by granting prohibition or mandamus in certain circumstances—

'a visitor is not subject to certiorari: in this respect a visitor may be compared to an ecclesiastical court against which prohibition may issue but which is not subject to certiorari.'

However, the reason given for this statement is that 'the system of law administered by the visitor differs from that administered by the courts', clearly a reference to ecclesiastical law. In that connection counsel for the visitor drew our attention to R v Chancellor of St Edmundsbury and Ipswich Diocese, ex p White [1947] 2 All ER 170, [1948] 1 KB 195, where Wrottesley and Evershed LJ stated that certiorari will not issue from the Court of King's Bench (as it then was) to an ecclesiastical court. But the grounds of that decision do not apply to modern visitatorial powers, at any rate in situations like the present. Thus Wrottesley LJ referred to the laws administered by ecclesiastical courts as 'exotic' (see [1947] 2 All ER 170 at 171, [1948] 1 KB 195 at 204), and Evershed LJ said ([1947] 2 All ER 170 at 180, [1948] 1 KB 195 at 220):

'... I am disposed to think that the true ground of the absence of jurisdiction is to be found in the fact that the ecclesiastical courts administered a system of law foreign to and having, in the words of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., no "privity with" the courts of the common law, the civil law which they administered being concerned primarily with rights and duties of spiritual import.'

Counsel for the visitor also pointed out that the modern system of judicial review introduced by RSC Ord 53, and now to be found in s 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981, was designed precisely to obliterate the need for distinguishing between the various alternative forms of prerogative relief and other powers. This was also clearly in the mind of Lord Griffiths in the passage which I have cited. In these circumstances I am equally left in no doubt but that certiorari will lie in this case.

I then turn to the substantive issues, firstly in general, and secondly on the facts.

The issue as to the visitor's duty

As I have already briefly mentioned, counsel for the applicant sought to derive a submission from the exclusivity and breadth of the visitatorial jurisdiction that it had to be exercised in the same manner as the jurisdiction of the courts in determining disputes between litigants. This may be summarised as follows. Since the visitor is the direct and only judge of all grievances within his jurisdiction, without any appeal from his decisions, it is incumbent on him to investigate all contested issues to the full, so that his decision can be seen to be his own evaluation of the merits, or his own assessment of the truth of the matters in dispute, depending on the circumstances. In particular, there was no room for the exercise by the visitor of a merely supervisory jurisdiction by the application, for instance, of the principles stated by Lord Greene MR in Associated Provincial Picture Houses

Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223. Thus, in the present case it was incumbent on the committee to investigate the applicant's complaints and the university's answer in sufficient depth to satisfy the committee personally that the appointment of Professors Gahan and Holt as examiners was reasonable, or at any rate not unreasonable, given the subject matter and nature of the applicant's thesis on the one hand, and the qualifications of these examiners on the other.

Counsel for the applicant put these submissions in different ways, attractively as always, and I hope that I am doing justice to them even if I do not repeat their various permutations. But I regret that I cannot for one moment accept any such mandatory prescription governing the mode of the exercise of visitatorial powers. These fall to be exercised in an almost infinite variety of situations, and the mode of their exercise must necessarily be left to the discretion of the visitor, provided of course that he acts judicially. Thus, far from concluding that the exercise of a merely supervisory jurisdiction is wrong in all cases, as counsel for the applicant appears to submit, it seems to me that in some cases it may well be the only proper exercise of visitatorial powers. In many situations, for example, it might be an abuse of power, and a justifiable source of grievance on the part of the foundation, if the visitor entered on matters which, by the statutes of the foundation, were expressly left in the discretion of specially designated officers or members. Thus, counsel for the applicant himself accepted that the question whether or not the thesis and viva voce examination of the applicant satisfied the standard required for a PhD was solely a matter for her examiners. He accepted this, because that was clearly the effect of the relevant statutes and regulations. However, as explained below, these equally prescribe the procedures for the appointment of the examiners themselves. They lay down no requirements as to their qualifications. The effect of the regulations is to leave these in the discretion of those members of the academic staff in whom the power and duty to appoint the examiners is vested, obviously having regard to the knowledge and experience which is to be expected from holders of their posts in the academic hierarchy. Accordingly, if the visitor declines to interfere with their decisions on matters which depend on academic or scientific or other technical judgment, then it seems to me quite impossible to say that he has committed any error of law, unless the decisions in question are so plainly irrational or fraught with bias or some other obvious irregularity that they clearly cannot stand. Prima facie, by enrolling as a candidate for a PhD at a particular university, the candidate accepts that his or her fitness for that degree will be judged by examiners appointed in accordance with the rules and academic practices of the chosen university. The powers of review possessed by the visitor of the university do not form part of the structure of academic judgment on which the candidate's enrolment is based. It is merely an instance of last resort in exceptional circumstances, and not, as the submissions of counsel for the applicant implied, an integral part of something in the nature of an appellate structure.

For these reasons I cannot for one moment accept that the committee in the present case was bound to investigate the applicant's grievances to the extent of satisfying itself directly that the appointment of these particular examiners was not unreasonable in the circumstances, let alone that they were suitable to be appointed.

The issue as to the scope of judicial review

While supporting the approach to the visitor's discretion as to the mode of exercising his powers which I have indicated above, counsel for the visitor nevertheless sought to rely on the exclusivity of the visitor's jurisdiction for another purpose. He used it as a ground for submitting that the court's powers of judicial review over visitors are more restricted than in relation to other tribunals or authorities. He submitted that the visitor was solely and exclusively responsible for the interpretation and administration of the internal laws of the foundation in relation to which he exercised visitatorial powers. For instance, as counsel for the visitor submitted, it was not open to the court to review a visitor's interpretation of a statute or regulation governing the foundation by deciding,

if necessary, that the visitor had erred in applying its proper legal meaning to it. In that connection he relied on a dictum of Brightman J in Herring v Templeman [1973] 2 All ER 581 at 591 (affirmed on different grounds [1973] 3 All ER 569, CA) when he said that, subject to certain statutory provisions vesting a discretion in the Secretary of State— a

‘The construction of the regulations of the college and the carrying into effect of those regulations in relation to persons who subject themselves to those regulations are, in my view, matters which the decided authorities have committed to the exclusive jurisdiction of the visitor.’ b

The present case raises no issue as to the committee’s construction of any of the relevant statutes or regulations. It is therefore unnecessary to decide whether counsel for the visitor is correct in the width of his submission. My present view, however, is that I can see no reason for concluding that the general principles of the court’s powers of judicial review are any different in relation to the acts and decisions of visitors from other cases. c What may well be different, however, is the appropriate way, as a matter of the court’s discretion, of exercising those powers in relation to visitors and the circumstances in which visitatorial powers fall to be exercised. An approach of self-denial may well be appropriate in such cases, depending on the circumstances. But no question as to the desirable scope of the exercise of the court’s powers of intervention arises in the present case, and I therefore say no more about it. d

I then turn to the factual issues in so far as they are relevant to this application.

The issues relevant to the first petition

The applicant’s main complaint throughout was that Professors Holt and Gahan were not properly qualified to judge her thesis because they were not zoologists. Thus, she said in her affidavit in support of this application: e

‘The thesis involved the usage of standard histochemical and other methods of analysing the behaviour, role and morphology of “free cells” of the above-mentioned species. The thesis, concerning as it did the structure of animal cells, falls entirely within the discipline of zoology. Both Professor Holt and Professor Gahan are essentially histochemists. Professor Holt is Professor at the Courtauld Institute of Biochemistry and is on the Board of Studies in Biochemistry. He was awarded a Doctorate in Chemistry in 1948 and his thesis was entitled: Contributions to the Chemistry of Quinololine and Quinoline. He is a biochemist. Professor P. B. Gahan is a Professor of Botany at Queen Elizabeth College, a College of the University of London. He was awarded a Doctorate in 1964 in histochemistry and his thesis was entitled: Histochemical Studies in Proliferating Cells with Special Reference to Lipids and Deoxyribonucleic Acid.’ f

And in her letter of 20 December 1979 to the Vice-Chancellor of the university she said: g

‘As a result of this bias towards histochemistry, the examiners tended to concentrate on that aspect of my work, to the detriment of the other, more important contributions I have made. And yet I only applied standard histochemical methods, to further elucidate the morphological findings, e.g. by devising a new histochemical staining method.’ h

The fact that the nature of the applicant’s complaint was fully understood by the committee is shown by the following passage from their decision: i

‘The Committee will deal first with the petitioner’s complaint that Professors Gahan and Holt were not zoologists specialising in the field of zoology to which the petitioner’s thesis related. She submitted that both examiners were primarily histochemists and therefore would tend to concentrate on the histochemistry aspect of her work, to the detriment of the important contributions which she was seeking a to make to the field of comparative zoology. The petitioner says that she only applied histochemical methods in order to elucidate her morphological findings, and did not seek to make any contributions to the field of histochemistry. Thus her thesis was misjudged.'

b I then come to the university's answer to the first petition which dealt with these complaints. It pointed out that Professors Gahan and Holt had been appointed as the applicant's examiners on 13 July 1979 by the chairman of the higher degree sub-committee of the board of studies in zoology, Professor Bullough. As regards the way in which these examiners came to be chosen and the appropriateness of their choice in the light of their qualifications, the university's answer proceeded as follows:

c 'Professors Gahan and Holt were put forward as possible Examiners of the Petitioner to the Secretary of the Board of Studies in Zoology following the Secretary's request for nominations made to Professor Dales as the Petitioner's supervisor. Professor Dales put forward their names after discussion with Dr. Thorndyke, the Senior Lecturer in Zoology at Bedford College. Their qualifications were: Professor Gahan. Professor of Botany at Queen Elizabeth College. He obtained his Ph.D in 1964 in, according to the University's Records, Zoology-Histochemistry. He is (and was) a member of the Board of Studies in Zoology. Histochemistry is a d subdiscipline of the three main biological subjects of anatomy, botany and zoology. Professor Holt. Professor of Experimental Biochemistry at the Courtauld Institute of Biochemistry. He obtained his Ph.D in 1948 in Organic Chemistry. He holds a degree of D.Sc. in Cytochemistry. The further grounds on which it was considered that they were suitable to examine the Petitioner was as follows. The thesis was a e cytochemical and ultrastructural study of the phagocytes in several species of polychaete annelids. Although the thesis was entirely within the purview of the Board of Studies in Zoology, the appropriate examiners were those with particular knowledge of cell structure, cytochemical techniques, electron microscopy and identification of lysosomal enzyme activity by histochemical means, using both light microscopy and electron microscopy. The two examiners appointed fulfilled f completely these requirements. Professor Holt had worked for many years on the histochemistry of lysosomal enzymes, and especially on ultrastructural and cytochemical studies employing electron microscope methods for enzyme localization and the application of these methods to problems in cell biology. Professor Gahan was and is one of the leading cell biologists in the University and has worked particularly with lysosomes and cytochemistry of lysosomal enzymes. It is g accordingly submitted that these Examiners were appointed in accordance with the Statutes and Regulations of the University, that their qualifications for appointment were properly considered; that their appointments were made upon reasonable grounds; and that they were appointed in good faith. They were proper and competent Examiners to examine the Petitioner.'

h That was the essential material which was before the committee in relation to this issue on the first petition. Their decision in relation to it appears from the following passage which follows immediately on that which I have quoted above:

j 'While appreciating the nature of the petitioner's complaint, the Committee desire to emphasise, as has been observed in other cases, that it is no part of their duty to interfere in matters of scientific or technical judgment. It would not be proper for the Committee to express a view of their own as to the choice of examiners, or to criticise the decision on such matters of the University authorities, save in a case, which is far from the instant case, where it is apparent from the facts that the examiners appointed by the University were plainly not qualified to perform their task. The Committee are of the opinion that the petitioner is not entitled to any relief by reason of this complaint.'

It will be apparent from what I have said earlier that I cannot accept the submission of counsel for the applicant that the supervisory approach adopted by the committee in this passage discloses any error of law or other ground for intervention by this court. However, in deference to his sustained arguments I should refer to a number of other related matters. a

Firstly, none of the counsel who appeared on this appeal were able to throw any light on what was intended to be referred to by the remark 'as has been observed in other cases'. If I may respectfully say so, if there were any precedents or guidelines which the committee was following in the approach which it adopted, then it would have been preferable to make this material available to counsel for the applicant at the hearing. However, this is clearly not a point which can by itself provide a basis for challenging this passage and the contrary was not suggested. b

Secondly, and mainly, counsel for the applicant submitted that in this passage the members of the committee were misdirecting themselves in law by saying that it was 'no part of their duty' to interfere in matters of scientific or technical judgment. Even if, as he maintained, the committee were not bound to satisfy themselves generally about the reasonableness of the appointment of these examiners, or at any rate about the absence of unreasonableness in their choice, he submitted that this passage showed that the committee felt themselves bound to adopt a Wednesbury approach and did not regard a direct investigation into the merits as open to them. But in my view this criticism is untenable. The second sentence must be read together with the first, and might well have been separated from it by a colon instead of a full stop. Read together, it is clear that the committee were expressing their view as to what they felt to be the appropriate course to adopt; not what they believed they were bound to do as a matter of law. c

Thirdly, in criticising the approach adopted in this passage, counsel for the applicant contrasted it with the approach adopted in another case by another committee which had also been concerned with a refusal of a PhD by allegedly unqualified examiners. This arose from a petition presented on behalf of an external candidate in 1969, a Dr Hansford-Miller. Counsel for the applicant pointed out that in that case the report of the committee analysed the nature of the candidate's thesis and the comments of his examiners in their reports, which were evidently before the committee. The bold submission of counsel for the applicant was that the committee had either erred in the latter case or in the present case, and that it must follow from the difference in approach that there had been an error of law in one of these cases, ie the present. In support of this submission he pointed to the requirements for a PhD thesis which included the following under the relevant regulations: d

'23.1 . . . (b) It must form a distinct contribution to the knowledge of the subjects and afford evidence of originality, shown either by the discovery of new facts or by the exercise of an independent critical power . . . e

23.7 The degree will not be conferred upon a candidate unless the examiners certify that a thesis is worthy of publication as a "Thesis approved for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the University of London".' f

Having regard to these requirements counsel for the applicant submitted that, in adjudicating on a petition based on the alleged lack of the necessary qualifications on the part of the examiners, the committee had to satisfy themselves that the selected examiners were in fact competent to apply these standards, or at any rate not incompetent. That task, counsel for the applicant submitted, had indeed been performed by the committee in relation to the Hansford-Miller petition, but not in the present case. Again, I cannot accept this submission for the reasons already stated. Admittedly, the decision in the Hansford-Miller case reveals a different approach from the present case. That may have been, as the university submits, because the circumstances were different, since that was a case of an external candidate in relation to whom more material may have been placed g

- before the committee. Or it may be because the nature of the controversy in that case was such that, basing itself on the material before it, the committee was able and willing to found its decision more directly on the actual merits of the dispute. But these must be matters for the visitor's discretion according to the circumstances. Thus, in the present case it would no doubt have been open to the committee, if they had thought fit, to call for the examiners' reports. But, contrary to counsel for the applicant's submission, they were clearly not obliged to do so. Having regard to the nature of this dispute and in the light of the material before them I cannot see the beginning of any error of law or other complaint on which judicial review of their decision could be founded.

The issues relevant to the second petition

- This resulted in part from the applicant's dissatisfaction with the outcome of her first petition and in part, or mainly, from errors which she found, or believed to have found, in the facts referred to in the university's answer to her first petition. Since the facts stated in the answer had of course formed part of the material placed before the committee and had indeed been referred to it in their decision to some extent, the applicant evidently felt that she had no choice but to pursue the matter. However, as often happens in the course of litigious activity which may originally have stemmed from some justifiable grievance, the applicant began to lose sight of the wood for the trees at this stage, if she will forgive my saying so. Thus, it seems to me, with all due respect to the obvious strength of her feelings, that she has never given adequate weight to the facts that (i) the appointment of her examiners was made by Professor Bullough, the chairman of the higher degree sub-committee of the board of studies in zoology, (ii) Professor Gahan was himself a member of this board of studies and (iii) no criticism has ever been made of the qualifications of the three additional examiners appointed for her re-examination, consisting of Professor Mitcheson, the chairman of the board of studies in zoology, and two outside examiners. Unfortunately, instead of bearing these matters in mind and accepting the decision of the committee in the circumstances, she launched on a second petition for a rehearing on three new grounds which can only be described as marginal.

- Firstly, she pointed out that the university had been wrong in its answer to the first petition in referring to Dr Thorndyke as the 'Senior Lecturer in Zoology at Bedford College' with whom Professor Dales had discussed the names of Professors Gahan and Holt as possible examiners, and that this description of Dr Thorndyke had been repeated by the committee in their decision. So far as it went, this criticism was justified. Dr Thorndyke was in fact merely a lecturer in zoology, not the senior lecturer. The applicant also claimed that he was of no greater seniority and possessed no greater knowledge than she herself. Before the hearing of the second petition the university readily agreed that there had unfortunately been a mistake in referring to Dr Thorndyke as 'senior' lecturer. Obviously, however, this was not a point of any great moment in relation to the reasonableness or otherwise of the appointment by Professor Bullough of Professors Gahan and Holt as her examiners.

- Secondly, the applicant unfortunately spent a great deal of time and effort in challenging the reference in the university's answer to Professor Gahan's PhD having been obtained in 1964 'in, according to the University's Records, Zoology-Histochemistry'. She contended that the reference to zoology was inaccurate. This unfortunately started what can only be described as a paper chase. The applicant referred to the catalogue of doctoral theses in the university library which included Professor Gahan's work under the heading 'Biochemistry' and not under 'Zoology'. But in answer to this it was pointed out that the catalogue merely contained a librarian's classification, whereas the official minute of the senate of the university dated 29 January 1964 referred to 'Zoology-Histochemistry' as part of the description of this particular thesis. However, undaunted, the applicant thereupon embarked on a process of analysing the contents of this thesis in order to seek to show that it had no possible connection with zoology.

Again, these matters speak for themselves and could hardly have been expected to lay any foundation for a rehearing.

The third new point was that the applicant complained that the appointment of the examiners had been made by Professor Bullough in person, as chairman of the higher degree sub-committee of the board of studies in zoology, and not by the sub-committee itself. On behalf of Professor Bullough it was explained that he had made the appointments during the long vacation with the best intentions, in order to avoid delay in the consideration of the applicant's thesis until after the next (combined) meeting of the board of studies and of the higher degree sub-committee which was only due to take place on 29 October 1979. As shown by the minutes of that meeting, Professor Bullough then reported this appointment among many others, all of which were noted by the sub-committee without disapproval. But these matters were brushed aside by the applicant. Her complaint in this regard in her second petition was that the circumstances did not justify what in the practice of the university's organisational hierarchy, as in the case of many committees generally, is referred to as 'chairman's action'. She said that this was only appropriate in cases of emergencies and not in circumstances such as hers. Again, this is clearly not a point of any weight on the merits. On the appeal before us counsel for the applicant then sought to take this point one stage further when he indicated that there was in fact no provision for 'chairman's action' anywhere in the university's statutes, regulations or instructions. Although this quasi-jurisdictional point had not been raised before the committee, he submitted that it had been available in the material before them and that it would in any event be appropriate for consideration by the committee if the whole matter were now remitted to them, as he submitted it should be. On the other hand, so far as concerns the merits of this point, he did not seek to challenge the statement made by counsel on behalf of the university that 'chairman's action' was, as one might expect, a recognised practice at all committee levels in the university's hierarchy. For present purposes, in the context of appointing examiners for PhD candidates, the chain of delegation led from the senate via the academic council and the board of studies in zoology to the higher degree sub-committee of that board whose chairman at the time had been Professor Bullough. No criticism of his qualifications has ever been advanced, and he clearly acted with the best intentions. All this again speaks for itself.

I am bound to say that in my view no weight is to be attached to any of these points. The committee clearly thought so too. If they had simply expressed a view to the same effect in dismissing the second petition for a rehearing of the first petition, then the applicant's position on this aspect of her present application would have been entirely unarguable. However, counsel for the applicant still had one further submission. He referred to a short note of the hearing of the second petition made by the registrar of the Privy Council, Mr D H O Owen, and a longer note made by someone on behalf of the university which was exhibited to an affidavit before us. These notes showed, as he submitted, that in dealing seriatim with the applicant's points, although this aspect was not mentioned in the committee's formal dismissal of the second petition, Lord Brightman appears to have regarded the committee as bound to apply the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ladd v Marshall [1954] 3 All ER 745, [1954] 1 WLR 1489 to the new points sought to be raised by the applicant. In particular Lord Brightman appears to have insisted on the application of the rule that fresh evidence could only be received if it could not have been procured with reasonable diligence at the time of the prior hearing.

I agree with that submission to the extent that the notes in question are capable of bearing this interpretation. Thus, according to Mr Owen's note, Lord Brightman said, after the committee had called on counsel for the university on one point, that 'their jurisdiction was restricted and they could not order a rehearing except in very limited circumstances'. And, according to the note taken on behalf of the university, there was a similar reference to the committee's 'jurisdiction' being 'very limited indeed' to direct a further hearing. But in my view this criticism rests merely on semantics. Thus, in an

- earlier passage in the same note, Lord Brightman pointed out to the applicant that the committee were concerned 'as to whether there was a case for further hearing'. The notes show that Lord Brightman was throughout seeking to explain to the applicant the rules which would be applied by the courts to the new points on which she sought to rely. But it does not follow at all that Lord Brightman had formed the view that the committee was bound to refuse a rehearing on these grounds as a matter of law, even if they had otherwise wished to have the petition reheard. All that he was doing was to point out what would be the corresponding situation in court proceedings and to indicate that the committee approached the application for a rehearing on the same basis, as they were plainly entitled to do. The reality, as it seems to me, is that in the circumstances the application for a rehearing could never have had any prospect of success, and that in their conduct of it the committee were only concerned to show sympathy for the applicant, who appeared in person. There is no ground for remitting the applicant's petition to the committee, either in law or as a matter of discretion.

In all the circumstances I can find no basis for the grant of any relief by way of judicial review, and I would accordingly dismiss this application.

- SIMON BROWN J. I agree with Kerr LJ's judgment, and for the reasons which he gives I too would dismiss this application. Only in recognition of the clear general importance of the question which arises on the nature and scope of the visitor's jurisdiction and in deference to counsel's careful arguments do I add a short judgment of my own.

- The rival contentions I understand to be essentially as follows. Counsel for the applicant submits that the proper exercise of visitatorial jurisdiction is certainly not limited to a Wednesbury type review (see Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223.) Rather he describes the visitor's role as intimate and interventionist, extending to the resolution of questions of fact as well as to ensuring that the relevant domestic rules have been both substantively and procedurally followed. But counsel for the applicant accepts, indeed asserts, that there can be no single a priori characterisation of the proper approach to the exercise of this jurisdiction. Rather he recognises that this must always depend on two considerations: first, the particular law, rule or custom which the visitor is being required to enforce; and, second, the character of the breach alleged. There is, he suggests, a wide spectrum ('continuum' was his word) of possible grievances on which the visitor may be called to adjudicate. The nature of the particular grievance will dictate where in that spectrum the dispute falls and on that will in turn depend whether the visitor's role is essentially supervisory in nature or whether instead it is to a greater or lesser extent an independent fact-finding and judgment-forming role, akin more to an appellate than a review jurisdiction. Unlike Kerr LJ, I did not understand counsel for the applicant to submit that the exercise of a merely supervisory jurisdiction would necessarily and invariably be wrong; rather that it should not generally be regarded as the correct approach.

- Counsel for the visitor contends for an altogether more restricted visitatorial role. In particular he submits that the visitor's function is essentially to construe and carry into effect the regulations of the foundation; it is not to usurp the role of members of the foundation to whom those internal regulations accord specific executive functions of their own. The visitor is, he points out, in a fundamentally different position to that of the particular university organ charged with the decision on the merits. The analogy, he suggests, is with the review jurisdiction of this court; indeed, he submits the analogy is exact. Just as this court's supervisory role is limited to ensuring that a particular regime (he instanced immigration control) created and entrusted by the legislation to some public law body is being lawfully operated in accordance with Parliament's declared will, so the visitor must ensure that the university regime is being operated according to the will of the founder as the instigator of that particular charitable regime. In the instant case, indeed, the analogy is contended to be yet more precise, since the founder's will is itself now enshrined in statute. Nor, the argument runs, is this an artificial or inappropriate limitation of role to ascribe to the visitor, any more than the limited character of the court's review jurisdiction is itself properly to be regarded as in the nature of a self-denying ordinance. Rather in both cases Parliament has legislated for decisions to be taken by bodies apart from the visitor or the court (as the case may be) and it would be wrong for either of those tribunals to usurp such expressly conferred decision-making functions. a

The argument is ostensibly confined to cases where the internal law commits the decision on the merits to an organ of the university. Counsel for the visitor accepts that other disputes may well fall to be decided by the visitor himself on the merits. b

Seductively though this argument was presented, I find great difficulty in accepting it. In the first place it seems to me that the internal laws will generally commit the relevant decision, that is the decision creating the grievance before the visitor, to some specific body within the foundation. Take, for instance, the facts in Thomas v University of Bradford [1987] 1 All ER 834, [1987] 2 WLR 677. Miss Thomas was removed from office under a 'good cause' condition which provided for a person's removal from office in given circumstances (broadly, criminal conviction, incapacity or misconduct) which the university 'Court or the Council (as the case may be) considers to be such as to render the person concerned unfit for the execution of the duties of his office' or 'such as to constitute failure or inability of the person concerned to perform the duties of his office or to comply with the conditions of tenure of his office' (see [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 836-837, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 679-680). On its face that internal law clearly commits the merits of the decision whether or not good cause exists to specified university organs. Yet Lord Griffiths plainly regarded the visitor as empowered to determine for himself that self-same question on the merits; he expressly envisaged 'a case in which on appeal the visitor concluded that there has been no "good cause" for the dismissal of a member of the academic staff' (see [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 849, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 694; my emphasis). Were it indeed otherwise, people like Miss Thomas dismissed by the university would be gravely disadvantaged compared to those in other employment, who, in an action for wrongful dismissal, would clearly be entitled to the court's own independent decision on the substantive merits of the dispute. c

Nor am I persuaded of the exactness of the suggested analogy between the visitor's role and that of this court when exercising its review jurisdiction. Rather it appears to me fallacious. Judicial review is the exercise of the court's inherent power at common law to determine whether action is lawful or not; in a word to uphold the rule of law. There is, of course, no question of this court entertaining an appeal from a decision entrusted by Parliament or the prerogative to another public body; rights of appeal, indeed, are by definition always statutory. But the visitor's jurisdiction is in my judgment sui generis. It is unconstrained by those considerations which operate to confine this court's powers. The statutes of the university provide only for the visitor's identity. Nothing whatever is laid down as to the precise role which he should play in the resolution of whatever domestic disputes may be referred to him. In my judgment the decision in Thomas, determining as it does the exclusivity of visitorial jurisdiction where it arises, underlines also the need for such jurisdiction to assume whatever breadth and character will best enable the visitor to discharge his ultimate function. That function was described by Lord Griffiths as being the 'judge of the laws of the foundation [who] should . . . have the power to right a wrong done to a member or office holder in the foundation by the misapplication of those laws' (see [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 849, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 694). Lord Ackner put it that the visitor 'must be entitled, in order to ensure that the domestic law is properly applied, to redress any grievance that has resulted from the misapplication of that domestic law' (see [1987] 1 All ER 834 at 852, [1987] 2 WLR 677 at 698). f

I conclude therefore that the visitor enjoys untrammelled jurisdiction to investigate and correct wrongs done in the administration of the internal law of the foundation to which he is appointed: a general power to right wrongs and redress grievances. And if a that on occasion requires the visitor to act akin rather to an appeal court than to a review court, so be it. Indeed there may well be occasions when he could not properly act other than as an essentially appellate tribunal.

b The difference between visitatorial and this court's supervisory jurisdiction may be illustrated thus. It will often be inappropriate for this court in the exercise of its review jurisdiction to investigate the facts underlying the legal dispute before it. Equally, this court must from time to time leave undisturbed a decision on the merits which it believes to be wrong because it recognises that there is properly room for two views on the point. But in my judgment there are no such limitations on the visitor's jurisdiction: he may, indeed should, investigate the basic facts to whatever depth he feels appropriate and he may interfere with any decision which he concludes to be wrong, even though he feels unable to categorise it as Wednesbury unreasonable.

c Generally speaking, therefore, I prefer the approach urged on us by counsel for the applicant. But it nevertheless remains important to recognise that many decisions giving rise to dispute will be subject to considerations which quite properly inhibit the visitor from embarking on any independent fact-finding role. I agree with Kerr LJ that this is as plainly true of the appointment of examiners as of the decision of such examiners on the standard attained by a candidate. But in both cases this seems to me less because the university statutes expressly entrust those decisions to the discretion of particular d members of the university than that these members are peculiarly fitted by their eminence, experience and expertise to arrive at proper decisions. This, indeed, was the essential burden of the submissions of counsel on behalf of the university. And it must be remembered that even courts exercising an unlimited appellate jurisdiction on occasions recognise that the tribunal appealed from may have an expertise which e particularly qualifies it to decide a given question and will accordingly decline to intervene, save only if satisfied that such tribunal was clearly wrong (see for instance the Court of Appeal decision in Race Relations Board v Associated Newspapers Group Ltd [1978] 3 All ER 419, [1978] 1 WLR 905).

f My final conclusion, therefore, is that the visitor's role cannot properly be characterised either as supervisory or appellate. It has no exact analogy with that of the ordinary courts. It cannot usefully be defined beyond saying that the visitor has untrammelled power to investigate and right wrongs arising from the application of the domestic laws of a charitable foundation; untrammelled, that is, save only and always that the visitor must recognise the full width of his jurisdiction and yet approach its exercise in any given case reasonably (in the public law sense). I wholly share Kerr LJ's conclusions on the instant application that, in regard to each petition, the committee did indeed both recognise the g full width of their visitatorial jurisdiction and approach its exercise entirely properly.

Application dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LLOYD, GLIDEWELL LJ AND SIR JOHN MEGAW

29, 30 APRIL, 1, 15 MAY 1987

Shipping – Commencement of lay days – Arrived ship under berth charterparty – Notice of readiness – Charterparty providing that notice of readiness could be given ‘whether in berth or not’ – Vessel arriving at port but unable to berth because of fog although berth available – Notice of readiness given on arrival – Whether ‘whether in berth or not’ clause converting berth charter into port charter – Whether notice of readiness could be given on arrival if berth available but unable to be reached because of weather.

A berth charterparty included standard provisions that laytime was to commence at the discharging port after notice of readiness was given, that time lost waiting for a berth was to count as discharging time and that the master had the right to tender notice of readiness ‘whether in berth or not’. When the vessel arrived at the discharging port a berth was available for her but she could not proceed to the berth because of fog. Nevertheless, immediately on arrival the master gave the charterer notice of readiness to discharge. On the owner’s claim for demurrage, the arbitrator held that the ‘whether in berth or not’ clause converted the berth charter into a port charter, so that as soon as the ship arrived within the port the master was entitled to give notice of readiness, and therefore the owner was entitled to the demurrage claimed. On appeal by the charterer, the judge set aside the award on the grounds (i) that the charter remained a berth charter despite the ‘whether in berth or not’ clause, which merely had the limited effect of enabling notice of readiness to be given on arrival in port if a berth was not available, and (ii) that in any event the notice of readiness was invalid, since the vessel was not at the charterer’s immediate and effective disposal when it was given, because of the fog. The owners appealed.

(1) The effect of including a ‘whether in berth or not’ clause in a berth charterparty was to convert the charter into a port charter for the purpose of calculating laytime, so that a valid notice of readiness could be given to start laytime running as soon as the vessel arrived in the discharging port even though the only reason the vessel could not reach a berth which was available was bad weather. It followed that, provided the other conditions for a valid notice of readiness had been fulfilled, the master had been entitled to give notice of readiness on arrival at the port although a berth was available but could not be reached because of fog (see p 225 f to j, p 226 j, p 229 e and p 230 a b e f, post); dicta of Buckley and Roskill LJ in The Johanna Oldendorff [1972] 3 All ER at 433, 445, of Lord Diplock in Federal Commerce and Navigation Co Ltd v Tradax Export SA, The Maratha Envoy [1977] 2 All ER at 857 and Surrey Shipping Co Ltd v Cie Continentale (France) SA, The Shackleford [1978] 1 WLR 1080 considered.

(2) The precondition to giving a valid notice of readiness, namely that the vessel had arrived at the place in the port where she was at the charterer’s immediate and effective disposal, was fulfilled when the vessel arrived at the place in the port where ships waiting for a berth usually lay and it was not necessary to show that the circumstances prevailing at the time of arrival at the usual waiting place, e.g. the weather, were such as to enable the vessel to proceed directly to a berth if one was available. It followed that the vessel had been at the charterer’s immediate and effective disposal when the notice of readiness had been given even though fog prevented the vessel from proceeding from her waiting a place to her berth. Accordingly, the notice of readiness was valid and had the effect that laytime began to run (see p 228 g to j, p 229 e and p 230 f to h, post); The Johanna Oldendorff [1973] 3 All ER 148 applied.

Appeal

f Seacrysal Shipping Ltd (the owners) appealed against the judgment of Webster J given on 31 July 1987 setting aside the award of the arbitrator, Mr Bruce Harris, dated 26 November 1985, in the arbitration of a dispute between the owners and the charterers, Bulk Transport Group Shipping Co Ltd (the charterers), arising out of the charter in the Gencon Box form of the vessel Kyzikos, in which he decided that the owners' claim for demurrage succeeded in full. The judge set aside the award on the grounds (i) that the inclusion in the charterparty of a 'whether in berth or not' clause in relation to the commencement of laytime at the loading and discharging ports did not convert the berth charter into a port charter and only enabled notice of readiness to be given on arrival in the discharging port if a berth was not available, not if a berth was available but could not be reached because of bad weather, and (ii) that the notice of readiness given by the owners immediately on arrival at the port was invalid because the vessel was not then at the charterers' immediate and effective disposal because of bad weather. By a respondent's notice the charterers contended that the judgment should be confirmed on the additional grounds that the 'whether in berth or not' clause did not apply to the discharging clause
g of the charterparty and therefore a valid notice of readiness could not be given, and h laytime could not commence, before the vessel berthed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lloyd LJ.

Bernard Eder for the charterers.

15 May. The following judgments were delivered.

LLOYD LJ. The amount at stake in this appeal is relatively small. But the case raises two questions on which there is said to be no direct authority and on which arbitrators in the City of London are said to have differed. Both questions are of some importance in calculating laytime under charterparties which allow owners the right to give notice of readiness 'whether in berth or not'.

The first question is whether owners can give a valid notice of readiness when a berth is vacant but the vessel is prevented from reaching her berth by reason of bad weather, in this case fog. Counsel for the charterers submits, and the judge has held, that 'whether in berth or not' applies only when the berths are congested or otherwise unavailable.

The second question is whether, if that be wrong, and if the effect of 'whether in berth or not' is, as is often said, to convert what would otherwise be a berth charter into a port charter, the vessel can be said to be at the 'immediate and effective disposition of charterers' even though she is unable, at the moment of giving her notice of readiness, to proceed to her berth by reason of fog. Counsel for the charterers submits, and the judge has held, that the vessel would not be an 'arrived ship' in such circumstances under a port charter, and therefore could not give a valid notice of readiness in reliance on the 'whether in berth or not' provision.

The facts are that the Kyzikos was chartered on the Gencon Box layout form to load a cargo of steel and/or steel products in Italy for discharge in US Gulf. She arrived at Houston on 17 December 1984 at 0645 hrs. A berth was available for her, but she could not proceed to her berth by reason of fog. She gave notice of readiness as soon as she arrived on 17 December. The precise time does not matter. The owners say that time began to run at 1400 hrs the same day. If they are right, they are entitled to $30,435 by way of demurrage. The vessel was not able to berth, by reason of the fog, until 1450 hrs on 20 December. The charterers say that the owners were not entitled to give notice of readiness until the vessel berthed, or perhaps until she left her anchorage on her way to the berth. If they are right, there is nothing due by way of demurrage.

The charter provided that the vessel was to proceed to her discharging port or place, namely: '1/2 safe always afloat, always accessible berth(s) each port—1/2 safe port(s) U.S. Gulf': see box 11. Clauses 5 and 6 provide as follows:

'5. Loading

Time to commence at 2 p.m. if notice of readiness to load is given BEFORE NOON AND at 8 a.m. next working day if notice given during office hours after noon . . . Time lost in waiting for berth to count as loading time. Time to count as per Clause 5 Wipon/Wibon/Wifpon/Wcon and Master to have the right to tender Notice of Readiness by cable, both in the loading and discharging port(s).

6. Discharging

Cargo to be received by Merchants at their risk and expense alongside the vessel not beyond the reach of her tackle and to be discharged in the number of running working days stated in Box 17. Time to commence at 2 p.m. if notice of readiness to discharge is given before noon and at 8 a.m. next working day if notice given during office hours after noon. Time lost in waiting for berth to count as discharging time.

The last sentence of cl 5 was introduced by an insert, typed vertically in the central space between the two columns of printed clauses. It is connected to cl 5, which is in the ordinary horizontal position in the left hand column, by means of an asterisk and a black line.

It was common ground that, by virtue of box 11, the contractual destination was the discharging berth. In other words this was a berth charter rather than a port charter. Counsel for the charterers advanced a preliminary argument that 'whether in berth or not' applied only to loading (cl 5) and not to discharging (cl 6). This argument did not occur to the experienced arbitrator, Mr Bruce Harris, who made his award on documents without any oral hearing. The argument was rejected by the judge. He seems to have been in doubt whether the argument was even open. I agree with the judge, and say no more about it.

The arbitrator held on what he regarded as 'well established authority' that the effect of 'whether in berth or not' was to make what would otherwise have been a berth charter into a port charter. He went on to hold that time started to run at 1400 hrs on 17

a December 1984, in accordance with the owners' time sheet. He does not seem to have considered that the notice of readiness might be invalid on the ground that the vessel was not then at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterers by reason of fog.

b The judge took a different view on both points. As to the first point he held that the primary obligation of the shipowners was to reach the contractual destination, namely the berth. 'Whether in berth or not' did not override that obligation. The charter remained a berth charter. 'Whether in berth or not' had only a limited effect. It meant that notice of readiness could be given, and time start to run, when the vessel was within the named port, waiting for a berth to become available. Here the vessel was not waiting for a berth to become available. She was waiting for the fog to clear. The point is put by the judge with admirable clarity and precision as follows:

c 'It is one thing to say that a vessel can give notice of readiness when it is ready to unload and cannot come alongside because no berth is available; it is another thing to say that a vessel is to be treated as having arrived at the berth when it has arrived at the port, even though a berth is available.'

d Counsel for the charterers supports the judge's reasoning by a number of powerful arguments. He accepts that the risk of a berth being unavailable is normally for charterers' account. But the navigational risk of getting to berth is normally for owners' account. There has never been a case, he says, in which 'whether in berth or not' has been applied where a berth has been available but the vessel has been prevented from reaching her berth by bad weather. On principle the provision should not be applied in such a case. He relies on the dictum of Lord Diplock in Federal Commerce and Navigation Co Ltd v Tradax Export SA, The Maratha Envoy [1977] 2 All ER 849 at 857, [1978] AC 1 at 14:

e 'The effect of this well-known phrase in berth charters has been settled for more than half a century. Under it time starts to run when the vessel is waiting within the named port of destination for a berth there to become vacant.'

f I feel the force of these arguments. But I cannot accept them. I do not doubt that the reason why the provision was originally included in berth charters was to cater for the case where the port is congested and a berth unavailable. But there is nothing in the wording of the provision which limits its operation to such a case. The wording is quite general. Notice of readiness may be given whether in berth or not. Ex hypothesi, therefore, notice of readiness may be given before the vessel has reached its contractual destination. Some limit must, of course, be placed on the provision. Nobody suggests that notice of readiness can be given while the vessel is still at sea (I say nothing as to the effect of 'whether in port or not', which was also included in this charterparty, but as to which we heard no argument).

g If then a limit is to be placed on the clause, it is to my mind better that the limit should be by reference to the place at which notice of readiness may be given rather than the reason why the vessel is unable to proceed to her berth. Certainty, as has been said so often, is of great importance in these matters. The traditional view of 'whether in berth or not' has always been that it becomes operative so as to enable a valid notice of readiness to be given as soon as the vessel has arrived in port, provided the other conditions of a valid notice of readiness are satisfied. The traditional view is preferable as a matter of construction and affords a greater degree of certainty in practice. I would hold that 'whether in berth or not' enables a valid notice of readiness to be given once the vessel has arrived in port, even though the reason why she is prevented from proceeding further is not the unavailability of a berth but bad weather.

j The arbitrator held, as I have mentioned, that the effect of 'whether in berth or not' when included in a berth charter is to convert the berth charter into a port charter. No doubt he had in mind Roskill LJ's dictum in The Johanna Oldendorff, E L Oldendorff & Co GmbH v Tradax Export SA [1972] 3 All ER 420 at 445, [1974] AC 479 at 515, where he said:

'The phrase "whether in berth or not" was designed to convert a berth charterparty into a port charterparty and to ensure that under a berth charterparty notice of

readiness could be given as soon as the ship had arrived within the commercial area of the port concerned so that laytime would start to run on its expiry.' a

To the same effect is a sentence of Lord Diplock in Federal Commerce and Navigation Co Ltd v Tradax Export SA, The Maratha Envoy: 'In effect it makes the Reid test applicable to a berth charter.' Lord Diplock went on to express approval of the judgments of Buckley and Roskill LJ in The Johanna Oldendorff:

'Buckley and Roskill LJ were in my view only repeating there what had already become a matter of legal certainty in English law as to the meaning and effect of the phrase "whether in berth or not", save that they were at that time bound by The Allo [1960] 2 All ER 578, [1961] AC 135...' b

It is sometimes said, and was said by the judge in the present case, that there is a difference of view between Buckley and Roskill LJ. Roskill LJ said that the phrase converted a berth charter into a port charter tout simple (see [1972] 3 All ER 420 at 445, [1974] AC 479 at 515), whereas Buckley LJ preferred the view that the phrase merely advanced the time at which laydays start to run, even though the ship may not have become an arrived ship in the technical sense (see [1972] 3 All ER 420 at 433, [1974] AC 479 at 501). c

As to this alleged difference of view I would make three comments. Firstly, Lord Diplock in the passage I have cited did not perceive any difference of view. Secondly, it makes no practical difference which view is correct. The only significance of a vessel becoming an arrived ship is to start the clock ticking. Provided the clock starts to tick it is immaterial whether the ship is an arrived ship or not, or whether she has reached her contractual destination. To ask whether she is still theoretically engaged on the carrying stage of the adventure or whether she has embarked on the discharging stage is to ask a barren question without practical import. The only question that matters is whether she is entitled to give notice of readiness, so as to start laytime running. Thirdly, I should mention the decision of this court in Surrey Shipping Co Ltd v Cie Continentale (France) SA, The Shackleford [1978] 1 WLR 1080, to which the judge was not referred. One of the questions in that case was whether, in a berth charter with a 'whether in berth or not' provision, time spent shifting between berths was for owners' or charterers' account. Sir David Cairns, in giving the leading judgment, referred to the judgments of Buckley and Roskill LJ in The Johanna Oldendorff and said that he preferred the view of Roskill LJ ([1978] 1 WLR 1080 at 1091). Buckley LJ said (at 1092): d

'With deference to Sir David Cairns, it does not seem to me that Roskill L.J. and I were differing in our views expressed in The Johanna Oldendorff, as he suggests. Roskill L.J. was, I think, speaking of a straightforward berth charterparty into which the words "whether in berth or not" were written, as I also was. I did not suggest that such a charterparty would have any different effect from a port charterparty. Any difference between Roskill L.J. and myself related, it seems to me, only to the way in which it was more satisfactory to rationalise or express this result.' e

Bridge LJ said (at 1093): f

'I agree with the judgment of Sir David Cairns, subject only to the gloss put upon its reasoning in relation to the shifting point by Buckley L.J., with whose judgment I also agree.' g

There is thus a majority of this court for the view that there is no difference in the result between Buckley and Roskill LJ; the only difference is as to the way the result should be rationalised or expressed. I would wholeheartedly support that view. In practical terms the effect of 'whether in berth or not' is to turn a berth charter into a port charter so that, in the words of Lord Diplock, the Reid test (to which I shall return later) applies to the commencement of laytime. The consequence of the judge's judgment in the present case is to resuscitate a distinction between Buckley and Roskill LJ and to give h it practical effect. I would regard that consequence as undesirable, even if it were open to us. In the light of The Shackleford, I do not think it is.

Finally, on the first point, I should return to the dictum of Lord Diplock in The Maratha Envoy [1977] 2 All ER 849 at 857, [1978] AC 1 at 14 that where 'whether in berth or not' is incorporated in a berth charter, time starts to run 'when the vessel is waiting within the named port of destination for a berth there to become vacant'. Although this dictum is accurate as it stands for the very great majority of cases, where the reason why a vessel cannot proceed immediately to her berth is because of congestion, it would be accurate for the present case as well if for the last seven words there were substituted 'to proceed to her berth'.

I should also mention the definition of 'whether in berth or not' contained in the Charterparty Laytime Definitions 1980 issued jointly by BIMCO, CMI, FONASBA and GCSB as follows:

"'WHETHER IN BERTH OR NOT' . . . means that if the location named for loading/discharging is a berth and if the berth is not immediately accessible to the ship a notice of readiness can be given when the ship has arrived at the port in which the berth is situated.'

It will be noticed that the above definition is not limited to cases where the berth is unavailable. 'Immediately accessible' is wider than 'immediately available' and would appear to cover a case where the berth is inaccessible through bad weather as well as cases where it is inaccessible through congestion. The definition is therefore consistent with the view which I have formed.

I now turn to the second question. Was the vessel at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterers when she gave her notice of readiness? If not, then the notice would be invalid and time would not begin to run. This question seems to have occupied less time in the court below than it did before us. In some ways, however, it is the more important of the two questions. Counsel for the charterers argues that the vessel could not, as a matter of common sense, be said to be at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterers if she was unable to proceed by reason of fog. The arbitrator has found that the pilot station had closed down. Without a pilot the vessel was as much disabled as if her steering gear had broken down or her master and crew were on strike. Even in a port charter, navigational delays are at the risk of the owners. So even if, in a port charter, the vessel would otherwise have arrived, nevertheless if at the moment of arrival she is unable to proceed to her berth by reason of bad weather she is not entitled to give notice of readiness. In support of his argument counsel for the charterers relied on Kell v Anderson (1842) 10 M & W 498, 152 ER 567, which, although an old authority, is, he submits, the only authority directly in point.

I cannot accept the argument of counsel for the charterers. The conditions which must be fulfilled before a vessel is entitled to give notice of readiness in a port charter are now well established. Firstly, she must have arrived at the place within the port where she is at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterers. Secondly, she must be ready, so far as she is concerned, to load or discharge her cargo. She need not be absolutely ready, for example, by having all her cargo gear fixed up and in position. But she must be capable of being made ready, in ordinary course, by the time her cargo gear is needed. If therefore her steering gear were broken down, so that she was unable to get to her berth, or if her cargo gear were broken down, so that she was incapable of loading or discharging, the second condition would not be fulfilled, and a purported notice of readiness would be invalid. However, it is not suggested in the present case that the second condition was not fulfilled or that the vessel was not ready in herself. The suggestion is that the first condition was not fulfilled.

The decision of the majority of the House of Lords in Sociedad Financiera de Bienes Raices SA v Agrimpex Hungarian Trading Co for Agricultural Products, The Aello [1960] 2 All ER 578, [1961] AC 135 approved the so-called Parker test for an arrived ship in a port charter, namely that the vessel must have reached that part of the port where a ship can be loaded when a berth is available, known as the commercial area, albeit she cannot be loaded until a berth is available. It was held that the usual waiting place at Buenos Aires, some 22 miles downstream, was not within the commercial area.

In The Johanna Oldendorff [1973] 3 All ER 148, [1974] AC 479 the House of Lords overruled The Aello. There was substituted for the Parker test what has become known as the Reid test ([1973] 3 All ER 148 at 157, [1974] AC 479 at 535):

'On the whole matter I think that it ought to be made clear that the essential factor is that before a ship can be treated as an arrived ship she must be within the port and at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterer and that her geographical position is of secondary importance. But for practical purposes it is so much easier to establish that, if the ship is at a usual waiting place within the port, it can generally be presumed that she is there fully at the charterer's disposal. I would therefore state what I would hope to be the true legal position in this way. Before a ship can be said to have arrived at a port she must, if she cannot proceed immediately to a berth, have reached a position within the port where she is at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterer. If she is at a place where waiting ships usually lie, she will be in such a position unless in some extraordinary circumstances proof of which would lie in the charterer.'

The facts in The Johanna Oldendorff were that the vessel was anchored in the usual waiting place at the Mersey Bar, some 17 miles from her discharging spot. If the House of Lords had applied the Parker test, it is clear that the vessel would not have arrived. She was not in that part of the port where she could be loaded or discharged when a berth became available. But applying the Reid test she had arrived, since she was at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterers. The effect of substituting the Reid test for the Parker test was to extend the distance from the actual loading or discharging spot at which she could be said to have arrived, though she must still be within the legal limits of the port: see The Maratha Envoy.

In the days when the Parker test prevailed, it was never, so far as I know, suggested that the weather was a relevant factor. Once a ship was anchored in the commercial area and ready in herself she was entitled to give notice of readiness even if she was unable to proceed to her berth by reason of bad weather. So if the present case had been decided before The Aello had been overruled I do not doubt that owners would have succeeded. Counsel for the charterers, however, submits that the Reid test, in addition to extending the distance from the actual loading or discharging spot at which the vessel might be said to have arrived, introduced a wholly new factor. If his submission is correct, it is now necessary to consider not just the place where the vessel is anchored, waiting to get into berth, but also the circumstances prevailing at the moment of her arrival. If the weather is good when she arrives at the ordinary place of waiting, so that she could proceed direct to her berth if a berth were available, she can give a valid notice of readiness. But if the weather is bad, and the pilot station has closed down, she cannot give a valid notice of readiness until the weather improves even though she is anchored in precisely the same place.

I do not believe that the Reid test was intended to introduce a new factor into the equation. It is true that Lord Reid speaks of a vessel's geographical position being of secondary importance. But it is still a position which he has in mind. If she is in the place where waiting ships usually lie, then she will normally be in the required position. In exceptional or extraordinary cases, the proof of which would lie on the charterers, she may be required to be at some other place. But nothing in Lord Reid's speech suggests that if she is where waiting ships usually lie she may nevertheless not be at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterers because of the weather. It was conceded by counsel for the charterers that a vessel could be at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterers despite a temporary obstruction in the fairway preventing her getting to her berth when vacant. I can see no difference in principle between a temporary obstruction of the fairway and the temporary closing down of the pilot station by reason of fog or by reason of a strike or for any other reason.

Nor does Lord Diplock's speech in The Johanna Oldendorff [1973] 3 All ER 148 at 178–179, [1974] AC 479 at 560–561 suggest that he had anything in mind other than arrival at a place as determining whether a vessel has 'arrived' or not. The Reid test is, as Lord Diplock says, a convenient and practical test for ascertaining where that place is. It would be much less convenient and practical if, in addition to ascertaining where that place is, one had also to inquire as to the circumstances prevailing at the moment when the vessel arrived at that place. At present there are only two questions to be answered: where does the vessel have to be? and is she ready in herself? The Reid test provides the answer to the first of those questions. I see nothing in favour of having to ask a third question, to which the answer would vary according to the circumstances.

So I would reject the submissions of counsel for the charterers on both the main points in the case. That is sufficient to decide this appeal in favour of the owners. It makes it unnecessary to consider an alternative argument advanced by counsel for the owners that the charterers were in breach of their obligation under box 11 to nominate a berth which was 'always accessible' on arrival. I am glad to be able to take that course because it is doubtful, to say the least, whether the point is now open to the owners having regard to the course which the case took before the arbitrator.

The questions of law certified by the judge do not correspond precisely with the questions as I have dealt with them. But I do not think this matters. I am satisfied that the questions which I have dealt with are sufficiently comprehended within the question originally certified. So it is unnecessary to decide whether the judge had power to certify a second question. I would only add, for what it may be worth, that I was unconvinced by the argument of counsel for the charterers that he had no such power.

For the reasons I have given I would allow this appeal.

GLIDEWELL LJ. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgment of Lloyd LJ. I agree with him that the appeal should be allowed. I add some short comments of my own only because we are differing from the conclusion of the judge.

Between cl 5 of the charterparty, headed 'Loading', and cl 6, headed 'Discharging', there were inserted the words on which the issue in the present case turns. So far as material they were:

'Time to count as per Clause 5 . . . Wibon . . . and Master to have the right to tender Notice of Readiness by cable . . . in the . . . discharging port(s).'

I am not sure whether this sentence is to be treated as part of cl 5 or as a separate though unnumbered additional clause. It is clear to me, however, that the clause applies at the discharging port. If the argument to the contrary is open to the charterers at this stage I, together with Webster J and Lloyd LJ, would reject it.

In The Johanna Oldendorff, E L Oldendorff & Co GmbH v Tradax Export SA [1972] 3 All ER 420 at 433, [1974] AC 479 at 501 Buckley LJ said:

'In the case of a berth charter the ship does not reach her destination until she is berthed. In the case of such a charter the insertion of the words "whether in berth or not" makes lay days run from a time when the ship has not yet berthed. Whether it is right to say that the effect of the insertion in such a case is to make the operation of the charter the same as a port charter, so that the ship should be treated as "arrived" although she has not berthed, or whether the insertion merely advances the time from which lay days run notwithstanding that the ship may not technically have arrived, perhaps does not much matter. The latter seems to me to be probably the more correct view.'

It is clear from this passage that Buckley LJ was saying that, whichever description of the effect of a 'whether in berth or not' clause is correct, the effect is the same. Thus Buckley LJ was not disagreeing in substance with the view of Roskill LJ in the passage from his judgment (quoted by Lloyd LJ [1972] 3 All ER 420 at 445, [1974] AC 479 at 515). Indeed, as Lloyd LJ points out, Buckley LJ himself later said that the only difference related to 'the way in which it was more satisfactory to rationalise or express this result' (The Shackelford [1978] 1 WLR 1080 at 1092). Thus I agree with Lloyd LJ that the effect of the 'whether in berth or not' clause in this charterparty was to turn the charter in effect into a port charter for the purpose of calculating lay days and thus to make applicable the test enunciated by Lord Reid in The Johanna Oldendorff [1973] 3 All ER 148 at 157, [1974] AC 479 at 535, which Lloyd LJ has set out.

The judge's conclusion was that the effect of the 'whether in berth or not' clause was that 'under it, time starts to run when the vessel is waiting within the named port for a berth there to become available, ready so far as she is concerned to unload' (my emphasis). I regard this interpretation of the clause as too restricted. The only basis for it is the sentence from the speech of Lord Diplock in The Maratha Envoy [1977] 2 All ER 849 at 857, [1978] AC 1 at 14: '... time starts to run when the vessel is waiting within the named port of destination for a berth there to become vacant.' However, it must be remembered that The Maratha Envoy was a case in which the vessel could not proceed to berth because none was available. Lord Diplock's words were wholly appropriate to such a case. I do not believe that they have the effect of limiting the operation of a 'whether in berth or not' clause to a case where there is no suitable berth available. So to hold would be to read into the words a restricted meaning which, of themselves, they do not bear. Moreover, cl 6 of the charterparty in the present case concludes with the words: 'Time lost in waiting for berth to count as discharging time.' If the 'whether in berth or not' clause had the restricted interpretation put on it by the judge, its effect was a mere duplication of the words already included in cl 6.

Thus I agree with Lloyd LJ that the effect of the 'whether in berth or not' clause was to provide that time started to run when the vessel was waiting in the named port of destination to proceed to her berth. She was in a fit state to proceed to berth and discharge. Thus the owners were entitled to give notice of readiness provided that she was, in Lord Reid's words, 'at the immediate and effective disposition of the charterer'. Whether a ship which is in port and cannot proceed to berth because of fog satisfies that test is the second main issue in the case.

On this issue I am in complete agreement with the views expressed by Lloyd LJ in his judgment. If I said more, I would only be making the same point less effectively.

I also would therefore allow the appeal and restore the award of the arbitrator.

SIR JOHN MEGAW. I agree with both the judgments. As to the suggested difference between the views expressed by Buckley and Roskill LJ in The Johanna Oldendorff, E L Oldendorff & Co GmbH v Tradax Export SA [1972] 3 All ER 420, [1974] AC 479 when it was before this court, I would be content simply to say that no practical difference exists between them.

The issue of substance, as it appears to me, on this appeal is whether, in the now accepted formula, 'the position within the port where she is at the immediate and effective disposal of the charterers', the last nine words are simply part of the definition of the place where the vessel must be. The answer to that question in my opinion is Yes.

Appeal allowed, arbitrator's award restored. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused. No order on respondents' notice of appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD LANE CJ, BOREHAM AND McCOWAN JJ

18, 19 MAY, 11 JUNE 1987

Criminal evidence – Conviction as evidence of commission of offence – Conviction of another as evidence of commission of offence by accused – Commission of offence by another relevant issue at trial of accused – Whether ‘issue’ limited to essential element of offence charged – Whether ‘issue’ having wider meaning – Whether plea of guilty amounting to ‘conviction’ – Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, ss 74(1), 78(1).

In two separate appeals questions arose regarding the circumstances in which a co-defendant's conviction was admissible and whether a guilty plea was admissible as evidence under s 74(1)^a of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which provided that the fact that ‘a person other than the accused has been convicted of an offence . . . shall be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving, where to do so is relevant to any issue in those proceedings, that that person committed that offence . . .’

In the first appeal, R and two co-defendants were charged with conspiracy to commit burglary. The co-defendants pleaded not guilty to the charge of conspiracy but guilty to some 16 burglaries for which they were sentenced to imprisonment. At R's trial, which took place after his co-defendants had been sentenced, the Crown sought to prove the conspiracy by adducing evidence under s 74(1) of the co-defendants' convictions. The evidence was admitted and R was convicted. He appealed, contending (i) that there was no ‘issue’ whether the burglaries had in fact occurred, (ii) that s 74 only applied where the accused had played no part in the offences for which the third party was convicted, and (iii) that the evidence should have been excluded under s 78(1)^b as being unfair because by relying on s 74 to prove the co-defendants' crimes the prosecution had deprived R of an opportunity to cross-examine them.

In the second appeal, G was tried on a count of robbery from a garage. Two men were charged with the same offence and also with having robbed another garage on the previous day. The two men pleaded guilty, but neither had yet been sentenced. The Crown sought to adduce the guilty pleas as evidence under s 74(1) in order to show that the contents of alleged confessions made by G were in accordance with the facts as they were known and thus more likely to be true. The judge admitted the evidence and G was convicted. He appealed, contending, inter alia, that the evidence had been wrongly admitted because the guilty pleas would not amount to ‘convictions’ for the purpose of s 74(1) until sentence was passed.

Held – (1) For the purpose of s 74(1) of the 1984 Act an ‘issue’, in relation to a trial, covered not only an issue which was an essential ingredient in the offence charged (eg in a handling case, the fact that the goods were stolen) but also less fundamental issues such as evidential issues arising during the course of the proceedings, and accordingly, s 74(1) did not apply only to proof of conviction of offences in which the defendant had played no part. In the first appeal there was clearly an ‘issue’, namely whether there had been a conspiracy between R's co-defendants (their convictions supplying clear evidence to that effect) and it was that conspiracy to which the Crown sought to prove that the appellant was a party. Furthermore, that evidence did not have to be excluded under s 78(1) as being unfair to R, since his name did not appear on any of the 16 burglary counts so that even if the two men had given evidence in accordance with their pleas, R's counsel would have been unlikely to cross-examine them, or to have done so without gravely prejudicing

a Section 74(1), so far as material, is set out at p 234 h, post

b Section 78(1) is set out at p 235 c, post

R. It followed that the judge had been right to admit the evidence, and R's appeal would be dismissed (see p 236 h to p 237 e g and p 238 f, post).

(2) Since the purpose of s 74(1) of the 1984 Act was to enable proof of the commission of an offence by a person to be proved by the record without the necessity of calling him to admit the truth of what appeared on the record, what was required for the purposes of s 74(1) was either that a jury had found the offence proved or that that person himself had before a court formally admitted that he had committed the offence. Provided the plea had not been withdrawn, nor the jury's verdict, if any, quashed on appeal, the conviction subsisted and whether the accused had been sentenced or not was irrelevant. Since 'conviction' in s 74(1) thus meant a finding of guilt or a formal plea of guilty, in the second appeal the judge had been right to admit the evidence, and G's appeal would be dismissed (see p 239 j to p 240 b f, post); dictum of Lord Reid in S (an infant) v Manchester City Recorder [1969] 3 All ER at 1232 applied.

Per curiam. Section 74(1) of the 1984 Act should be sparingly used. There will be occasions where technically admissible evidence is likely to be of such a slight effect that it will be better not to adduce it, particularly when there is a danger of contravening s 78(1) of the Act. Where, however, such evidence is admitted, the judge should carefully explain to the jury the effect of the evidence and its limitations (see p 237 h j, post).

Appeals

R v Robertson

Malcolm Robertson appealed against his conviction on 17 February 1986 in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook before his Honour Judge Owen Stable QC and a jury on a charge of conspiracy with Barry Poole and Albert William Long to commit burglary for which he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

R v Golder

Martin Golder appealed against his conviction on 14 October 1986 in the Crown Court at St Albans before his Honour Judge Hickman and a jury on count 5 of an indictment charging him with robbery for which he was sentenced on 17 October to four years' imprisonment. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

The two appeals were heard consecutively as raising the same point.

R B Tansey (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant Robertson.

Philip Turl (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant Golder.
a Stewart Patterson for the Crown.

At the conclusion of argument the court announced that the appeal would be dismissed, for reasons to be given later.

11 June. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

b LORD LANE LJ. These two cases raise similar points on the construction of certain sections of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, and we propose therefore as a matter of convenience to deal with them together.

R v Robertson

c On 17 February 1986 in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook before his Honour Judge Stable QC and a jury, the appellant, Malcolm Robertson, was convicted of conspiracy to commit burglary. He was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. Now by leave of the single judge he appeals against that conviction.

The original indictment had contained five counts. Counts 1 and 2 charged the appellant together with Barry James Poole and Albert William Long with conspiring together and with others unknown to commit burglary at premises belonging to Comet plc. The remaining counts concerned Poole and Long only.

d Before arraignment, and by consent, the indictment was amended by adding counts 6 to 20, each count charging burglary at premises belonging to Comet plc in various parts of London and South East England. Eight of these counts charged Poole alone, two charged Long alone and five charged Poole and Long jointly. Poole pleaded not guilty to conspiracy but guilty to all 14 counts of burglary. Long pleaded not guilty to conspiracy but guilty to all nine counts of burglary, six of the counts being joint charges with Poole: e a total therefore of 17 burglaries, 16 of them at Comet premises. These pleas were accepted and on 8 January Poole was sentenced to two and a half years' imprisonment, Long to two years' imprisonment.

f The trial of the appellant on the two conspiracy counts commenced on 6 January, but, for reasons which do not concern us, the jury were discharged.

Prior to his retrial on 11 February, three further counts were added to the indictment charging the appellant with burglary (count 21) and handling a stolen video (counts 22 and 23). During the course of the retrial, and by consent, the indictment was further amended by consolidating the two conspiracy counts to allege one conspiracy with Poole, Long and others between 1 January 1984 and 20 June 1985.

g The Crown's case was that between January 1984 and 20 June 1985 82 burglaries were committed at premises belonging to Comet in London and South East England. Goods to the value of £245,000 were stolen. This was not in dispute. The pleas of Poole and Long related to 16 of these burglaries and to goods to the value of £44,000. Their last offence was committed at Stevenage on 20 June 1985, when six video recorders to the value of £2,700 were stolen. They were observed by nearby residents, their car number h was taken, and they were arrested with the stolen goods within a very short time.

The appellant was arrested at his home on 25 June. The Crown's case against the appellant was: (1) that there was a conspiracy between Poole and Long in the terms of the indictment, namely, 'on divers days between the 1st day of January, 1984 and 20th day of June, 1985 . . . to enter showrooms and warehouses belonging to Comet plc, as j trespassers, and to steal therein video cassette recorders and television sets.' The admissibility of the evidence adduced by the Crown on this aspect of their case is disputed; (2) that the appellant was, for at least part of the time, a member of that conspiracy.

The Crown relied on (a) admissions alleged to have been made on three occasions by the appellant: first at his home when arrested, secondly at the police station and thirdly at a formal interview when contemporaneous notes were made of the questions and answers. The appellant was given the opportunity to check and sign the notes. He said he would think about it. He never signed them. In evidence the appellant denied making any admissions. His versions of the first two conversations contained nothing in the nature of an admission. As to the formal interview, he agreed that a note had been made, but not from anything he had said. It was an entire fabrication. Pc Bricklow not only asked the questions, he also supplied all the answers. Pc Simpson recorded them at his colleague's dictation; (b) evidence of the appellant's association with stolen property and with Poole and Long. On 2 May 1984 Pc Smith found a damaged video recorder on the ground beneath a broken window of the appellant's first floor flat. It had been stolen on 30 April 1984 from a Comet warehouse at Chingford. Three officers visited the flat, where they found the appellant and Poole and where they said they saw a video lead hanging from socket in the television set. The appellant denied that there was such a lead and asserted that the video recorder had no connection with him or his flat. The video recorder was the subject of counts 22 and 23. a

The Crown also relied on an incident on 13 May 1985 when a car driven by Poole stopped when approached by the appellant and Long. According to Pc Bricklow, Poole passed to the appellant a paper on which the word 'Comet' was printed. The appellant and Long then entered the car which was driven away by the appellant. The appellant did not deny the incident, but disputed any reference to Comet. His case was that his association with Poole and Long was entirely innocent. d

After a five-day trial the appellant was convicted of the conspiracy. The jury were discharged from returning verdicts on counts 21 to 23. The appellant was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. His application for leave to appeal against that sentence was refused by the single judge, and has not been renewed.

Counsel for the appellant submits that the verdict was unsafe and unsatisfactory by reason of what he submits was a serious irregularity in the course of the trial, and two more in the course of the summing up. e

The irregularity in the trial relates to the admissibility of evidence. The Crown sought to prove the existence of the conspiracy between Poole and Long by proving, inter alia, that within the relevant period Poole and Long had committed a number of burglaries at different Comet premises and had stolen television sets and video recorders. The inference was that they must have conspired together. To do this they sought the leave of the judge to adduce evidence of the conviction of Poole and Long of 16 relevant counts of burglary. Their case was that they were entitled to adduce that evidence by virtue of the provisions of s 74(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The judge heard argument and ruled in favour of the Crown. f

Counsel for the appellant challenges that ruling on a number of grounds. To put his submissions into perspective, it is necessary to refer to s 74 and the related sections of the 1984 Act. Section 74 provides: g

'(1) In any proceedings the fact that a person other than the accused has been convicted of an offence by or before any court in the United Kingdom . . . shall be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving, where to do so is relevant to any issue in those proceedings, that that person committed that offence, whether or not any other evidence of his having committed that offence is given. h

(2) In any proceedings in which by virtue of this section a person other than the accused is proved to have been convicted of an offence by or before any court in the United Kingdom . . . he shall be taken to have committed that offence unless the contrary is proved.' i

It is unnecessary to refer to sub-ss (3) and (4).

Section 75 provides:

'(1) Where evidence that a person has been convicted of an offence is admissible by virtue of section 74 above, then without prejudice to the reception of any other admissible evidence for the purpose of identifying the facts on which the conviction

a was based—(a) the contents of any document which is admissible as evidence of the conviction; and (b) the contents of the information, complaint, indictment or charge-sheet on which the person in question was convicted, shall be admissible in evidence for that purpose.

b (2) Where in any proceedings the contents of any document are admissible in evidence by virtue of subsection (1) above, a copy of that document, or of the material part of it, purporting to be certified or otherwise authenticated by or on behalf of the court or authority having custody of that document shall be admissible in evidence and shall be taken to be a true copy of that document or part unless the contrary is shown. . . .’

Subsections (3) and (4) are irrelevant for present purposes.

Finally, s 78 provides:

c ‘(1) In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it.

d (2) Nothing in this section shall prejudice any rule of law requiring a court to exclude evidence.’

Counsel for the appellant’s criticisms of the judge’s ruling may be summarised as follows. (1) Section 74 did not apply for the following reasons: (a) there was no issue that many burglaries had been committed at Comet premises within the relevant period, because that fact was conceded by the appellant; (b) the mischief against which the section was directed did not exist or apply here; (c) the section has a restricted application: e it only applies where the defendant on trial has played no part in the offences of which the third party has been convicted, for instance on a charge of handling stolen goods. The conviction of the thief of the same goods may properly be given in evidence. (2) Even if the Crown could bring themselves within the ambit of s 74, the evidence should have been excluded in accordance with s 78(1) because of its adverse effect on the fairness f of the proceedings.

In support of his submission that s 74 had no application, counsel for the appellant relies on para 218 of the Criminal Law Revision Committee’s 11th Report (Cmnd 4991) for the background of the law as it was. The relevant part reads:

g ‘There is no doubt that the principle of Hollington v. F Hewthorn & Co Ltd [1943] 2 All ER 35, [1943] KB 587 applies to criminal cases although there is very little authority. For example in R. v. Turner (1832) 1 Mood. C.C. 347 at 349 “many of [the judges] appeared to think” that in a case of receiving stolen property the conviction of the thief “would not have been any evidence of her guilt, which must have been proved by other means.” This is always taken to be the law. In our opinion it is clearly right that convictions of persons other than the accused should h be made admissible in criminal proceedings as evidence of the fact that the person convicted was guilty of the offence charged and that on proof of the conviction that person should be taken to have committed the offence unless the contrary is proved. Clause 24 provides accordingly. It seems quite wrong as well as being inconvenient that the prosecution should be required to prove again the guilt of the person concerned. The clause will be helpful to the prosecution in various cases where the guilt of the accused depends on another person’s having committed an offence. j Examples are handling stolen goods, harbouring offenders and the offences under sections 4 and 5 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 of assisting offenders and concealing offences.’

The terms of cl 24 of the committee’s draft bill are in all material respects identical to those of s 74.

The matter has already been considered by this court in the recent case of R v O'Connor [1987] Crim LR 260. O'Connor was charged with conspiring with a man named Beck to obtain property by deception. He pleaded not guilty and was tried. Beck pleaded guilty and evidence of that plea was admitted at O'Connor's trial. On appeal it was submitted (1) that s 74 did not permit evidence of Beck's plea to be put before the jury, alternatively (2) that even if the strict wording of s 74(1) did render the evidence admissible, then the judge ought, pursuant to s 78, to have excluded it on the ground that it would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings. The court held that the disputed evidence ought to have been excluded, but applied the proviso to s 2(1) of the 1968 Act and dismissed the appeal. The following is an extract from the judgment in that case:

'The terms of s 74 clearly were designed, in the judgment of this court, to deal with the situation where it was necessary as a preliminary matter for it to be proved that a person other than the accused had been convicted of an offence. The object, it would seem, of the section is to avoid that matter having to be proved twice where the other person had already pleaded guilty to the offence it was necessary to prove. In effect therefore the object of the section, in our view, was to deal with cases where it was necessary to prove the conviction of another as a condition precedent to the conviction of the defendant of the charge laid against him. The most obvious example would be a case where it is necessary to prove against another that he was guilty of theft before the person before the court could be convicted of handling or harbouring.'

Counsel for the appellant's case is that this view of the restricted application of s 74(1) is in accordance with the views of the Criminal Law Revision Committee and entirely supports his submission that s 74 had no application to the instant case.

Counsel for the Crown contends that the judge's ruling was correct. His case is that the words of s 74(1) are clear and unambiguous, and should be given their natural meaning; that being so they are wide enough to cover the instant case. Had Parliament intended to restrict the application of the section, they could, and would, have done so in clear terms: for instance, by substituting for the words 'where to do so is relevant to any issue in those proceedings' some such expression as 'where it is necessary to prove the guilt of another'. Parliament has not chosen to do so.

The heart of the problem is the correct interpretation of the expression 'issue in the proceedings'. Only when that is determined can the court decide what in the particular circumstances is relevant and thus admissible. That is the very question left open in O'Connor's case. There, in the passage already cited, the court gave its view of the primary object of s 74. It expressly left open the limits or scope of the section in the following terms:

'We find this a difficult point, and, without deciding the full scope of s 74, for the purposes of this case it is sufficient to say that if it was appropriate within the section to admit the conviction of Beck in the proceedings, we take the view that it would have resulted in a very unfair state of affairs.'

Despite the assistance of counsel, the difficulty remains. We think the time has come to attempt to provide some guidance for courts who have the task of applying s 74. The word 'issue' in relation to a trial is apt to cover not only an issue which is an essential ingredient in the offence charged, for instance in a handling case the fact that the goods were stolen (that is the restricted meaning), but also less fundamental issues, for instance evidential issues arising during the course of the proceedings (that is the extended meaning). Section 74 by using the words 'any issue in those proceedings' does not seek to limit the word 'issue' to the restricted meaning indicated above. Although the Report of the Criminal Law Revision Committee is an indication that the committee may have been regarding the matter at least primarily in the restricted sense, it seems to us that we are not entitled to use that possibility as showing that the words of the section mean other than what they plainly state.

On any view we find no support for counsel for the appellant's submission that the section applies only to proof of conviction of offences in which the defendant on trial played no part. It may well be that the section will be at its most useful in dealing with the type of situation exemplified by the Law Revision Committee, but it is not restricted to that kind of case. Provided that there is an issue before the jury to which the conviction is relevant, the conviction, subject to what we say hereafter, is admissible.

So far as the present case is concerned, there was certainly an issue. Indeed it was probably an issue in the restricted sense, namely the issue of whether there was a conspiracy between Poole and Long (of which their joint conviction of burglary was the clearest evidence). It was that conspiracy to which the prosecution sought to prove the appellant was a party. It is true that the appellant was prepared to accept that there had been a series of burglaries at Comet's premises during the material times, but that would not preclude the prosecution from relying on s 74 as the words of sub-s (1) of that section make clear.

'... in a conspiracy case where there is only one defendant being tried, but it is alleged that he conspired with two other named persons and others unknown, it is relevant that those named persons committed a number of burglaries which the Crown allege were acts done by those named persons in furtherance of the common design. If the fact of committing those burglaries is relevant, then s 74... facilitates the manner in which their participation in those events may be proved. I think that the evidence of their conviction is relevant to an issue in these proceedings, namely was there a conspiracy.'

That, in our judgment, was a correct approach.

It remains to consider the submissions based on s 78. The complaint here is that by relying on s 74 to prove the convictions of Poole and Long, the prosecution deprived the appellant of the opportunity to cross-examine them. Counsel for the appellant points out that this was a prominent feature in O'Connor's case already referred to. The circumstances there however were quite different. O'Connor and Beck were jointly indicted in one count with having conspired together and with no one else. It followed that Beck's admission of guilt of that very offence might well lead the jury to infer that O'Connor in his turn must have conspired with Beck. That situation did not exist here. The pleas and consequent convictions of Poole and Long did not on the face of them involve the appellant whose name did not appear in the relevant counts at all. Consequently, even if Poole and Long had given evidence in accordance with their pleas, counsel would have been unlikely to cross-examine them or, if he had, to have achieved anything except disaster for his client.

The judge was, in our view, correct to admit the evidence.

It only remains to add this. Section 74 is a provision which should be sparingly used. There will be occasions where, although the evidence may be technically admissible, its effect is likely to be so slight that it will be wiser not to adduce it. This is particularly so where there is any danger of a contravention of s 78. There is nothing to be gained by adducing evidence of doubtful value at the risk of having the conviction quashed because the admission of that evidence rendered the conviction unsafe or unsatisfactory. Secondly, where the evidence is admitted, the judge should be careful, as the judge was here, to explain to the jury the effect of the evidence and its limitations.

There are two further grounds of appeal. The first is that the judge commented unfairly on the appellant's failure to call Poole or Long as witnesses. Having referred to the appellant's evidence of a conversation that he had with Poole prior to the final interview with the police, the judge continued:

‘... you should consider why the police allowed Robertson to see Poole, and why Poole suggested that Robertson should put his hands up, but, members of the jury, you should bear this in mind: that no one knows better than Poole and Long if Robertson was one of their number concerning the Comet burglaries. Both had been dealt with, neither would have anything to lose by giving evidence for Robertson. There is no obligation, of course, on Robertson to call either of them, but had he wished you to hear their evidence they could have been compelled to go into the witness box, and you may think it is surprising neither was called on his behalf if the admissions of Robertson are wicked inventions on the part of corrupt policemen.’ a

That was a reference to the alleged fabrication of the last interview. Counsel for the appellant was unhappy about it and, after the jury had retired, invited the judge to retract it. The judge declined. b

It is submitted that the comment was so unfair as to prejudice the appellant's case, particularly as it was linked to the controversial issue of the final interview. It was particularly unfair, it is said, because neither Poole nor Long could assist as to the genuineness of the record of that interview. If, which is doubtful, the judge was entitled to comment, it should have been done with more circumspection. c

In our view the judge was entitled to comment. There is no doubt that the comment was strong. The judge is entitled to make a comment which in appropriate circumstances may be strong. These were appropriate circumstances. d

The appellant's final point is that the judge wrongly directed the jury that the appellant's case was that all the police officers had lied, whereas in fact the appellant was alleging that only those officers, four in number, who gave evidence related to the damaged video recorder and the video lead attached to the television set in the appellant's flat and the meeting at which the Comet paper was produced, were mistaken. e

It is unnecessary to go into detail. We have studied the transcripts of the cross-examination of those four officers. It is sufficient to say that the judge and the jury could be forgiven, as all those in this court may be forgiven, for concluding that the suggestion was made that the officers had invented the video lead and the Comet paper. There is nothing in this point. f

For these reasons we conclude that the verdict is neither unsafe nor unsatisfactory. This appeal is dismissed. g

R v Golder

On 17 October 1986 in the Crown Court at St Albans before his Honour Judge Hickman and a jury this appellant was convicted of robbery and sentenced to four years' imprisonment. On further counts he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment to run consecutively, thus making a total of seven years' imprisonment. g

We have refused his application for leave to appeal against sentence. We now give reasons for dismissing, as we have done on 18 May last, his appeal against conviction. h

On 20 November 1985 Mr Reece Wilson, an employee at Harper's Garage, St Albans, was robbed of £40. The prosecution case was that four men carried out the robbery, the appellant, McConnell who was also convicted by the jury, and two other men, Moran and Eley, both of whom pleaded guilty. The evidence was that two of the four men went into the garage armed with a gun and robbed Mr Wilson whilst the other two, including this appellant, were waiting in a car nearby to drive all four away. i

The evidence against the appellant consisted primarily of admissions which he was alleged to have made after his arrest which took place on 4 December 1985. At first he prevaricated. However on 5 December, at a further interview, the contents of which were contemporaneously noted, he made a series of admissions. He admitted that he had discussed the possibility of robbing a garage of St Albans with three other men when they were outside a public house in Hatfield. He said they were all broke and intended j a to see if they could get some money out of a garage. He further said that some of the three were involved in another robbery at a garage called Grays shortly before the St Albans robbery.

b So far as the St Albans robbery was concerned, he said that he stayed in the car, although he was not the driver, and that he did not see the gun until it was brought back by the men who had committed the robbery. He said the gun was a double-barrelled sawn-off shotgun. He knew the men had the gun with them. He said that he was told that they had only got £18 or £20 from the robbery of which they gave him nothing. He said the offence was 'a spur of the moment thing' and that the reason for picking on a garage was possibly because of the events on the previous day at Grays Garage as a result of which the other men perhaps felt more confident.

c During the course of the trial the prosecution requested, and were given leave, to adduce the following evidence, namely, that Moran and Eley, inter alios, had pleaded guilty to three counts. One of those was relevant only to the case of a co-accused called Puddifoot and need not be considered further. The other two were as follows: the first charged them with having on 19 November 1985 at Hatfield robbed an attendant at Grays Garage of £284; the second with having on the next day, 20 November, robbed Reece Wilson of £40, that being the same offence as that on which the appellant was being tried. Their pleas of guilty had been duly recorded by the court, but neither man d had been sentenced.

e The following grounds were advanced before us as to why the judge was wrong, it is said, to admit the evidence. First, because the men had not been 'convicted'. The argument is that a plea of guilty does not become a conviction within the meaning of s 74 until sentence is passed. Up to that point no conviction exists. Thereafter it subsists until quashed.

f The principal authority cited in support of that proposition was R v Plummer [1902] 2 KB 339, [1900-3] All ER Rep 613. It was there decided that where a prisoner had pleaded guilty to an indictment, the court had jurisdiction to allow him, before sentence, to withdraw his plea and plead not guilty. It is argued from that, that the mere plea does not amount to a conviction. If it had amounted to a conviction, the court would have had no jurisdiction to allow him to withdraw his plea.

However, as Lord Reid made clear in S (an infant) v Manchester City Recorder [1969] 3 All ER 1230 at 1232, [1971] AC 481 at 489, that is not conclusive. This passage appears in his speech:

g 'Several cases have held that magistrates have no power to allow a change of plea during the interval between their acceptance of a plea of guilty and final disposal of the case. They appear to me to have arisen out of a misconception of purely technical matters. Much of the difficulty has arisen from the fact that "conviction" is commonly used with two different meanings. It often is used to mean final disposal of a case and it is not uncommon for it to be used as meaning a finding of guilt. It is h proper to say that a plea cannot be changed after "conviction" in the former sense. But it does not at all follow that a plea cannot be changed after "conviction" in the latter sense. It is perfectly true that "conviction" is used in this latter sense in the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, and a number of other statutes.'

j This dual meaning of the word 'conviction' is further illustrated by the judgment of this court in R v Drew [1985] 2 All ER 1061, [1985] 1 WLR 914, where many of the authorities are reviewed.

We respectfully agree with the reasoning of the trial judge on this aspect of the matter. The purpose which lies behind the enactment of s 74 was to enable proof of the commission of an offence by X to be proved by the record without the necessity of calling X to admit the truth of what appears on the record.

Therefore what is important is either that a jury has found X's offence proved, or that X himself has before a court formally admitted that he has committed the offence. Provided that his plea has not been withdrawn nor the verdict of the jury, where there has been one, has been quashed on appeal, the conviction subsists. Whether or not X has been sentenced is irrelevant on the issue of whether he has committed the offence. Therefore the meaning of 'conviction' in this section is the latter of the two referred to by Lord Reid in the passage cited, namely, a finding of guilt or a formal plea of guilty. a

The second ground of appeal is that the convictions of Moran and Eley were not (within the meaning of the section) relevant to any issue on the trial of this appellant on the charge of robbing Reece Wilson. As to the first charge to which the two men had pleaded guilty, namely the robbery of the garage attendant committed on 19 November 1985, there is no doubt that in general proof that other men committed another offence at another time is irrelevant. Likewise it would, generally speaking, be irrelevant that two men other than the defendant had committed the burglary of which the appellant was being tried. This was the subject of the further conviction of Moran and Eley sought to be adduced in evidence. b

The prosecution contended that in the particular circumstances of this case those convictions were relevant. The admissions which he had according to the police made to them were contested. It was suggested to the officers that they had fabricated their story and that no such admission had been made. The prosecution's desire to put the convictions of Moran and Eley in was in order to show that the contents of the alleged confessions by the appellant were in accordance with the facts as they were known and the confessions were therefore more likely to be true. c

Secondly, as pointed out during argument at trial, one of the matters which the prosecution had to prove was that there had in fact been a robbery at Harper's Garage on 20 November. It was therefore relevant to prove that two men had admitted committing such a robbery, although there was as it transpired no dispute that the robbery had been committed by someone. d

The arguments advanced on behalf of the prosecution and of the appellant are similar to those on behalf of Robertson, and we need not repeat them here. Nor need we repeat our reasons for concluding that the judge was correct in his ruling that the evidence was admissible. e

For those reasons we dismissed the appeal against conviction. f

The defendants applied to the plaintiff bank for a mortgage to enable them to purchase a house. A survey which the plaintiff arranged to be carried out revealed evidence of rising damp and dry rot. A copy of the report was not sent to the defendants although they were required to pay for the survey. The plaintiff then offered to lend the defendants £32,250 on mortgage subject to £750 being retained for repairs which the plaintiff required to be carried out, including the obtaining of a specialist report on the damp and dry rot and carrying out work recommended in the report. The defendants accepted the mortgage offer, purchased the house, executed a legal charge in favour of the plaintiff and then arranged for a specialist inspection of the damp and dry rot, as the result of which they discovered that the cost of remedial work would be over £9,000. The defendants took the view that the plaintiff ought to have shown them the surveyor's report before they entered into the purchase, and refused to pay the instalments due under the mortgage. The plaintiff applied for possession of the property. The master made a possession order but stayed execution provided, inter alia, the defendants issued a counterclaim against the plaintiff and prosecuted it with due diligence. The plaintiff appealed, contending that the existence of a counterclaim did not affect its right to possession. The defendants contended that their counterclaim was a matter to be taken into consideration since under s 36^a of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 the court had a discretion to postpone possession if the mortgagor was 'likely to be able within a reasonable period' to pay the arrears.

Held – Although s 36 of the 1970 Act modified the rule that a mortgagee was entitled to possession, by giving the court a discretion to postpone possession if, inter alia, it appeared that the mortgagor was likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage, the existence of the counterclaim did not mean that the defendants would be able to pay off their arrears within a reasonable period, since even if they had a reasonable prospect of success there was no reason for the court to conclude that they would pay over any damages they might recover. It followed therefore that the court could not exercise its discretion under s 36 and the appeal would accordingly be allowed (see p 244 d e, p 245 f g and p 246 g to j, post).

Appeal

The plaintiff, Citibank Trust Ltd (Citibank), by notice of appeal dated 16 February 1987, appealed against the order made by Master Gowers on 10 February 1987 requiring the defendants, Bliss Billow Kodzo Ayivor and Claudette Pamela Ayivor, to give up possession of a freehold dwelling house at 14 Fletcher Lane, London E10, of which Citibank was mortgagee, within 28 days, the order not to be enforced for six months while monthly payments due under the mortgage were paid as they fell due and a counterclaim was duly served and prosecuted by the defendants against Citibank for damages. Citibank sought payment of all moneys due under the mortgage and an order for possession of the dwelling house forthwith. The appeal was heard in chambers but judgment was given by Mervyn Davies J in open court. The facts are set out in the judgment. b

11 March. The following judgment was delivered.

MERVYN DAVIES J. This is an appeal against a master's possession order in a mortgage action. By a legal charge dated 30 April 1984 made between the defendants Bliss Billow Kodzo Ayivor and Claudette Pamela Ayivor (his wife), of the one part and Citibank Trust Ltd (Citibank) on the other part a freehold dwelling house, 14 Fletcher Lane, London E10 with registered title EGL 98474 was charged by way of legal mortgage by the defendants with repayment of a loan of £33,000 made by Citibank. Repayment was intended to be over the period of 24 years by instalments of £343.91 per month. The amount of the instalments is variable and is currently in the sum of £214.89 a month. The money lent is further secured, as I understand, by an endowment policy carrying a premium of £49.50 a month. e

The legal charge does not mention the endowment policy; but the mortgage offer which I mention later has as one of its conditions a requirement that life assurance, as there referred to, is to be effected.

The defendants are in arrears with the mortgage instalments. On 5 March 1986 Citibank issued an originating summons claiming payment of the money due under the legal charge (then totalling £35,270.13), all necessary accounts and inquiries, and, as well, possession. On 10 February 1987 Master Gowers made an order (i) for delivery of possession within 28 days; but the possession order was qualified in this way: g

'(ii) that the operation of paragraph (i) above is not to be enforced without the leave of the court while (a) The defendants shall pay to [Citibank] all sums hereafter to become payable by way of capital or interest or otherwise under the said mortgage when such sums shall become due or would had there been no default have become due. (b) The defendants do on or before 24th February 1987 issue and serve a counterclaim in this action in the form set out in exhibit BBKA 4 to the affidavit of the first defendant sworn on 6th February 1987. (c) The defendants do prosecute such counterclaim with diligence and (d) The next six months are in course.' h

I am not clear what is meant by (d) above but I assume that at any rate during the six months from 10 February 1987 the possession order is not to be enforceable despite the arrears existing at that date if the mortgage instalments are thereafter paid and if a a counterclaim is duly prosecuted. By a notice of appeal dated 16 February 1987 Citibank seek in place of that order an order for payment of moneys due together with an order for possession forthwith.

b The evidence in support of Citibank's claim now consists of two affidavits sworn by Mrs Linda Carole Jones, a Citibank employee. The first affidavit was sworn on 19 November 1986. It exhibits a copy of the legal charge and states that the defendants are in breach of the terms of the charge in that the defendants have failed to pay the mortgage instalments provided for.

c The affidavit states the then state of account between the parties but that state is now brought up to date by Mrs Jones's second affidavit sworn 29 January 1987. Therein it is stated that (i) the loan is £33,000, (ii) the amount of any instalment or interest in arrear at the date thereof was £5,589·86, (iii) the amount of principal remaining due is £33,000 and (iv) total indebtedness at the date hereof is £38,589·86. The first affidavit states that the amount of an instalment is £214·89 and that interest is accruing at the daily rate of £7·16. The first affidavit states that the legal charge 'is an endowment mortgage whereby the principal owed remains at £33,000 throughout the term subject to any further advance of which there have been none. The instalments therefore consist of interest only'.

d The evidence on the defendants' side consists of two affidavits sworn by the first defendant, the one on 6 February 1987 and the other on 19 February 1987. In this evidence the defendants admit that they are in arrear with their payments under the legal charge. The first defendant, however, contends that Citibank is liable to him and to his wife for negligence or breach of warranty; and that the damages recoverable in respect thereof would extinguish the arrears claimed by Citibank.

e It is this contention that gives rise to the reference to a counterclaim in the master's order. The defendants' evidence is that on approaching Citibank for an advance they were informed that Citibank would not make a mortgage offer prior to a survey of the house. It was therefore supposed that Citibank would only make a mortgage offer if 14 Fletcher Lane was good security for the sum to be lent. The first defendant did not order any survey. Nevertheless, in due course Citibank made a mortgage offer. The offer was for an advance of £32,250, with £750 withheld or retained pending 'repairs'. Such repairs were then specified under four heads relating to (a) roof, (b) arranging for reports as to damp-proof courses and as to eradication of timber rotting fungi and complying with the recommendations in such reports, (c) front door glass and (d) overhauling rainwater and wastewater disposal systems. The mortgage offer was accepted and the defendants completed their purchase and executed the legal charge on 30 April 1984. The defendants then instructed Hillcrest Timber Preservation Ltd to report on (b) above. g The report was forthcoming on 5 September 1984. This lengthy report indicates that it is estimated that the sum of £8,280 is required for remedial treatment against dry rot together with other remedial works in the sums of £761·30 and £57·50, totalling in all £9,098·80.

h As the first defendant observes in his affidavit, it is clear from the reports that the house is seriously affected by both damp and timber decay, with the cost of the remedial works more than one-quarter of the money lent by Citibank.

j On receiving the report dated 5 September 1984 the first defendant telephoned Norwich Union Insurance Society, that society having issued the endowment policy issued in conjunction with the legal charge. The first defendant asked to see a copy of any survey report received in connection with his purchase of 14 Fletcher Lane. In response there was received a report. The report is dated 5 January 1984 and appears to have been made at the behest of Citibank dated 22 December 1983 in the matter of an application by the first defendant to Citibank relating to 14 Fletcher Lane. In para 15 of the report it is stated: 'During our inspection evidence of both rising damp and dry rot were seen, although some remedial measures to the latter had already taken place.' In his affidavit the first defendant complains that this disturbing feature of the report is not mentioned in the mortgage offer that had been made to him and to his wife. It is in these circumstances that the first defendant contends that he should have been informed of what had been said about rising damp and dry rot and that the effect of the retention clause in the mortgage offer was to indicate that there was no evidence of either defect. He says that if Citibank had accurately set out the surveyor's findings in the mortgage offer he would not have proceeded with the purchase without first ascertaining that the problem identified by the survey was within his means to rectify. In the event, he says, he proceeded with the purchase only to discover subsequently that there were problems, and that Citibank had known of these problems prior to the making of the mortgage. It is to be noted that the first defendant was required to pay £55 to Citibank for the surveyor's report, albeit that the report was not put before him. In these circumstances the first defendant has had prepared a counterclaim in the proceedings and pursuant to the master's order has served a statement of counterclaim. In brief the defendants, in various alternative fashions, claim damages against Citibank in the sum of £9,041.30 in consequence of Citibank having misled the defendants into supposing that 14 Fletcher Lane was free of rising damp and timber rot. Of course, I express no views as to the counterclaim, save to say that one would have supposed that since the first defendant was paying for the survey dated 5 January 1984 one would have supposed that he would have been sent a copy thereof.

One starts with the general rule that a legal mortgagee has a right to possession of the mortgaged property: see e.g. Western Bank Ltd v Schindler [1976] 2 All ER 393, [1977] Ch 1. The next question that arises in this case is whether or not the existence of the counterclaim affects the right to possession. The cases show that the existence of the counterclaim does not affect that right. In Barclays Bank plc v Tennet [1984] CA Transcript 242 Slade LJ said:

'... and, in my opinion, the Keller case [Samuel Keller (Holdings) Ltd v Martins Bank Ltd [1970] 3 All ER 950, [1971] 1 WLR 43] makes it quite clear that the existence of the counterclaim cannot defeat the right to possession, which the bank enjoys as mortgagee. Indeed, only recently in Mobil Oil Co Ltd v Rawlinson (in a decision given on 31 July 1981 apparently reported only in Lexis reports), which was brought to our attention, Nourse J specifically held that the existence of a counterclaim will not defeat the legal mortgagee's right to possession where he establishes his indebtedness. The correctness of that decision does not appear to be in doubt as a matter of principle.'

The Mobil case there referred to is reported in the Solicitors' Journal (126 SJ 15).

Accordingly, since here we have a dwelling house, one goes on to consider s 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 as read with s 8 of the Administration of Justice Act 1973. Section 36 of the 1970 Act read as follows:

'(1) Where the mortgagee under a mortgage of land which consists of or includes a dwelling-house brings an action in which he claims possession of the mortgaged property, not being an action for foreclosure in which a claim for possession of the mortgaged property is also made, the court may exercise any of the powers conferred on it by subsection (2) below if it appears to the court that in the event of its exercising the power the mortgagor is likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage or to remedy a default consisting of a breach of any other obligation arising under or by virtue of the mortgage.

(2) The court—(a) may adjourn the proceedings, or (b) on giving judgment, or making an order, for delivery of possession of the mortgaged property, or at any time before the execution of such judgment or order, may—(i) stay or suspend execution of the judgment or order, or (ii) postpone the date for delivery of possession, for such period or periods as the court thinks reasonable.

(3) Any such adjournment, stay, suspension or postponement as is referred to in subsection (2) above may be made subject to such conditions with regard to payment by the mortgagor of any sum secured by the mortgage or the remedying of any default as the court thinks fit . . .'

Section 8 at the 1973 Act reads as follows:

'(1) Where by a mortgage of land which consists of or includes a dwelling-house, or by any agreement between the mortgagee under such a mortgage and the mortgagor, the mortgagor is entitled or is to be permitted to pay the principal sum secured by instalments or otherwise to defer payment of it in whole or in part, but provision is also made for earlier payment in the event of any default by the mortgagor or of a demand by the mortgagee or otherwise, then for purposes of section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 (under which a court has power to delay giving a mortgagee possession of the mortgaged property so as to allow the mortgagor a reasonable time to pay any sums due under the mortgage) a court may treat as due under the mortgage on account of the principal sum secured and of interest on it only such amounts as the mortgagor would have expected to be required to pay if there had been no such provision for earlier payment.

(2) A court shall not exercise by virtue of subsection (1) above the powers conferred by section 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 unless it appears to the court not only that the mortgagor is likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any amounts regarded (in accordance with subsection (1) above) as due on account of the principal sum secured, together with the interest on those amounts, but also that he is likely to be able by the end of that period to pay any further amounts that he would have expected to be required to pay by then on account of that sum and of interest on it if there had been no such provision as is referred to in subsection (1) above for earlier payment . . .'

Section 36 was considered in Western Bank Ltd v Schindler [1976] 2 All ER 393 at 399, [1977] Ch 1 at 13, where Buckley LJ said:

'Accordingly, in my judgment, on the true construction of the section, it applies to any case in which a mortgagee seeks possession, whether the mortgagor be in arrear or otherwise in default under the mortgage or not, but, where the mortgagor is in arrear or in default, the discretion is limited by the conditional clause.'

As I understand it s 36 modifies the rule that a mortgagee is entitled to possession by conferring a discretion on the court. The court is given certain powers which it may exercise. But, where the mortgagor is in arrear (see Buckley LJ in the passage cited above) it may exercise such powers only 'if it appears to the court that in the event of its exercising the power the mortgagor is likely to be able within a reasonable period to pay any sums due under the mortgage. . .'

Section 8(1) of the 1973 Act means, in this case, that I may treat as due from the defendants only such instalments as are due to date, that is to say one is not obliged, when considering the s 36 discretion, to regard the entire principal sum and interest as now due; although by the terms of this mortgage (see cl 10.2) it is due by virtue of the defendants' default in keeping up the instalment payments.

Section 8(2) of the 1973 Act then requires the court in exercising the s 36 discretion to have in mind not only the unpaid instalments already due but also the instalments that will fall due during the 'reasonable period' that is contemplated in s 36(1). As to this last point under s 8(2) I feel able to accept that the defendants will be able to pay such instalments as they fall due. I say that because while there is no actual evidence of the defendants' means it is accepted that the first defendant is in employment and earns £766 a month (net). I should say here that it seems that payment of the instalments as they fall due has always been within the first defendant's ability; but he decided, as I understand, not to pay because he regarded himself as having a claim against Citibank by reason of the non-disclosure of the surveyor's inspection report that I have mentioned. While there is thus no difficulty about the keeping up of the current instalments one nevertheless has to turn to the question of the arrears. According to Citibank's evidence instalments were in arrear in the sum of £5,589.86 as at 29 January 1987. I understand they remain at that figure since two recent instalment payments have been made. Counsel for the defendants proposed a total monthly payment of £300. That would mean, as I see it, that, for practical purposes, the arrears would be paid off at £35.61 a month, since the instalments are running at £214.89 and the endowment policy premium is £49.50 a month. a

Counsel for the defendants put forward figures more favourable to the defendants. He calculated that a monthly payment of £300 would mean that arrears were paid off at £55 a month. I am willing to accept counsel's figure. Even so that means that the arrears of £5,589 would thus not be cleared off for 100 months, or 8½ years. b

Counsel for the defendants submitted that in exercising the s 36 discretion the court is not in this case confined to such a calculation of time as I have set out. Counsel said account should be taken of the following considerations (among others): (a) that the second defendant is on a catering course and may from July onwards be able to add to the family income; (b) that a sale of the house before cure of the dry rot will result in a very depressed price; (c) that the principal sum owing is secured by the endowment policy; (d) that it would be right to allow time for a sale by the defendants particularly since Citibank is a bank (as opposed to an individual) and the security is not depreciating; and (e) that the defendants' counterclaim may result in a substantial sum being owed by Citibank to the defendants within, say, the next year. c

As to (a) above there was no evidence. I do not feel justified in supposing that this possibility offers the likelihood of any imminent substantial reduction in the arrears. Considerations (b) and (c) do not seem to me to be considerations that can properly be taken into account in the context of s 36. As to (d) Browne LJ said in Royal Trust Co of Canada v Markham [1975] 3 All ER 433 at 439, [1975] 1 WLR 1416 at 1423: d

'I also agree with [Sir John Pennycuik] that, for the reasons he has given, it is not possible to accept counsel's submission that in a proper case the court could not stay or suspend an order to enable a property to be sold. I suppose that in all probability this would only be done where there was clear evidence that a sale was going to take place in the near future and that the price would cover all the sums due to the mortgagee for capital and interest. But in such circumstances, and if the court thought it proper, in my view there would be jurisdiction to make such an order.' e

However, here there is no evidence or indeed any statement by counsel that there is in prospect any sale by the defendants. Consequently I do not see that I can give any effect to consideration (d). Consideration (e) may be an inadmissible consideration. To allow weight to (e) might nullify or circumvent the rule that the existence of a counterclaim does not prevent the mortgagee from obtaining possession. The wording of s 36 does not seem to impinge on that rule. But however that may be, in this particular case, I do not, on the evidence, find myself able to say that the existence of the counterclaim means that the defendants are likely 'to be able within a reasonable period' to pay off the arrears. Even if I assume that the defendants' prospects of success on the counterclaim are good that does not justify me in concluding that the defendants are likely soon to reduce the arrears by paying over any damages they may recover. f

Counsel for Citibank very fairly said that Citibank would expect to wait for some time, perhaps up to 18 months, for the arrears. I find myself confined by the wording of s 36. On the evidence I cannot see that the defendants are likely to be able within any reasonable period to pay off their arrears. It follows that the s 36 discretion may not be exercised in favour of the defendants, so that the appropriate order to make is an order for possession in 28 days. I make this order without any enthusiasm at all because it does appear to me that the defendants in this case were dismayed to have disclosed to them, after they had bought their house, the information about dry rot etc that is contained in the surveyor's inspection report of 5 January 1984. Citibank allowed the purchase to go g a ahead and the mortgage to be executed without supplying the defendants with a copy of the inspection report, and that even though they were requiring the defendants to pay for that report. However that may be, I in no way prejudice the defendants' counterclaim since for all I know Citibank may have a good defence thereto.

d County court – Payment into court – Tender – Unliquidated claim – Cost of repairs in road accident case – Whether defence of tender available in claim for cost of repairs in road accident case – CCR Ord 1, r 10.

e Notwithstanding that CCR Ord 1, r 10^a provides that the cost of repairs in a road accident case is to be treated as a liquidated claim, that rule does not affect or amend the common law relating to the defence of tender before action and therefore the defence of tender is not available to the defendant where the plaintiff's claim is for the cost of repairs to a vehicle arising out of a road accident, together with interest and solicitor's costs, since such a claim is for unliquidated damages even if it is quantified (see p 250 e to j and p 251 d, post).

Appeal

The defendant, Mrs Z B Dastur, appealed against the decision of his Honour Judge Tumim sitting at the Willesden County Court on 28 February 1986 whereby he gave judgment for the plaintiffs, John Laing Construction Ltd, for £137·85 plus £12·42 interest and costs being the amount claimed by the plaintiffs for damage to, and loss of use of, their motor vehicle following a road accident on 1 May 1985 caused by the defendant's negligent driving. The facts are set out in the judgment of Parker LJ.

Richard Slowe for the defendant.

19 December. The following judgments were delivered.

PARKER LJ. The defendant appeals by leave of this court from a judgment of his Honour Judge Tumim in the Willesden County Court on 28 February 1986 whereby he ordered that judgment be entered for the plaintiffs for £137·85 plus £12·42 interest and costs.

Although a very small sum is involved the matter is of some importance since the decision on the appeal will or may affect many other cases. For that reason leave to appeal was given and the appeal was expedited.

The short facts are these. On 1 May 1985 the defendant drove her car into the back of the plaintiffs' car, which was stationary. Correspondence ensued between the plaintiffs' insurers' solicitors and the defendant, who was initially uncertain whether to deal with the matter herself or hand it to her insurers. By mid-August she had decided on the latter course. On 16 September 1985 the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendant's insurers a simple straightforward letter which, after asserting (correctly) that the defendant was wholly responsible, continued:

'Our client claims:

Repair Cost (less VAT)

Loss of use 1 day at £5 per day

Our client's insurers are the Provincial Insurance Plc., Provincial House, 32, High Street, Haverhill, Suffolk, under policy number 1263859/F, the cover being third party, fire and theft. Our client is registered for VAT. We are instructed to commence proceedings for the recovery of our client's above mentioned claim unless we receive your remittance within the next ten days. Settlement will be subject to payment of our costs which total the sum of £28·80. We reserve the right to claim interest pursuant to section 69 of the County Courts Act 1984 if proceedings are issued.

Yours faithfully,
Shoosmiths & Harrison.'

This was a plain offer to settle the claim for £137·85 and £28·80 costs, but with the clear warning that if the matter were not settled the plaintiffs would, or would probably, add a claim for interest. On 20 September the defendant's insurers replied enclosing a cheque for £137·85 and stating that the defendant would not be liable for costs under the County Court Rules. This was clearly a rejection of the offer.

The plaintiffs' solicitors did not cash the cheque but on 3 October commenced proceedings in the Willesden County Court. The particulars of claim, by para 4 and the prayer, put the claim thus:

'4. By reason of the matters aforesaid the Plaintiff has suffered damage and loss.

Repairs to vehicle

Particulars

Loss of use for one day at £5.00

AND the Plaintiff claims:

1. The said sum of £137.50.

2. Interest pursuant to section 69 of the County Courts Act 1984 at the rate of 15 per centum per annum from 5th August 1985 to 3rd October 1985. The daily rate of interest being 6p. 59 days \times 6p = £3.54.

3. Interest pursuant to section 69 of the County Courts Act 1984 from 3 October 1985 at the rate of 15 per centum per annum until judgment or sooner payment. The daily rate is as aforesaid or alternatively interest to be assessed pursuant to section 69 of the County Courts Act 1984.'

The claim was thus in excess of that put forward in September in that it included interest. There is a small discrepancy in the figures but it is not suggested that this is material. On 16 October the defendant put in a defence admitting liability for the damages but denying liability for interest and costs. The defence referred to the fact that a cheque for the damages had been sent on 20 September, but did not plead tender as a defence. It is, however, common ground that it was intended to be and should be treated as being a defence of tender.

Under CCR Ord 9, r 12 it is provided:

'Defence of tender

Where a defence of tender before action is pleaded, the defendant shall pay into court the amount alleged to have been tendered, and the tender shall not be available as a defence unless and until the payment into court has been made.'

f

The defendant's solicitors did pay into court a sum which was the total of the damages and interest. This was thus more than the amount alleged to have been tendered. The judge rejected the defence of tender. The agreed and approved note of his judgment, after rejecting the history, reads as follows:

g

'Under s 69 of the County Courts Act 1984 there is a power to award interest which may be included for all or any part of the period from the date of the cause of action. Once the action had started the plaintiffs limited their claim to interest to the period from the 5 August 1985. Under Ord 9, r 12 the payment into court must be in the amount alleged to have been tendered. Under Ord 11, r 1(8), for the purposes of this rule a plaintiff's cause of action in respect of a debt or damages shall be construed as a cause of action in respect also of such interest as might be included in the judgment whether under s 69 of the Act or otherwise if judgment were given at the date of payment into court. Of the two offers the offer before action excluded any interest at all. The defendant's insurers of course did not know what the position was and it was difficult to know if interest was due from the date of the cause of action, the date of repair or otherwise. The payment in does include interest which was as much as could be awarded by a judge in the proper exercise of his discretion. As there was a total omission of interest from the original tender it was therefore not a good tender and accordingly there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.'

Although the judge refers to the amount of the payment in being different from the amount tendered it appears to me to be clear that the basis of his decision was that the tender did not include interest and that he considered that by reason of the provisions of Ord 11, r 1(8) it should have done so. a

If and in so far as the judge considered that Ord 9, r 12 required the payment in therein provided for to be of the amount of the tender and no more he in my view erred. The rule merely states that the amount alleged to have been tendered must be paid in. If a defendant pays into court more than that amount in order to guard against the possibility of the plaintiff recovering more than the amount tendered he has still paid in the amount tendered. He has paid in that amount plus something more. It would in my view be an absurdity to hold that in such circumstances the defence of tender, if otherwise good, was not available for non-compliance with Ord 9, r 12. b

The judge also in my view erred in holding that the tender was bad because it did not include interest. His decision on this point was clearly founded on Ord 11, r 1(8), but that provision begins with the words 'for the purposes of this rule'. That rule is concerned with payment in under that rule in an action. It has in my view no bearing on the question of tender before action. c

No doubt in cases where the plaintiff was suing for a debt bearing contractual interest or by statute bearing interest from the date when it was incurred a tender would have to include any interest accrued to date of tender for that would be part of the debt. Where, however, as here, interest would only be recoverable under s 69 of the 1984 Act, the position is quite different. Such interest is wholly in the discretion of the court in an action. No interest may be awarded or it may be awarded only in respect of part of the debt or damages. Both period and rate of interest are in the discretion of the court. Where therefore there is no contractual interest and no statutory interest attached as a matter of right to the debt there can be no interest due. An alleged tender cannot therefore in my view be bad for failure to include interest to which, at date of tender, the plaintiff is plainly not entitled and to which he may never be entitled. d

I am accordingly of the opinion that the judgment cannot be sustained on the ground or grounds relied on by the judge. The plaintiffs, however, seek to uphold the judgment on the simple ground that the claim is one for unliquidated damages and that in such cases the defence of tender is not available at all. The defendant accepts, subject to the contentions hereafter mentioned, both that the claim, albeit quantified, is a claim for unliquidated damages and that the defence of tender is not available for such a claim. It was so decided by the court in Davys v Richardson (1888) 21 QBD 202. e

The defendant contends, however, that in the present case the effect of Ord 1, r 10 is to make the defence available notwithstanding that it is in law a claim for unliquidated damages. Order 1, r 10 provides: f

'Cost of repairs to be treated as liquidated claim in road accident case' g

A claim in an action for the cost of repairs executed to a vehicle or to any property in, on or abutting a highway in consequence of damage which it is alleged to have sustained in an accident due to the defendant's negligence shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be treated as a liquidated demand for the purposes of these rules.'

It may be that in the present case this rule cannot in any event avail the defendant because, albeit that the bulk of the claim is for cost of repairs, the claim includes a small amount for loss of use. It is, however, unnecessary to decide this point. Even if the claim were solely for cost of repairs the rule would not in my view be of any avail. In the first place the rule ends with the words 'shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be treated as a liquidated demand for the purposes of these rules'. The defence of tender is a common law substantive defence to which the rules other than Ord 9, r 12 have nothing to do. They cannot in any event amend the substantive law. Moreover, the rule itself gives the court a discretion and a discretion to allow or disallow a substantive common law defence available to a defendant is not, even if intra vires, within the contemplation of the rule. If a tender is made which is bad at common law it cannot in my view thereafter be made h a good by a provision which states merely that, for the purposes of the rules and unless the court otherwise orders, the claim shall be treated as a liquidated demand.

A further contention was advanced, albeit understandably with little fervour, that the form of summons used was only appropriate for a liquidated claim and that the plaintiffs could not now be heard to say that the claim was unliquidated. I find it unnecessary to say more about this than that it is in my judgment misconceived.

b So much for the main question of tender. The defendant, however, sought also to argue that where a defendant had offered the whole of the damages claimed he should not be entitled to costs. There can in my view be no such principle. Each case will depend on its own facts and the judge's discretion cannot be fettered.

c Since tender is not available, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to proceed to action and claim both interest and costs. In particular circumstances the judge may find good reason to deprive him of all or some part of the costs but there can be no general principle. It is possible to envisage circumstances where such action might be appropriate but I refrain from giving examples since were I to do so it might in future be argued that the Court of Appeal had ruled that in certain circumstances a plaintiff should be deprived.

I would dismiss the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR AND CROOM-JOHNSON LJ

22 MAY, 10 JUNE 1987

County court – Costs – Unliquidated claim – Legal costs – Cost of repairs in road accident case – Offer of settlement to pay repairs – Refusal to pay costs – Whether plaintiff entitled to continue with claim in order to obtain costs.

Where a plaintiff claims the cost of repairs arising out of a road accident, together with solicitor's costs, and the defendant's insurers offer to pay the cost of repairs in full but refuse to pay the legal costs, the plaintiff is entitled to continue with his claim in the county court, since the claim will be unliquidated and until the damages are assessed it will be impossible to know the amount of damages the plaintiff will recover or the costs for which the defendant will be liable (see p 256 c d g, post).

g

The plaintiff, Mark Smith, appealed from the judgment of his Honour Judge Wakley sitting in Brentford County Court on 12 November 1986 whereby he dismissed an appeal from the order of Mr Registrar Rees dated 15 October 1986 striking out the plaintiff's claim for damages against the defendant, John Patrick Springer, as an abuse of the process of the court. The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson MR.

10 June. The following judgments were delivered.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR. On 15 May 1985 the defendant, Mr Springer, drove his Lada motor car into the back of a Ford, owned and driven by the plaintiff, Mr Smith, whilst it was stopped at a road junction. This is not a promising position from which to

- deny liability and the defendant has never done so. But on the other hand neither he nor
- a his insurers, Eagle Star Insurance Group, rushed to the plaintiff, cheque book in hand, and in due course Mr Smith consulted solicitors, Messrs Shoosmiths & Harrison. This appeal is solely concerned with the extent, if any, to which the plaintiff can recover the professional fees which he is liable to pay Shoosmiths & Harrison as part of his claim against the defendant. It is possible that the plaintiff may have legal expenses insurance, but nothing turns on this since those insurers, if any, would be entitled to succeed to and
- b enforce the plaintiff's rights.

The sequence of events, so far as is material, was as follows.

(a) On 14 November 1985 Shoosmiths & Harrison wrote to the defendant claiming unspecified uninsured losses and were referred to Eagle Star.

(b) On 23 December Shoosmiths & Harrison wrote to Eagle Star as follows:

- c 'The circumstances of the accident make it clear that your insured is wholly responsible for, inter alia, our client's claims for uninsured losses. Your insured's vehicle ran into the rear of our client's stationary vehicle. We are instructed to commence County Court proceedings forthwith for the recovery of our client's claim. However, our client will now accept settlement for the total amount set out below, providing we receive your company's cheque within the next 10 days. If we
- d do not, we will issue the required summons. We enclose copies of the appropriate documents supporting our client's claims which are as follows:

Policy excess	25.00
Loss of use 4 days at £15.00 per day	60.00
Interest @ 15 percentum per annum on the above at e 3p per day to today's date	1.32
Costs	23.00
	£109.32
	TOTAL

- f Kindly note that this settlement is subject to payment of our costs. Please make your remittance in respect of this item of claim payable to us.'

(c) On 17 January 1986 Eagle Star replied with a printed slip which, when the 'ticks' were interpreted, read: 'We enclose our cheque for £86.32 in settlement of your claim. We will not pay for costs.'

(d) Shoosmiths & Harrison replied on 10 February:

- g 'Your counter-offer is not acceptable to our client and we are therefore returning your cheque. We are instructed to commence County Court proceedings for the recovery of our client's losses together with interest pursuant to Section 69 of the County Courts Act 1984. These will be served on your insured direct without further notice.'

- h (e) Eagle Star replied on 19 February:

'We have your communication of the 10th February 1986, and feel that the action you have taken is totally unreasonable and unjustified. If this matter were referred to a Small Claims County Court, costs would not be awarded because the limit of £500 had not been exceeded. Furthermore, you had not been instructed because of any unreasonable attitude by ourselves, and feel that our offer to you of £86.32 is a fair and reasonable one, and we are maintaining it. If you would like to give written acceptance to this offer we can despatch our cheque to you.'

- j (f) On 15 May Shoosmiths & Harrison issued proceedings in the Brentford County Court. The particulars of claim referred to the facts of the collision, alleged negligence on the part of Mr Springer and continued:

'4. By reason of the matters aforesaid the Plaintiff has suffered damage and loss.

Policy excess	25.00

5. The Plaintiff agents required the use of his vehicle whilst it was being taken to the garage where repairs were completed and during the period of repairs. The Plaintiff suffered inconvenience and was deprived of the use and enjoyment of the vehicle until repaired for the period of 4 days.

AND the Plaintiff claims damages and interest pursuant to Section 69 of the County Court Act 1984 limited to '£500.00.'

(g) On 7 July Messrs Edward Lewis & Co, solicitors acting for the defendant or Eagle Star, signed a printed form of defence which they completed to read as follows:

'In the BRENTFORD County Court

CASE No. 8607798

1. Do you dispute the plaintiff's claim or any part of it? YES
2. If so, how much do you dispute and what are your reasons?

The Defendant reserves the right to contend that the Plaintiff's claim is an abuse/misuse of the process of the Court, pursuant to order 13 Rule 5(i) (d) of the County Court Rules 1981.

The Defendant admits that the accident referred to in the Particulars of Claim was caused by his negligence.

The Defendant further admits that as a result of the accident, the Plaintiff has suffered loss and damage. The Defendant avers that by a solicitors letter dated 23rd December 1985, the Plaintiff quantified his loss in the sum of £86.32.

Policy Excess	£25.00
Loss of use, 4 days @ £15.00 per day	£60.00
Interest @ 15% p.a. on above @ 3p per day to today's date	£1.32
	£86.32

The Defendant through his insurers forwarded a cheque in the sum of £86.32 in full and final settlement of the Plaintiff's claim to the Plaintiff's solicitors.

The Plaintiff's solicitors have rejected the sum of £86.32 on the grounds that costs of £23.00 were recoverable. The Defendant avers that the Plaintiff's solicitors were not entitled to costs at any stage, as the total of the Plaintiff's claim fell below the arbitration limit of £500.00.

The Defendant avers therefore that the Plaintiff's claim is an abuse of the process of the Court.'

(h) On the same day Edward Lewis & Co paid the sum of £86.32 into court 'in full and final satisfaction of your claim interest and costs in this case'.

(i) On the same day Edward Lewis & Co applied for an order that—

- a (1) All proceedings be stayed.
(2) That the Plaintiff's claim be struck out on the grounds that it is an abuse of the process of the Court, pursuant to order 13 Rule 5(i)(d) of the County Court Rules 1981.
(3) The Plaintiff do pay the costs of this action, to be taxed in any event.'

b (j) On 16 July Shoosmiths & Harrison delivered a reply claiming to be entitled to interlocutory judgment for damages to be assessed and contending that the alleged quantification of the plaintiff's claim contained in their letter of 23 December 1985 was nothing more than an offer of settlement.

On the defendant's application, the registrar struck out the plaintiff's claim, ordered him to pay the defendant's costs and further ordered that the money in court be paid out to the defendant's solicitors. This order was affirmed by his Honour Judge Wakley on appeal. The grounds of decision in each case were that the plaintiff's claim was clearly a liquidated claim for £86.32 and that, in the light of the tender of the cheque by Eagle Star before proceedings were begun, the proceedings were unnecessary and were started for an improper purpose, namely the recovery of what were described as 'improper costs'. Each referred to and relied on Hobbs v Marlowe [1977] 2 All ER 241, [1978] AC 16, in which the House of Lords held that it was a misuse of the process of the court to increase the amount of the claim by including insured costs if the sole object of the exercise was to increase the amount of legal costs recoverable and that, in such a case, the judge was justified in refusing to order costs appropriate to the increased sum claimed.

Although the sum in dispute is small, the appeal is said to be of some importance in that the scenario is a common one and, in total, considerable sums may be involved. Indeed we were referred to two previous occasions on which Shoosmiths & Harrison and Eagle Star have joined issue on this same point. In the first, John Laing Construction Ltd v C J O'Shea & Co [1986] CA Transcript 1038 his Honour Judge Russell Vick QC refused to strike out the claim and Nicholls LJ refused leave to appeal on the grounds that the claim could only be struck out if it could be shown that there was no genuine or reasonable claim for more than had already been offered by Eagle Star. In the second, John Laing Construction Ltd v Dastur [1987] 3 All ER 247, [1987] 1 WLR 686, this court held on a substantive appeal that claims of this nature were for unliquidated damages and that the defence of tender, which would have defeated the plaintiff's claim for costs and entitled the defendant to recover his costs from the plaintiff, was not therefore available.

The argument for the plaintiff is that his is an unliquidated claim liability for which is admitted and that accordingly he is entitled to interlocutory judgment for damages to be assessed. What costs he obtains will depend on the amount of the damages which he is awarded on that assessment, subject to the effect of the payment into court of £86.32 should he fail to obtain more than this sum. There is no question of any misuse of the court procedure, since his open offer to settle was at a figure of £109.32, and in so far as he explained his offer, this explanation did not limit the extent of his claim if the offer was rejected, as it was. He further points out that he has now included a general item of £10 for travelling and out-of-pocket expenses and £2 for a DVLC search, neither of which featured in the breakdown of the offer of settlement, and that the claim for inconvenience and loss of use of the car is not now limited in amount, although as part of the settlement he had put that claim at £60.

The argument for the defendant is essentially that the whole philosophy governing the determination of small claims in the county court is that plaintiffs should be their own lawyers and can expect to recover no more than the costs stated on the summons or which would have been so stated if the claim had been a liquidated claim (see Hobbs v Marlowe [1977] 2 All ER 241 at 256, [1978] AC 16 at 40 per Lord Diplock and CCR Ord 19, r 6). However, by starting proceedings and forcing the defendant to pay into court, the plaintiff has put himself in a position to take the money out of court and lodge a bill for taxation on the basis of scale costs (see Ord 11, r 3(5)). It was also submitted that the plaintiff would have a right to scale costs under Ord 9, r 6 if he signed interlocutory judgment. I find the construction of that rule obscure as applied to the facts of this case and I am not convinced that this is right. However, for present purposes I will assume that it is. The part of the judgment relating to costs could still have been varied at a later date, if circumstances justified such a course (see Ord 37, r 4). In the submission of the defendant the action has been brought solely in order to increase the costs payable by the defendant and so to induce his insurers in other cases to pay the full claim and solicitors' charges in order to avoid litigation. This is an abuse of the process of the court and should be met with a striking out order under Ord 13, r 5(i)(d). a

I would accept that the court should not allow a plaintiff to use the process of the court for purposes other than the resolution of real disputes, but I do not consider that the remedy of striking out is appropriate unless this can be established beyond argument at the time when the application is made. As things stand, it is impossible to say whether the plaintiff will recover more than £86.32. If he does not do so, the defendant will be able to limit his liability in costs to those incurred by the plaintiff up to the time of payment in, which would be small. There is also a residual discretion as to the costs which can be exercised in an appropriate case, but first it is necessary to ascertain the facts and that has not yet been done. b

Accordingly, I would allow the appeal and enter interlocutory judgment for the plaintiff ordering damages to be assessed by the registrar. It is only when those damages have been assessed that the county court will be in a position to exercise a discretion as to the costs. c

I would only add that I have some sympathy with insurance companies who are prepared to settle in full, but who do not wish also to have to meet legal expenses as the price of avoiding litigation. I apprehend that CCR Ord 1, r 10, which provides that— d

‘A claim in an action for the cost of repairs executed to a vehicle or to any property in, on or abutting a highway in consequence of damage which it is alleged to have sustained in an accident due to the defendant’s negligence shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be treated as a liquidated demand for the purposes of these rules.’ e

was addressed to this problem and was intended to make the defence of tender available to motor insurers. The decision of this court in John Laing Construction Ltd v Dastur [1987] 3 All ER 247, [1987] 1 WLR 686 shows that it does not achieve this result, at least where the claim is wider than for the cost of repairs, and it may be that the county court rule committee would wish to look at this rule again with a view to its amendment. f

f Pamela Ruth Williams (Mrs Williams) appealed with leave from the judgment of her Honour Judge Holt given on 23 March 1984 setting aside so much of the order of Mr Registrar Jeffreys made on 10 March 1987 as directed that Mrs Williams's solicitors be at liberty to inspect and take copies of all paid cheques, credit slips, paying-in slips and counterfoils in respect of payments made into or out of certain bank accounts administered by Barclays Bank plc (the bank). The registrar's order was made in the g course of (1) an application by Mrs Williams for ancillary financial relief in separation proceedings between her and Sidney Richard Williams (Mr Williams) and (2) possession proceedings brought by Edward Henry Tucker, Jacqueline Louise Hamilton and Kathleen Palmer against Mr and Mrs Williams. The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir John Donaldson MR.

10 July. The following judgments were delivered.

i SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR. This appeal raises a short, but important, point under the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879 as amended by the Banking Act 1979 (Sch 6, para 1(2)). The point is whether the Act extends to paying-in slips and paid cheques retained by banks after the conclusion of the transactions to which they relate.

Mrs Williams has sought disclosure by the bank of copies of those documents for use as evidence in two different proceedings. In the first, in which she petitions for judicial separation from her husband, she also seeks ancillary financial orders. This involves ascertaining the income and capital resources of her husband, who is loath to assist and has ignored all orders for discovery. Mrs Williams's case is that her husband has secret bank and building society accounts and, in addition, has used his position as chairman or director of an unincorporated and unregistered 'charitable' organisation to conceal the extent of his own wealth by mixing his own moneys with those of the 'charity' in its accounts with the Orpington branch of Barclays Bank. In the second, the trustees of the 'charity' are seeking an order against both Mr and Mrs Williams for possession of the matrimonial home at St Anne's-on-Sea, alleging that it is owned by the 'charity'. Mrs Williams's defence is that, although it was bought with money drawn from the account of that organisation, the money used was that of her husband and that he is the beneficial owner of the house.

Clearly if justice is to be done, Mrs Williams must be able to find out what payments have been made into and out of these charitable accounts and her husband's accounts and by and to whom such payments were made. The question is how this is to be achieved. As the bank concedes, she could obtain a subpoena duces tecum addressed to the appropriate officer of the bank requiring him to attend at the hearing with all documentation in the hands of the bank relating to the accounts of the 'charity' and of her husband. However, this would probably, if not inevitably, lead to adjournments in both proceedings in order that the documents could be studied and further inquiries made. If, on the other hand, Mrs Williams and her advisers could have this information in advance of the hearings, the financial and other costs of an adjournment would be avoided and indeed the chances of getting at the truth would be improved.

With these considerations in mind, on 24 February 1987 Mrs Williams applied ex parte in the Blackpool County Court and obtained an order from Mr Deputy Registrar Pickup requiring the bank to allow her and her solicitors 'to inspect and take copies of all entries in the books of Barclays Bank PLC Orpington, Kent relating to [Mr Williams's] account therewith and also the accounts of ["the charity"]'.

On 10 March 1987 on a further ex parte application Mrs Williams obtained an extended order by Mr Registrar Jeffreys in the following terms:

'I. further to the provisions of the order of Mr Deputy Registrar Pickup, the Solicitors for [Mrs Williams] be at liberty to inspect and take copies of all entries in all of the records used and kept in the ordinary course of their business by Barclays Bank PLC, Orpington concerning and relating to the banking account or accounts of [Mr Williams] and also of ["the charity"] between 1st January 1978 and the date hereof (whether such records be written, or as microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval system) and in particular that they be at liberty to inspect and take copies of:— 1) all paid cheques issued on any of the said accounts and all such other documentary or other records used by the said bank and identifying the recipient of any cheque paid on the said accounts 2) all documentary or other records of payment into the said accounts, including credit slips, paying in slips or counterfoils (3) all documents of transfer recording or authorising payments from one of the said accounts to another thereof (4) all standing orders or direct debit instructions as ordered in relation to the said accounts ...'

On being served with this later order, the bank appealed and her Honour Judge Holt varied it by substituting an order in the following terms:

'IT IS ORDERED that further to the provisions of the order of Mr Deputy Registrar Pickup dated the 24th day of February 1987 the Solicitors for [Mrs Williams] be at liberty to inspect and take copies of all entries in all of the records used and kept in a the ordinary course of their business by Barclays Bank Plc, Orpington concerning and relating to the banking account or accounts of [Mr Williams] and also of ["the charity"] between 1st January 1978 and the date hereof (whether such records be written, or as microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval system) and in particular that they be at liberty to inspect and take copies of all documents of transfer recording or authorising payments from one of the said accounts to another thereof.'

b Mrs Williams appeals seeking the restoration of the registrar's order of 10 March 1987.

We are told that the parties will have no difficulty in agreeing on a schedule indicating the types of documents which fall to be disclosed under the registrar's or, as the case may be, the judge's orders and, for the purposes of the argument, it was assumed that the difference lay in the fact that under the registrar's order cheques drawn on and paid out of the accounts of the named charity and of Mr Williams together with paying-in slips relating to payments to the credit of those accounts would be disclosable, whereas under the judge's order they would not.

c The first Bankers' Books Evidence Act was enacted in 1876. Its purpose was set out in the preamble:

d 'WHEREAS serious inconvenience has been occasioned to bankers and also to the public by reason of the ledgers and other account books having been removed from the banks for the purpose of being produced in legal proceedings: And whereas it is expedient to facilitate the proof of the transactions recorded in such ledgers and account books: Be it therefore enacted [etc].'

e The way this was achieved was by providing that entries in the bank's books should be admissible as prima facie evidence of the 'matters, transactions, and accounts recorded therein', subject to verification by the bank's officers and that copies of all such entries should be admissible in evidence without production of the originals.

The current Act, that of 1879, was described as, and was, an amending Act, but it took the form of repealing the 1876 Act and re-enacting it in a simpler and clearer form.

f Would that the legislature would adopt the same methods today.

The relevant provisions of the 1879 Act, as originally enacted, were as follows:

3. Subject to the provisions of this Act, a copy of any entry in a banker's book shall in all legal proceedings be received as prima facie evidence of such entry, and of the matters, transactions, and accounts therein recorded.

g 4. A copy of an entry in a banker's book shall not be received in evidence under this Act unless it be first proved that the book was at the time of the making of the entry one of the ordinary books of the bank, and that the entry was made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that the book is in the custody or control of the bank. Such proof may be given by a partner or officer of the bank, and may be given orally or by an affidavit sworn before any commissioner or person authorised to take affidavits . . .

h 6. A banker or officer of a bank shall not, in any legal proceeding to which the bank is not a party, be compellable to produce any banker's book the contents of which can be proved under this Act, or to appear as a witness to prove the matters, transactions, and accounts therein recorded, unless by order of a judge made for special cause.

j 7. On the application of any party to a legal proceeding a court or judge may order that such party be at liberty to inspect and take copies of any entries in a banker's book for any of the purposes of such proceedings. An order under this section may be made either with or without summoning the bank or any other party, and shall be served on the bank three clear days before the same is to be obeyed, unless the court or judge otherwise directs . . .

9 ... Expressions in this Act relating to "bankers' books" include ledgers, day books, cash books, account books, and all other books used in the ordinary business of the bank.' a

The Act in this form clearly contemplated that the banks had a series of books of various kinds which, in the course of the ordinary business of the bank, were in everyday use in that clerks made entries, that is to say wrote, in them. The transfer of any of these books to the court, with a consequent inability to make such entries, and indeed to consult the books, would have been a very considerable inconvenience. Hence the power to provide certified copies, not of the books, but of the relevant entries in the books. However, there was no need for this power to extend, and it did not extend, to papers (including cheques and paying-in slips) which were retained in the bank's possession, but did not constitute an 'entry in a banker's book'. b

In 1979 Parliament recognised that banks had replaced 'books' with more sophisticated forms of 'entry' recording 'matters, transactions and accounts' and it amended s 9 of the 1879 Act by substituting a new definition of 'bankers' books' in the following terms: c

'(2) Expressions in this Act relating to "bankers' books" include ledgers, day books, cash books, account books and other records used in the ordinary business of the bank, whether those records are in written form or are kept on microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval mechanism.' d

However, and this is highly significant, Parliament did not amend ss 3, 4 and 5 of the 1879 Act, which continued to refer to 'a copy of an entry in a banker's book'. The parliamentary intention was, therefore, that s 3, incorporating the new definition, should read: e

'... a copy of any entry in a ledger, day book, cash book, account book or other record used in the ordinary business of the bank, whether that record is in written form or is kept on microfilm, magnetic tape or any other form of mechanical or electronic data retrieval mechanism shall in all legal proceedings be received as prima facie evidence of such entry, and of the matters, transactions and accounts therein recorded.' f

Sections 4 and 5 fall to be construed similarly.

For the purposes of this appeal it is not, I think, necessary to refer in detail to the evidence of how Barclays' cheques are collected, presented and paid. Suffice it to say that it is done by interbank and interbranch credits and debits, which identify the cheques and the accounts on which they are drawn by their numbers, but do not identify the payee by name. That information is only obtainable by looking at the cheque itself. This is returned to the paying branch and, unless the customer asks for it to be returned to him, is retained by that branch. Furthermore, surprising though it may seem, if it is returned to the customer, no copy is made of the cheque. The only exception to this general statement of the position is that if an electronic reader-sorter is unable to read the magnetic numbers on a cheque, that cheque is rejected and is then microfilmed and dealt with manually. Barclays were minded to concede on the authority of Barker v Wilson [1980] 2 All ER 81, [1980] 1 WLR 884 that the reel or sheet of microfilm might be regarded as a 'banker's book' within the new definition and that each photograph of a cheque might be regarded as an 'entry'. Even if this is right, it would not help Mrs Williams because only 3.5% to 4% of cheques are rejected by the Barclays reader-sorter and are photographed. Furthermore, the selection of which cheques are dealt with in this way is entirely fortuitous, at least if the magnetic print has not been erased deliberately. g a Cheques and paying-in slips retained by branches are not stored in any way, all those received on a particular day being bundled up together in any order. A day's bundle can contain 2,000 to 2,500 individual items. They are only referred to if a query arises and in that event, assuming that the relevant day can be identified, someone has to sort through the whole of that day's bundle.

b In this situation counsel for Mrs Williams has to submit, and does submit, that the bundles of cheques and paying-in slips constitute bankers' books within the modern definition and that adding each cheque or paying-in slip to the bundle constitutes making an entry in those books. Whilst I would be prepared to accept that the cheques constitute part of the bank's records used in the ordinary business of the bank (see R v Jones [1978] 2 All ER 718, [1978] 1 WLR 195, a case concerned with a bill of lading put in evidence under the Criminal Evidence Act 1965), I am quite unable to accept that adding an individual cheque or paying-in slip can be regarded as making an 'entry' in those records.

c Putting the matter in another way, 'other records' in the new definition has, I think, to be construed ejusdem generis with 'ledgers, day books, cash books [and] account books' and unsorted bundles of cheques and paying-in slips are not 'other records' within the meaning of the Act.

d For these reasons, which are substantially the same as those of Judge Holt, I would hold that Mrs Williams is not entitled to the extended order which she sought. I do so with considerable regret, because in a proper case, of which this seems to be one, it should be possible to obtain disclosure of cheques and paying-in slips before the hearing. This is something which I hope can be looked at by the relevant rule committee.

e Barclays have resisted this appeal for two reasons. First they say that they must preserve the confidentiality of the banker-customer relationship, unless this is overridden by an order of the court and they were not satisfied that, on the true construction of the 1879 Act, the court had power to do so. These sentiments are unexceptionable. Their second reason is less attractive. They point out that identifying particular paid cheques and paying-in slips is a very time-consuming, and therefore expensive, process bearing in mind their system of retaining such documents in an unsorted state. Understandably they are reluctant to undertake it even if they are reimbursed the cost involved. They are not therefore averse to a situation in which the only means by which such documents

f can be the subject of a court order for production is by subpoena duces tecum, since their experience is that few litigants will go to this length. Of course they put it more attractively, saying that in practice discovery of records, such as statements of account, under the 1879 Act normally provides the litigant with all that he needs and that if the Act were to extend to cheques and paying-in slips courts would be liable to order their production automatically and without a proper regard for whether this was necessary in the interests of justice. All that may be correct, but I am not attracted by reliance on procedural difficulties as a means of restricting orders for discovery, regardless of whether such discovery is necessary in the interests of justice.

h On the facts of this case, it is not clear to me why, if this has not already been done, the court should not make a specific order requiring Mr Williams to obtain the cheques and paying-in slips relating to his account or accounts with Barclays Bank and to disclose them to Mrs Williams and her solicitor. If, as seems likely, Mr Williams failed to comply with this order, he could be committed for disobedience of the court order and Barclays, as his agent holding these documents on his behalf, could then be required to disclose them. That does not, however, solve the problem of the cheques and paying-in slips relating to the 'charity' accounts. Mr Williams would deny that they were in his possession, power or control. However, I do not understand why the trustees of the 'charity' should not be ordered to give discovery of them in the possession action. If, however, they are only discoverable by means of a subpoena duces tecum calling on the appropriate officer of the bank to attend the hearing, I see no reason why the court should not order that the hearing should begin on a specified day and, so far as that day is concerned, be confined to receiving the documents, the remainder of the hearing standing adjourned to a date to be fixed. a

I would dismiss the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

KERR, NEILL AND BALCOMBE LJ

9, 10, 11 FEBRUARY, 12 MARCH 1987

Solicitor – Undertaking – Undertaking to procure execution of charge by client – Client not executing charge – Performance of undertaking becoming impossible – Whether solicitor guilty of professional misconduct in failing to perform undertaking – Whether court should exercise supervisory jurisdiction if performance of undertaking impossible – Whether solicitor should be ordered to compensate persons suffering loss because undertaking not performed. e

In May 1983 the plaintiff issued writs against the defendant company claiming the amount of goods sold and delivered and he subsequently issued summonses for summary judgment under RSC Ord 14. Before the summonses were heard the defendant's solicitor gave an oral undertaking to the plaintiff's solicitor that he would procure the execution of charges in favour of the plaintiff by the defendant's directors over their homes or life assurance policies, in return for which the plaintiff's solicitor agreed to adjourn the summonses. The charges were not executed and in due course judgment was entered against the defendant. Subsequently, however, the defendant went into liquidation and the judgment could not be enforced. The plaintiff then applied for an order that the defendant's solicitor should procure the execution of charges by the directors pursuant to his undertaking. The judge, without considering whether performance of the undertaking was impossible, ordered that the undertaking be performed, on the assumption that in the exercise of the court's supervisory jurisdiction over solicitors the court could not, in the absence of dishonourable conduct, make an alternative order that the solicitor pay compensation for non-performance of his undertaking. The defendant's solicitor appealed, contending that it was impossible for him to perform the undertaking and therefore it ought not to be enforced. The plaintiff cross-appealed, contending that the judge's order should be varied to require the solicitor to pay damages in lieu of the undertaking or, alternatively, compensation to make good the loss caused by his breach of duty to perform the undertaking. f

Held – Where a solicitor was unable to carry out or procure the performance of an undertaking given by him the court could exercise its inherent supervisory jurisdiction over the solicitor, because failure to implement an undertaking prima facie constituted

- a professional misconduct or a serious dereliction of professional duty even though the solicitor may not have acted dishonourably or actual performance of the undertaking required action by a third party and was therefore beyond the solicitor's control. Although the court would usually order performance of the undertaking, where performance was impossible the court could order the solicitor to pay compensation to any person who had suffered loss because of the solicitor's failure to implement his undertaking, provided it was shown that the failure amounted to professional misconduct or serious dereliction of duty. It followed that the judge had been wrong not to take into account the fact that it was impossible for the solicitor to perform the undertaking or to consider the possibility of making a compensatory order against the solicitor. Both the appeal and the cross-appeal would therefore be allowed and the case remitted to the judge for further consideration see p 269 b to d f to h, p 270 a to e h, p 271 a, p 273 d h j, p 274 h and p 275 b to d, post).

Appeal

The plaintiff, Robert Alan Udall, trading as Udall Sheet Metal & Co, brought two actions against the defendant, Capri Lighting Ltd, of which a Mr Roe and a Mr Gowing were directors, claiming money for goods supplied by the plaintiff to the defendant. By originating summonses issued in the actions the plaintiff applied for an order to enforce a personal undertaking alleged to have been given on 6 July 1983 by Mr R O Whiting, the defendant's solicitor, to procure Mr Roe and Mr Gowing to give second charges on their homes or life policies in favour of the plaintiff. The summonses were heard by Sir Neil Lawson, sitting as a judge of the High Court, who by a reserved judgment given on 11 December 1985 found that Mr Whiting had given such an undertaking, held that the undertaking was enforceable by the court in the exercise of its summary jurisdiction over solicitors, ordered that Mr Whiting perform the undertaking within 28 days and refused a stay of execution. Mr Whiting appealed, seeking variation of the order to require him only to use his best endeavours to procure the charges or alternatively that the order should provide that he should not be required to do anything that was not within his power. By a respondent's notice served on 19 August 1986 the plaintiff sought a variation of the order of 11 December 1985 to require, inter alia, Mr Whiting to pay damages in lieu of the undertaking or alternatively to pay such compensation as was required to make good all losses occasioned by his breach of duty in not performing the undertaking. The facts are set out in the judgment of Balcombe LJ.

James Munby for Mr Whiting.

J G Ross for the plaintiff.

Cur adv vult

12 March. The following judgments were delivered.

BALCOMBE LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Kerr LJ). This appeal and cross-appeal from an order dated 11 December 1985 made by Sir Neil Lawson (sitting as a judge of the High Court) raise the question of the exercise by the court of its discretionary jurisdiction to control solicitors as its officers.

In May 1983 the plaintiff (trading as Udall Sheet Metal & Co) issued specially indorsed writs against the defendant, Capri Lighting Ltd, of which company a Mr Roe and a Mr Gowing were directors. Both writs were in respect of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant; the first writ claimed £20,215, the second £5,509, in each case together with interest. Messrs Rutter & Rutter, solicitors of Shaftesbury, Dorset, acknowledged service of these writs on behalf of the defendant. The plaintiff then took out summonses under RSC Ord 14 in both actions, the return date being 7 July 1983 in each case.

On 6 July 1983 a number of telephone conversations took place between Mr Timothy Grant Readman, the principal of Messrs Readman & Co, solicitors for the plaintiff, and Mr Richard Oxley Whiting, a partner in Rutter & Rutter. In the course of one of these conversations Mr Readman said that the plaintiff was only prepared to agree to an adjournment of the Ord 14 summonses on the following day if Mr Roe and Mr Gowing were prepared to give second charges on their private residences or on life assurance policies having a surrender value. In the course of a subsequent telephone conversation on the same day Mr Whiting told Mr Readman that both Mr Roe and Mr Gowing were prepared to give second charges on their properties, which were then identified. The

- a judge found that in the course of this conversation Mr Whiting gave his personal undertaking as a solicitor to procure these charges; the precise form of the undertaking as found being to—
- ‘procure second charges on the security of the residence of one Gowing, namely 54 Church Street, Tisbury in the county of Wiltshire and [on the residence of] one Rowe [sic] namely The Cottage, Dennis Lane, Ludwell, Shaftesbury in the County of Dorset . . .’
- b There has been no appeal against this finding by the judge.
- The hearing of the Ord 14 summonses was adjourned, but on 26 July Rutter & Rutter wrote to Readman & Co to say that the defendant would submit to judgment. This evinced a reply from Readman & Co on the following day expressing astonishment and asserting that in the telephone conversation of 6 July Mr Whiting had given Mr Readman
- c a specific personal undertaking that Mr Roe and Mr Gowing would give second charges on the security of their respective private residences. On 28 July 1983 Rutter & Rutter wrote saying that no undertaking had been given by Mr Whiting. Thus the scene was set for these proceedings.
- In due course judgments were entered in default of defence in both actions but these judgments remain unsatisfied. The defendant company has since gone into liquidation.
- d So the plaintiff decided to enforce Mr Whiting’s personal undertaking. It is common ground that the plaintiff has a right of action in contract against Mr Whiting on his undertaking, but it is also common ground that Mr Whiting could and would plead by way of defence that there is no note or memorandum of the undertaking so as to satisfy s 4 of the Statute of Frauds or s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925. Whether or not such a defence would succeed is immaterial: the plaintiff realistically took the view that the
- e probability of this defence being raised was a good reason why he should not pursue an action at law and he decided instead to invoke the court’s inherent jurisdiction over solicitors.
- So the plaintiff issued summonses in the two actions asking for orders that Mr Whiting should procure the second charges pursuant to his undertaking. Since both summonses raised precisely the same issues, I shall treat them as one application, as they have been
- f treated throughout. After various procedural vicissitudes the matter came before his Honour Judge Dobry QC sitting as a judge of the High Court in chambers. Mr Whiting was then taking the point that this was not a proper case for the invocation of the summary procedure, since it was not a clear case: see Geoffrey Silver & Drake v Baines [1971] 1 All ER 473, [1971] 1 QB 396. However, Judge Dobry QC rejected that contention, although he gave directions for pleadings and discovery and for the deponents to the affidavits to attend for cross-examination. Against that order there was no appeal.
- g So it was that the plaintiff’s application came on before Sir Neil Lawson for hearing on 4 and 5 December 1985.
- Before the judge the principal issue was whether Mr Whiting gave his personal undertaking and the greater part of the two-day hearing and of the judgment was
- h directed to this issue. Counsel who appeared for the plaintiff below, as he did before us, opened the case on the basis that if the undertaking had been given then it should be enforced by the court, and, relying on United Mining and Finance Corp Ltd v Becher [1910] 2 KB 296, [1908–10] All ER Rep 876, he did not need, nor did he seek, then to allege dishonourable or discreditable conduct on the part of Mr Whiting. Although the practicability of enforcing the undertaking was canvassed in argument before the judge,
- j there was then no evidence that the enforcement of the undertaking, ie the procurement of the two second charges, was impossible.
- Having decided that the undertaking had been given, the judge went on to consider whether it was enforceable by the court in the exercise of its summary jurisdiction over solicitors. On this aspect of the case he considered three points. (1) Was it a clear case? He answered this question in the affirmative. (2) Could the court enforce a solicitor’s undertaking to secure a third party to do an act or execute a document? This question also he answered in the affirmative, in reliance on Ex p Hughes (1822) 5 B & Ald 482, 106 ER 1267 and the Canadian case of Re solicitors (1916) 32 DLR 387. (3) Was the undertaking one which it was impossible to perform? On this the judge said: a

‘I find it difficult to conceive of a solicitor giving an undertaking which it is impossible to carry out. But there is a point to that effect in Peart v Bushell (1827) 2 Sim 38, 57 ER 705.’ b

After pointing out that Lord Sumner (as Hamilton J) had questioned the authority of the report and refused to follow Peart v Bushell in United Mining and Finance Corp Ltd v Becher the judge continued:

‘But let it be assumed that that authority is still good support for the proposition that if an undertaking is impossible of performance the court will not enforce it (and, of course, that is a commonsense point of view), I have absolutely no evidence at all that this undertaking, when it was given, was not possible to be performed. Nor have I any evidence before me at this stage that it is not possible to perform. It may be unlikely or difficult, but that is not the same thing as impossible. Here the case is to be distinguished from the scope within Re a solicitor [1966] 3 All ER 52, [1966] 1 WLR 1604, because there Pennycuik J refused to enforce an undertaking given by a solicitor to hand over a lease which not only had been lost but had also been forfeited. He questioned the evidence of the solicitor that the lease could not be found, so he obviously had evidence which satisfied him that it was, at the time when he was asked to make the order, impossible of performance. But there is no evidence to that effect here. Finally I come to consider what order to make in the exercise of the jurisdiction. I am quite satisfied that at this stage I have no jurisdiction to make any order other than an order that the undertaking be performed. If it is not performed, then the question will arise as to what should be done about it. Re solicitors (1916) 32 DLR 387, the Canadian case to which I have referred, seems to me good authority for the proposition that that is all the court can do in the enforcement of a summary jurisdiction. If one looks at the notes in The Supreme Court Practice 1985, vol 2, p 1026, there is no case in which it has been suggested that the court can, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, do anything other than to order the solicitor to do that which he undertook. Therefore that is the order I make.’ c

The judgment was a reserved judgment, delivered some six days after the end of the hearing, and after it had been delivered counsel for Mr Whiting applied for an adjournment to enable him to adduce evidence that it was impossible to perform the undertaking. This the judge refused. Accordingly an order was drawn up requiring Mr Whiting within 28 days to procure second charges on the security of 54 Church Street, Tisbury and The Cottage, Dennis Lane, Ludwell, Shaftesbury, ordering him to pay the plaintiff's costs and refusing a stay of execution. g

From that order Mr Whiting has appealed. By his notice of appeal dated 7 January 1986 he asks that the order be set aside or alternatively be varied by requiring him only to use his best endeavours to procure the charges. The grounds of the appeal are (1) the impossibility of performing the undertaking and (2) the judge's refusal to allow evidence of impossibility to be adduced after judgment. h

The appeal first came before this court on 16 April 1986. At that stage there was still no evidence properly before the court as to the impossibility of performing the undertaking, so the appeal was stood over, Mr Whiting was given leave to file evidence and the plaintiff was given leave to file evidence in reply; he was also given leave to file a respondent's notice by way of cross-appeal. j

Pursuant to that leave, both Mr Whiting and Mr Readman have filed evidence. I do not propose to refer to that evidence in detail, as it is of inordinate volume, but I am a satisfied that it is now, and was in December 1985, impossible for Mr Whiting to perform his undertaking. I can summarise the relevant facts quite shortly.

b No 54 Church Street, Tisbury. The legal estate to this property was vested in Mr Gowing and his wife. The property was subject to a first mortgage in favour of a building society and to a second charge (dated 10 September 1979) in favour of a bank. Mr Gowing was adjudicated bankrupt on 5 October 1984 and he is now in Australia. The property was sold in September 1984 for some £50,000, of which the greater part went to the building society and the bank (as first and second mortgagees), some £8,300 to the Official Receiver acting in Mr Gowing's bankruptcy and a similar sum to a bank in respect of Mrs Gowing's share in the property pursuant to a guarantee she had given. There was no surplus, and a considerable deficiency still remains in Mr Gowing's bankruptcy.

c The Cottage, Dennis Lane, Ludwell. The legal estate to this property was vested in Mr Roe alone, although it is possible that his wife had a beneficial interest. The property was subject to a first mortgage in favour of a building society and to a second charge (dated 29 September 1978) in favour of a bank. In December 1985 Mr Roe was in hospital suffering from a terminal illness; he died on 24 February 1986. After the hearing at first instance Mr Whiting asked Mr Roe to execute a charge on the property, but he died without having done so.

d The plaintiff also served a notice of cross-appeal asking that the order of 11 December 1985 be varied in a number of respects, of which the only one now material is (3):

'So as to require the Appellant [Mr Whiting] to pay damages in lieu of the said undertaking, alternatively such compensation as was/is required to make good all losses occasioned by his breach of duty to perform the said undertaking.'

e I can deal quite briefly with the appeal. There is a short answer to the second ground of appeal, ie the judge's refusal to allow evidence of impossibility to be adduced after judgment. It was for Mr Whiting to adduce evidence of impossibility if he wished to rely on impossibility as an answer to the claim for enforcement of his undertaking. He did not do so at the appropriate time, and it was clearly within the judge's discretion to refuse him leave to adduce such evidence after judgment. However, on the first ground

f of appeal, ie impossibility of performance, the appeal must succeed. I do not say that the judge was wrong in making the order he did, since at that time he had no evidence as to impossibility and in those circumstances he was justified in ordering performance: cf Re a solicitor [1966] 3 All ER 52, [1966] 1 WLR 1604. However, we did have evidence of impossibility and, as an appeal is by way of rehearing (see RSC Ord 59, r 3(1)), we must of course take account of that evidence. It is old and trite law that the 'court will not

g make any order in vain': see eg New Brunswick and Canada Rly and Land Co Ltd v Muggeridge (1859) 4 Drew 686 at 699, 62 ER 263 at 268 cited and applied by Megarry V-C in Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] 3 All ER 129 at 311, [1977] Ch 106 at 326. The proposition is so self-evident that it requires no elaboration. There is the further point that disobedience to the court's order is a contempt, and contempt is punishable with imprisonment. It is unthinkable that a court should put a man at risk of imprisonment

h by making an order which it knows, at the time of making the order, is impossible of performance. As Kindersley V-C said in Seawell v Webster (1859) 29 LJ Ch 71 at 73:

'Put the extreme case of a vendor burning a title deed: the Court could not make a decree that he should deliver it up, and be imprisoned if he does not.'

j Counsel for the plaintiff was constrained to accept that, in the light of the further evidence, he could not realistically expect successfully to resist the appeal and in the event the argument before us turned wholly on the cross-appeal. In opening his case, counsel for Mr Whiting submitted that there are two different jurisdictions which the court exercises in dealing summarily with solicitors. (1) The jurisdiction to enforce undertakings. This is exercisable whether or not there were any proceedings pending in court and whether or not the undertaking was given in the course of legal proceedings.

The jurisdiction is exercisable although the solicitor has not been guilty of dishonourable or discreditable conduct. (2) The jurisdiction to award compensation. This jurisdiction is exercisable only where the solicitor had the conduct or prosecution of some cause or matter before the court. The jurisdiction is dependent on proof of serious misconduct.

However, during the course of the hearing of the appeal we were provided with a transcript of the judgments of this court (Sir John Donaldson MR and Nicholls LJ) in John Fox (a firm) v Bannister King & Rigbeys (a firm) [1987] 1 All ER 737. In the light of those judgments counsel for Mr Whiting was constrained to concede that the compensatory jurisdiction was not limited to undertakings given in the course of proceedings; however, as the undertaking in the present case was given in the course of proceedings, this did not matter. However, he maintained his submission that the compensatory jurisdiction is only exercisable on proof of serious misconduct, and he relied on the fact that no allegation of moral turpitude was made against Mr Whiting in the plaintiff's points of claim, nor in the way in which the case was opened and presented before the judge. It was, he submitted, now too late for the plaintiff to allege misconduct on the part of Mr Whiting of a kind sufficient to enable him (the plaintiff) to claim compensation for breach of the undertaking.

In my judgment the true position is as follows. There are three ways in which a party who seeks to enforce a professional undertaking given by a solicitor can proceed: (1) by an action at law, if there is a cause of action; (2) by an application to the court to exercise its inherent supervisory jurisdiction; (3) by an application to the Law Society. In the Law Society's The Professional Conduct of Solicitors (1986) para 15.02 it is stated:

'A solicitor who fails to honour the terms of a professional undertaking is prima facie guilty of professional misconduct. Consequently the Council will require its implementation as a matter of conduct.'

However, in the commentary to that principle it is stated:

'1 Neither the Council nor the Tribunal have power to order payment of compensation or to procure the specific performance of an undertaking if the solicitor declines to implement it. The only step open to the Council is to take disciplinary action for failure to honour the undertaking . . .'

It is the second of these methods with which this case is concerned, and I turn now to consider this jurisdiction. I should say at once that I do not accept the submission of counsel for Mr Whiting that the enforcement of undertakings is in some way separate and distinct from the general question of professional misconduct. The true position is as follows.

(1) The nature of the summary jurisdiction is explained in the following passage from the speech of Lord Wright in Myers v Elman [1939] 4 All ER 484 at 508-509, [1940] AC 282 at 319:

'The underlying principle is that the court has a right and a duty to supervise the conduct of its solicitors, and visit with penalties any conduct of a solicitor which is of such a nature as to tend to defeat justice in the very cause in which he is engaged professionally, as was said by LORD ABINGER, C.B., in Stephens v. Hill ((1842) 10 M & W 28, 152 ER 368). The matter complained of need not be criminal. It need not involve speculation or dishonesty. A mere mistake or error of judgment is not generally sufficient, but a gross neglect or inaccuracy in a matter which it is a solicitor's duty to ascertain with accuracy may suffice. Thus, a solicitor may be held bound in certain events to satisfy himself that he has a retainer to act, or as to the accuracy of an affidavit which his client swears. It is impossible to enumerate the various contingencies which may call into operation the exercise of this jurisdiction. It need not involve personal obliquity. The term "professional misconduct" has often been used to describe the ground on which the court acts. It would perhaps be a more accurate to describe it as conduct which involves a failure on the part of a solicitor to fulfil his duty to the court and to realise his duty to aid in promoting, in his own sphere, the cause of justice. This summary procedure may often be invoked to save the expense of an action. Thus, it may, in proper cases, take the place of an action for negligence, or an action for breach of warranty of authority brought by the person named as defendant in the writ. The jurisdiction is not merely punitive, but compensatory. The order is for payment of costs thrown away or lost because of the conduct complained of. It is frequently, as in this case, exercised in order to compensate the opposite party in the action.²

(2) Although the jurisdiction is compensatory and not punitive, it still retains a disciplinary slant. It is only available where the conduct of the solicitor is inexcusable and such as to merit reproof: R & T Thew Ltd v Reeves (No 2) [1982] 3 All ER 1086 at 1089, [1982] QB 1283 at 1286.

c (3) If the misconduct of the solicitor leads to a person suffering loss, then the court has power to order the solicitor to make good the loss occasioned by his breach of duty: see Marsh v Joseph [1897] 1 Ch 213 at 244–245, [1895–9] All ER Rep 977 at 981 per Lord Russell CJ.

d (4) Failure to implement a solicitor's undertaking is prima facie to be regarded as misconduct on his part, and this is so even though he has not been guilty of dishonourable conduct: see United Mining and Finance Corp Ltd v Becher [1910] 2 KB 296, [1908–10] All ER Rep 876 and in particular the argument of the successful applicants in that case ([1910] 2 KB 296 at 301), and John Fox (a firm) v Bannister King & Rigbeys (a firm) [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 742. However, exceptionally, the solicitor may be able to give an explanation for his failure to honour his undertaking which may enable the court to say that there has been no misconduct in the particular case: see Fox's case [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 742–743.

e (5) Neither the fact that the undertaking was that a third party should do an act nor the fact that the solicitor may have a defence to an action at law (eg the Statute of Frauds), preclude the court from exercising its supervisory jurisdiction: see Ex p Hughes (1822) 5 B & Ald 482, 106 ER 1267 and Re Greaves (1827) 1 C & J 374, 148 ER 1466. However, f these are factors which the court may take into account in deciding whether or not to exercise its discretion and, if so, in what manner.

(6) The summary jurisdiction involves a discretion as to the relief to be granted: see Myers v Elman [1939] 4 All ER 484 at 508, [1940] AC 282 at 318 per Lord Wright. In the case of an undertaking, where there is no evidence that it is impossible to perform, the order will usually be to require the solicitor to do that which he has undertaken to do: g see Re a solicitor [1966] 3 All ER 52, [1966] 1 WLR 1604.

(7) Where it is inappropriate for the court to make an order requiring the solicitor to perform his undertaking, eg on the grounds of impossibility, the court may exercise the power referred to in para (3) above and order the solicitor to compensate a person who has suffered loss in consequence of this failure to implement his undertaking: see John Fox (a firm) v Bannister King & Rigbeys (a firm) [1987] 1 All ER 737. It is stated in the text-books (see Cordery on Solicitors (7th edn, 1981) p 122 and 44 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 225) that the court will not enforce an undertaking which is incapable of being performed ab initio. If this statement means no more than that the court will make no order in vain, then I would not quarrel with it. If, however, it is intended to suggest that the court will not order compensation for breach of an undertaking which is ab initio incapable of performance, then it is difficult to understand the principle on which it is based and I doubt whether it is an accurate statement of the law. It appears to depend on the authority of Peart v Bushell (1827) 2 Sim 38, 57 ER 705 and I agree with the criticism of that case made by Hamilton J in United Mining and Finance Corp Ltd v Becher [1910] 2 KB 296 at 306, [1908–10] All ER Rep 876 at 881. However, the point does not arise in the present case and I need not consider it further.

It follows that, in my judgment, the judge was wrong in thinking that he would have no jurisdiction to make any order other than an order that the undertaking be performed; the cross-appeal must be allowed and the matter remitted to the court below for consideration whether to make an order requiring Mr Whiting to pay compensation to the plaintiff. In deciding whether or not to exercise its discretion the court will have to take into account a number of factors, including those mentioned below (the list is not intended to be exhaustive): (a) whether Mr Whiting's action in giving his undertaking and then failing to implement it is conduct of such a nature as to justify the exercise of the jurisdiction. The principles to be applied in the exercise of his discretion are those set out above; (b) depending on the answer to (a) above, whether the plaintiff can show that he has suffered loss in consequence of his not having had the benefit of the second charges which he would have had if the undertaking had been performed according to its terms. This must depend on a number of factors, including the value of the properties at the relevant date (whatever that may be) and the extent of the security afforded by any charges taking priority to the 'second charges' in question. The evidence before us is insufficient to enable me to say whether the plaintiff can establish a prima facie case of loss and it may be that even the judge will find it necessary to order an inquiry, as was done in John Fox (a firm) v Bannister King & Rigbays (a firm).

I would therefore allow both the appeal and the cross-appeal and remit the case to the court below, to be heard by Sir Neil Lawson (if available).

NEILL LJ. I agree that the appeal and the cross-appeal should be allowed for the reasons given by Kerr and Balcombe LJ.

KERR LJ. I agree that the appeal of Mr Whiting should be allowed for the reasons stated in the judgment of Balcombe LJ. I also agree that the plaintiff's cross-appeal be allowed on the grounds which I set out below, without implying any disagreement with anything stated in that judgment.

This case has a number of unusual features. The first is the nature of the undertaking which Mr Whiting has been held to have given to Mr Readman. Solicitors' undertakings are normally concerned with matters within the solicitors' own control, such as to deliver up or not to part with documents in their possession, to pay moneys in certain events, to discharge a mortgage after completion etc. In the present case, however, the undertaking was to procure for the plaintiff second charges on the residences of Mr Gowing and Mr Roe. That undertaking could not be honoured by Mr Whiting without their co-operation. Its performance did not lie within Mr Whiting's sole control, as in the case of the usual kinds of undertaking given by solicitors. In effect, the nature of the undertaking was that Mr Whiting guaranteed that these two persons would provide second charges on their homes in favour of the plaintiff. If they failed to do so, for whatever reason, then the undertaking was broken.

It is against that unusual background that I would like to add some comments to the judgment of Balcombe LJ.

As he has pointed out, the fact that a solicitor has undertaken that a third party will do or refrain from doing something does not in itself affect the nature of the undertaking. The court has the same powers in relation to a solicitor who is alleged to have given an undertaking of this nature as in the case of any other undertaking. But the manner in which the court will exercise its powers in such cases may well be different from the more straightforward type of case. To give an undertaking that a third party will do or refrain from doing something may obviously be risky and indeed unwise. When there is a conflict whether or not an oral undertaking of the kind was in fact given, then the court may well conclude that the case is insufficiently clear to justify the application of its inherent summary supervisory jurisdiction over solicitors and that the matter should be left to proceed by action. But his Honour Judge Dobry QC rejected that submission, albeit subject to the safeguard of ordering pleadings and discovery. There was no appeal against his decision and the matter then proceeded like an action, with oral evidence and full cross-examination. In this connection it should also be mentioned that it was rightly not suggested on behalf of Mr Whiting that his inability to rely on the Statute of Frauds or on s 40 of the Law of Property Act 1925 was any reason against the use of the court's summary jurisdiction over solicitors. This is in line with the authorities which show that lawyers must accept responsibility for, and be able to rely on, any oral undertaking given in the course of their profession. But these do not appear to have been cases where there was any conflict of evidence about the undertaking having been given. In such cases a high degree of proof should be required, and most solicitors would no doubt agree that, as a matter of normal good practice, oral undertakings should be confirmed in writing forthwith by the recipient. Thus, one surprising feature of the present case was that there was no reference to the undertaking held to have been given on 6 July in any correspondence across the line until a letter from Mr Readman of 27 July. However, Sir Neil Lawson heard the evidence and will no doubt have made allowance for all these matters, and in any event there has equally been no appeal against his finding that the undertaking was in fact given. In the upshot, therefore, although this appears to me to be a very unusual case, there then remains nothing save to decide whether, and if so in what manner, the court's undoubted inherent jurisdiction over Mr Whiting should be exercised.

Before returning to this point I wish to add something about another unusual feature of this case. This is that by the time when it had been established to the satisfaction of the court that Mr Whiting had given the undertaking in question, it had in any event become impossible for him to carry it out. While this may be unusual, it is perhaps hardly surprising in the circumstances. As I have said, the undertaking was held to have been given on 6 July 1983, but the hearing before Sir Neil Lawson did not take place until September 1985, nearly 2½ years later. The possibility of changed circumstances concerning the two properties in question must have been obvious, and I find it astonishing that an order for what was effectively specific performance of the undertaking was made without any prior investigation of the practicalities.

However, there were two reasons for this course of events. First, there appears to have been a misunderstanding between counsel for Mr Whiting and the judge, though I think that counsel must accept responsibility for it. The bulk of the two days' hearing had been taken up with the acute conflict of evidence as to whether or not the undertaking had in fact been given. At the end of it counsel for Mr Whiting assumed that the judgment would be limited to this issue, and that there would then be argument about the nature of the order which should be made in the event of it being held, as it was, that the undertaking had been given. It was therefore only at that stage that counsel for Mr Whiting proposed to deploy the evidence showing that performance of the undertaking had become impossible. In my view this was not a satisfactory way of dealing with the matter. Having regard to the passage of time and the nature of this undertaking it seems to me that it should have been ensured by all concerned that no order for the enforcement of the undertaking was considered, let alone made, without a prior investigation of the practicalities. If that had happened, then it is clear that it would quickly have become apparent that enforcement was out of the question, and the earlier appeal to this court for the admission of this and other evidence would have been avoided. Indeed, putting the matter quite generally, it seems to me that except in straightforward cases, enforcement of an undertaking should never be ordered without some consideration of the practical implications which will ensue from the order.

But there was also another reason which appears to have affected the course of events below. Quite understandably on the authorities as they then stood, it seems clear that both counsel and Sir Neil Lawson were under the impression that in relation to unperformed undertakings, as opposed to other matters which could give rise to the court's supervisory jurisdiction over solicitors, the court's powers were restricted to ordering the solicitor to perform the undertaking, and that no order for compensation for non-performance could be made unless the circumstances also showed that the solicitor had acted dishonourably. This was not suggested by counsel for the plaintiff in the present case, since we were told that he opened the case against Mr Whiting expressly on the basis that the nature of his conduct was irrelevant; what mattered was that the undertaking had been given but not performed. All this explains the passage from the judgment which Balcombe LJ has cited. Indeed, for the first day or so of the hearing of the appeal before us matters took a similar course. Counsel for Mr Whiting's citations of authorities and textbooks had virtually convinced me that if an undertaking has become impossible of performance, as in the present case, then there was either no jurisdiction, or at any rate it was not the practice of the court, to make any order for compensation. Admittedly, I found this proposition surprising, and it was assumed rather than stated expressly in counsel's citations. But it is now unnecessary to go over this ground again, since the decision of this court in John Fox (a firm) v Bannister King & Rigbeys (a firm) [1987] 1 All ER 737 then came to light. We had heard, more or less by chance, that there had been a recent decision on this question, the transcript of which had only reached the Supreme Court Library a day or two earlier.

The decision in Fox's case is of course binding on us and it changed the course of this appeal. Counsel for Mr Whiting was at one time inclined to submit that it had been decided per incuriam because the arguments and citation of authorities may have been more restricted than before us, but he rightly did not persist in this submission. It seems to me, with respect, that the decision is precisely in line with what I would expect the law to be. But it is clearly important to consider carefully what the case in fact decided.

The plaintiff's solicitor, Mr Fox, had for some time been acting for a Mr Geoffrey Watts and was owed substantial fees. The defendants' solicitor, Mr Bannister, had previously acted for Mr Watts. He knew about Mr Fox's concern about his fees and had received a written authority from Mr Watts to give an undertaking to account to Mr Fox for the balance of certain proceeds due to be received from the sale of a property. Having received these proceeds, Mr Bannister paid some of them to Mr Fox, but this left a balance of £18,000 in relation to which there appears to have been some disagreement between Mr Fox and Mr Watts. It was therefore agreed that Mr Bannister would retain this sum for the time being. On 30 September 1982 Mr Bannister accordingly wrote to Mr Fox and informed him that Mr Watts had asked him to retain this sum and then added that 'no doubt you and Geoff will sort out as to the £18,000·00 which is still in my account and which of course I shall retain until you have sorted everything out' (see [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 739). In the event, without going into the facts in further detail, Mr Watts did not resolve the problems between him and Mr Fox and asked Mr Bannister to remit the £18,000 to him, which Mr Bannister did without further reference to Mr Fox. The latter thereupon issued an originating summons against Bannisters for an order for payment of the sum of £18,000 wrongfully released or alternatively for breach of the undertaking. His Honour Judge Tibber, sitting as a judge of the High Court, held that the letter of 30 September 1982 contained an undertaking to Mr Fox which had been broken, and although the £18,000 had meanwhile been released to Mr Watts, he ordered Bannisters to put Mr Fox in the same position as if the undertaking had been honoured. He therefore ordered that the sum should be paid into court or into a joint account 'to the credit of Mr Watts' and granted a stay pending appeal (see [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 740).

The appeal was heard by Sir John Donaldson MR and Nicholls LJ, and the latter gave the leading judgment. In the passage which became crucial for the plaintiff's cross-appeal in the present case for compensation for breach of Mr Whiting's undertaking, Nicholls LJ said ([1987] 1 All ER 737 at 740):

'The basic principles applicable in the present case are not in doubt. The jurisdiction being invoked here is the inherent jurisdiction which the Supreme Court has over solicitors, who are its officers. It is a jurisdiction which is exercised,

- a not for the purpose of enforcing legal rights, but for the purpose of enforcing honourable conduct on the part of the court's own officers: see Re Grey [1892] 2 QB 440 at 443 per Lord Esher MR. One of the areas in which this principle falls to be applied is the enforcement of undertakings given by solicitors in their capacity as solicitors. As officers of the court solicitors are expected to abide by undertakings given by them professionally, and if they do not do so they may be called on summarily to make good their defaults: see United Mining and Finance Corp Ltd v Becher [1910] 2 KB 296 at 305, [1908-10] All ER Rep 876 at 881 per Hamilton J.
- b Where a solicitor, directly or indirectly, still has it in his power to do the act which he undertook to do, the court may order him to do that act. Where the solicitor does not have it in his power, he may be ordered to make good the loss flowing from his failure to perform the undertaking, as loss flowing from a breach of duty committed by a solicitor as an officer of the court: see Marsh v Joseph [1897] 1 Ch 213 at 245, [1895-9] All ER Rep 977 at 981 per Lord Russell CJ.

He then held that the letter of 30 September contained an undertaking given by Mr Bannister in his capacity as a solicitor to Mr Fox, that it was irrelevant whether Mr Bannister had Mr Watts's authority to give it although there was no evidence to the contrary but that, if Mr Bannister had had no such authority and Mr Fox had known this, then 'this might well have affected the attitude which the court would adopt to the undertaking in these proceedings' (see [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 741). This is important, because it shows that even in cases of unperformed undertakings the court retains a discretion. He then dealt with the decision of Pennycuik J in Re a solicitor [1966] 3 All ER 52, [1966] 1 WLR 1604 and held that the case was—

- e 'no authority for the proposition now being advanced, to the effect that if a solicitor undertakes not to part with a fund and then in breach of his undertaking does so, the court is powerless to take any steps to require the solicitor to make good his default, but must leave the party to whom the undertaking was given to his remedy, if any, at law'.

- f (See [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 742.) He then went on to note that the case was not straightforward, because the breach of the undertaking had occurred over four years earlier and the parties' positions had changed a great deal, in particular since Mr Watts had meanwhile gone bankrupt. Moreover, the judge's order that Bannisters should re-create and hold the fund of £18,000 to the credit of Mr Watts could not be upheld in any event, since it was clear that neither Mr Watts nor his trustee in bankruptcy could have any claim to the fund. But, on the other hand, Mr Fox had not necessarily lost £18,000
- g but only the opportunity of taking such steps as were then open to him to stop this sum from being paid over to Mr Watts and thereafter to have recourse to it to meet his bill. In these circumstances he proposed, and Sir John Donaldson MR agreed, that the court should order an inquiry as to what loss, if any, Mr Fox had suffered by reason of the breach of the undertaking (see [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 742-743).

- h That was the outcome of the appeal, and to that extent the case is clear authority for the proposition that where a solicitor's undertaking has become impossible of performance, or where an order for its specific enforcement would be impracticable, then the court has power in its inherent jurisdiction to make an order for compensation instead. But that leaves the question as to the circumstances in which the court will exercise its discretion to make such an order. I have already referred to one brief passage in which Nicholls LJ made it clear that the court's attitude in that regard may be flexible.
- i I then come to the main passages in the judgments where this point was discussed. It was dealt with in connection with the submission that the situation in that case had not been sufficiently clear to justify the application of this summary procedure in the first place. This was the issue decided by Judge Dobry in the present case, which has not been appealed. And, since in consequence of his order there were pleadings, discovery and full oral evidence in the present case, so that the character of the procedure was in effect no more summary than if the matter had proceeded by action, I do not cite the passages from the judgments in Fox's case which deal with the importance of ensuring that solicitors are not prejudiced from defending themselves by the summary character of the supervisory procedure. The important passages for present purposes are those which refer to the standard of conduct of solicitors, in the context of unperformed undertakings, which will justify intervention by the court. In that regard Nicholls LJ said ([1987] 1 All ER 737 at 742-743):

'Counsel for Bannisters submitted that to succeed with an application such as this the applicant has to show he has a plain and obvious case, and that where serious or difficult questions are involved, the case is not one appropriate to be dealt with under the court's summary jurisdiction over its officers. I am unable to accept this submission expressed in such wide terms . . . Since the jurisdiction is disciplinary as well as compensatory, the court must be satisfied that there has been misconduct in that there has been a breach of an undertaking given by the solicitor acting professionally . . . The court, however, will always have in mind that a solicitor is not necessarily to be regarded as having misconducted himself by failing to honour an undertaking when, for example, the issue of whether the words amounted to an undertaking, or the further issue of whether there has been a breach, turns on the answer to a fine or subtle point of construction. Likewise where there was real scope for genuine misunderstanding on what was said or meant by a solicitor on a particular occasion. In that sense this supervisory jurisdiction will only be exercised in a clear case.'

And Sir John Donaldson MR said in the same connection ([1987] 1 All ER 737 at 743-744):

'The jurisdiction is indeed "extraordinary", being based on the right of the court to see that a high standard of conduct is maintained by its officers acting as such (see Cordery on Solicitors (7th edn, 1981) p 116). It is, in a sense, a domestic jurisdiction to which solicitors are only amenable because of their special relationship with the court and it is designed to impose higher standards than the law applies generally. Thus, for example, it is no answer to a complaint that a solicitor acted in breach of an undertaking given by him that there was no consideration for it (United Mining and Finance Corp Ltd v Becher [1910] 2 KB 296 at 303, [1908-10] All ER Rep 876 at 880). Its "summary" character lies not in the burden or standard of proof, although it is only exercisable where there has been a serious dereliction of duty, but in the procedure whereby it is invoked . . . In Geoffrey Silver & Drake v Baines [1971] 1 All ER 473, [1971] 1 QB 396 what I think that the judges were saying was that the court will only exercise this jurisdiction where in the end it is clearly established that there has been a serious dereliction of professional duty by a solicitor as such.'

What these passages show is that even in cases which are suitable for the application of this summary procedure, as opposed to holding that the matter must proceed by action, and even where it has been established that an undertaking has been given but not performed, the court still retains a residual discretion about the order which is appropriate in the circumstances. In cases where enforcement of an undertaking by an order for its performance is still possible and practicable, such an order will no doubt be made more or less as a matter of course. The reason is that the failure to perform an undertaking which is still capable of being performed will generally amount to professional misconduct or a serious dereliction of professional duty, to use the expressions mentioned in the judgments. But these passages also show, to use the language of Nicholls LJ, that 'a solicitor is not necessarily to be regarded as having misconducted himself by failing to honour an undertaking' (see [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 742). One of the examples which he gives is the situation 'where there was real scope for genuine misunderstanding on what was said or meant by a solicitory on a particular occasion . . . ' (see [1987] 1 All ER 737 at 743).

- a Although, as I have said, these passages were clearly directed to the question whether or not the application of the summary procedure was in any event appropriate, it seems to me that the test which they lay down for its application must also remain relevant to the order which the court will ultimately make in cases where the summary procedure has been invoked, and where it has been established that an undertaking had been given
- b but not performed. Since the purpose of the procedure is disciplinary, being designed to ensure a high standard of conduct on the part of solicitors, an order for enforcement of the undertaking or for compensation for its non-performance will not necessarily follow as a matter of course. Before making such an order the court will have to be satisfied that by failing to perform the undertaking the solicitor had been guilty of professional misconduct or a serious dereliction of professional duty. If it is not satisfied about this,
- c then it seems to me that it must still be open to the court to decline to make any order, and to hold that the matter must proceed by action, if at all, on the ground that the circumstances do not warrant an order of a disciplinary nature against an officer of the court.

- Where does that leave the present case? I agree with the order proposed by Balcombe LJ that the matter must be remitted for decision whether any, and if so what, order
- d should be made against Mr Whiting in all the circumstances. We have not seen any of the evidence in this case and it would therefore be quite inappropriate to express any view about this. It is clear, of course, that specific enforcement of the undertaking is out of the question and that the issue must be whether or not it is appropriate to make a disciplinary order for compensation. But in deciding this issue, which may not necessarily be easy in the unusual circumstances of this case, one of the factors which it may be
- e necessary to take into account, as pointed out by counsel for Mr Whiting, is the legal professional privilege of Mr Whiting's clients, and the general principles of confidentiality, which may hamper him in seeking to establish that he was not guilty of professional misconduct in this case. Thus, it is possible that these factors may prevent him from explaining fully what happened, and why the second charges were not provided.

- f On these grounds I agree that the cross-appeal should be allowed, as well as the appeal; and I also agree with the terms of the order proposed by Balcombe LJ.

Appeal and cross-appeal allowed.

SIR NICOLAS BROWNE-WILKINSON V-C

20, 21, 22 MAY, 2 JUNE 1987

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION b

22, 23, 24 JUNE, 13, 14, 15, 17 JULY 1987

Contempt of court – Criminal contempt – Intention to interfere with course of justice – Breach of injunction by person not party to action – Party to proceedings restrained by court from publishing confidential information – Defendants not parties to proceedings in which order made – Defendants publishing confidential information – Whether defendants' acts interfering with course of justice – Whether defendants committing criminal contempt of court – Contempt of Court Act 1981, ss 1, 6. c

W, a former member of the British security service who had had access to highly classified and sensitive information, proposed to publish his memoirs in Australia but in 1985 the Attorney General obtained an interim injunction in Australia restraining him from publishing. In June 1986 two national newspapers published material derived from W's memoirs. In July 1986 the Attorney General commenced proceedings seeking to restrain the two newspapers from publishing in England material relating to W's memoirs and was, in the mean time, granted interlocutory injunctions to restrain such publication pending trial of the action. In April 1987 the three defendant newspapers, who had not been parties to the 1986 proceedings, published further material derived or taken verbatim from W's memoirs. The Attorney General obtained leave to bring proceedings against the defendants for criminal contempt of court. The judge directed that a preliminary issue of law be tried, namely whether a publication which was made in the knowledge of an outstanding injunction against another party and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof constituted a criminal contempt of court on the ground that it interfered with the process of justice in relation to that injunction. The judge held that the law of contempt did not apply where the only act complained of was not a breach of the express terms of the order and the alleged contemnor was neither party nor privy to any breach of the order by others. The Attorney General appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending, inter alia, that the defendants' publication could nevertheless amount to criminal contempt as being an act which interfered with the administration of justice. The Attorney General conceded that the strict liability rule defined in s 1^a of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 did not apply because the particular proceedings were not 'active' but contended that under s 6(c)^b of that Act, which provided that nothing in the Act restricted liability for contempt in respect of conduct 'intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice', a general or basic intent, which could include recklessness, was sufficient to give rise to liability for contempt. d

Held – The Attorney General's appeal would be allowed for the following reasons—

(1) It was well established that an act which interfered with the course of justice was capable of constituting a contempt of court. Furthermore, the court's power to commit for contempt where the conduct complained of was intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice was saved by s 6(c) of the 1981 Act, and accordingly, where the court had made orders to preserve the subject matter of an action pending trial, a third j

^a Section 1, so far as material, is set out at p 303 f, post

^b Section 6, so far as material, is set out at p 304 a, post

a party who knew of those orders but who nevertheless destroyed or seriously damaged that subject matter would be guilty of criminal contempt if in doing so he intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice (see p 299 b c, p 308 b c, p 311 c and p 313 h, post).

(2) Given the inherently perishable nature of confidential information and the irretrievable damage which publication would cause, the court had in July 1986, as was normal, decided that publication of the confidential information derived from W's memoirs ought to be restrained pending trial of the action and the defendants, although strangers to the action, had interfered with the administration of justice in publishing material taken or derived from W's memoirs when they knew that the court had made orders designed to protect the confidentiality of that material pending trial. Accordingly, the defendants' action in publishing could amount to a criminal contempt and the matter would therefore be remitted to the High Court to determine whether the defendants' conduct did in fact amount to contempt (see p 296 g to p 297 c, p 300 h to p 301 a, p 304 e to g j to p 305 a, p 307 a b, p 308 g h, p 310 d and p 313 f to j, post); Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (1848) 11 Beav 180, 181, X CC v A [1985] 1 All ER 53 and dictum of Lord Bridge in R v Moloney [1985] 1 All ER at 1037 considered.

d Per curiam. The mens rea required to establish an intention to impede or prejudice the administration of justice is a specific intent and not mere recklessness as to whether the administration of justice would be impeded or prejudiced (see p 304 b to d, p 310 e f and p 313 j, post).

e Per Sir John Donaldson MR and Lloyd LJ. It would be better if contempt were not classified into civil and criminal contempt but into (a) conduct involving a breach, or assisting in the breach, of a court order and (b) any other conduct involving an interference with the due administration of justice. The first category is a special form of the latter, such interference being a characteristic common to all contempts, and what distinguishes the two categories is that, in general, conduct in the first category is treated as a matter for the parties to raise by complaint to the court, whereas other forms of contempt are generally considered to be a matter for the Attorney General to raise as the guardian of the public interest in the due administration of justice (see p 294 f to h and p 306 c d, post).

Motion

By a notice of motion dated 11 May 1987 the Attorney General sought an order that the defendants, Newspaper Publishing plc (the publishers of the Independent), Andreas Whittam Smith (the editor of the Independent), Evening Standard Co Ltd (the publishers of the London Evening Standard), John Leese (the editor of the London Evening Standard), the London Daily News Ltd (the publishers of the London Daily News) and

- a Magnus Linklater (the editor of the London Daily News), be found in contempt of court on the grounds that the conduct of the respondents in publishing various articles in their respective newspapers was intended or calculated to impede obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice in that they were severally intended or calculated and in any event likely to thwart orders of the Court of Appeal made on 25 July 1986 in the High Court in proceedings brought by the Attorney General against the Observer Ltd and others and by the applicant against Guardian Newspapers Ltd. By a consent order dated
- b 11 May 1987 a preliminary issue of law was directed to be tried, namely whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding injunction against another party and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof, constituted a criminal contempt of court on the footing that it assaulted or interfered with the process of justice in relation to that injunction. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- d 2 June. The following judgment was delivered.

SIR NICOLAS BROWNE-WILKINSON V-C. This is a motion brought by the Attorney General alleging that the proprietors and editors of three newspapers, the Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News, have committed

e contempts of court. The alleged contempts lie in the publication on 27 April 1987 of certain articles referring to the memoirs of Peter Maurice Wright and to information contained in such memoirs. The actual point for decision, although difficult and important, is a narrow one. But I must first explain the background.

- f Mr Wright was for many years a member of the British security service, holding senior positions with access to highly classified and sensitive information. He retired in 1976 and went to live in Tasmania. He considered that the security services had been penetrated by foreign agents and called for an inquiry. When no inquiry was held, he decided to publish his memoirs, disclosing facts supporting not only the allegation of penetration of the security services by foreign agents but also making other allegations of unlawful conduct by members of the security services.

- g In 1985 it was proposed to publish Mr Wright's memoirs in Australia. On discovering the proposed publication the Attorney General took proceedings in the Supreme Court of New South Wales against Mr Wright and the publishers claiming an injunction restraining publication on the grounds that the publication would be a breach of the duty of confidentiality owed to the Crown as Mr Wright's former employers. The defendants in the Australian proceedings gave undertakings pending trial not to disclose information obtained by Mr Wright as an officer of the British security service.

- h On 22 and 23 June 1986 (before the trial of the Australian proceedings) the Observer and the Guardian newspapers published articles outlining a number of the allegations which were said to be contained in the Wright memoirs. The Attorney General then applied in the High Court in England for injunctions against the Observer and the Guardian restraining them from making any publication. His claim was again based on the principle that the information in the memoirs is confidential. Ex parte injunctions
- i were granted. The matter then came before Millett J inter partes. On 11 July 1986 Millett J granted interlocutory injunctions against the Guardian and the Observer until trial or further order (the 1986 injunctions). The proceedings before me relate to the 1986 injunctions, which, so far as relevant, read as follows:

'The defendants and each of them be restrained until trial or further order from doing whether by himself or itself or by his or its servants or agents or any of them or otherwise howsoever the following acts or any of them that is to say: 1. Disclosing or publishing or causing or permitting to be disclosed or published to any person any information obtained by Peter Maurice Wright in his capacity as a member of the British Security Service and which they know or have reasonable grounds to believe to have come or been obtained whether directly or indirectly from the said Peter Maurice Wright. 2. Attributing in any disclosure or publication made by them to any person any information concerning the British Security Service to the said Peter Maurice Wright whether by name or otherwise.'

There were two provisos: the first permitted quotation of attributions to Mr Wright contained in works or broadcasts previously published; the second provided that disclosure of any information to be disclosed in the Supreme Court of New South Wales would not be a breach of the order.

The Guardian and the Observer appealed to the Court of Appeal. Millett J's decision was upheld save that a further proviso permitting the reporting of proceedings in the United Kingdom Parliament and law courts was added (see A-G Observer Ltd (1986) 136 NLJ 799). The Court of Appeal refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords but leave was subsequently granted by the House of Lords. That appeal is due to be heard before the end of July of this year.

The reasons given by both Millett J and the Court of Appeal for their decision to grant the 1986 injunctions were broadly the same. Mr Wright as a member of the security services owed the highest duty of confidentiality to the Crown, which duty would be breached by his publication of any memoir based on his experience in the service. It is essential for the proper working of the security service that all its dealings are totally confidential and are seen to be such: if former members are free to publish memoirs of their experiences, the security service would not appear to be leakproof which would gravely harm its relations with the security services of other friendly powers. In addition, although the memoirs were based on matters now more than ten years old, the memoirs were said to contain information which was still extremely sensitive and might harm the operations of the British security service if disclosed. These facts, on which the decisions were based, were all derived from affidavits sworn by Sir Robert Armstrong which, as the Court of Appeal emphasised, were uncontroverted in the evidence before the court. The court held that on an interlocutory application the public interest in preserving the confidentiality of the security service outweighed the public interest relied on by the Guardian and the Observer, namely the general freedom of newspapers to publish news and the need to disclose the allegations of unlawful conduct by the security services. Both courts were influenced, amongst other things, by the fact that the unlawful conduct alleged took place so long ago and by the lack of evidence that there was any overwhelming need to publish the allegations immediately instead of waiting until after the hearing of the action. This is an inadequate précis of the very full judgments delivered; but it is sufficient for present purposes.

The Australian case was tried by Powell J at the end of 1986. It lasted for many weeks. Sir Robert Armstrong was cross-examined. Both that cross-examination and the whole of the proceedings received exceptionally detailed reporting in the media, not only in this country but worldwide. Powell J gave judgment on 13 March 1987 dismissing the Attorney General's claim in Australia for injunctions against the publication of Mr Wright's memoirs. The judgment runs to some 286 pages but it is unnecessary to refer to it save to mention that Powell J found the evidence given by Sir Robert Armstrong in some respects unsatisfactory and unreliable.

The Attorney General has appealed in the Australian courts against the decision of Powell J. That appeal is due to be heard in July of this year. The defendants in Australia have given undertakings pending the hearing of the appeal not to publish Mr Wright's memoirs.

This was the position which obtained when, on 27 April 1987, the Independent published the articles complained of. The articles took up the whole of the front page of the Independent. They stated that the newspaper had received a copy of the manuscript

a of Mr Wright's memoirs and then published the gist of a number of allegations contained in the book expressly ascribing them to Mr Wright. The articles contained passages purporting to be verbatim quotations from the memoirs. In addition they contained details of the facts alleged in the Wright memoirs in support of the allegations made by Mr Wright that the security services had been guilty of unlawful conduct. On the same day the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News quoted those stories from the Independent although in considerably less detail. Although not in terms admitted, it appears that the Independent and the other two newspapers had done exactly what the Guardian and the Observer were restrained from doing by the 1986 injunctions.

b The Attorney General's response was to make an immediate application to the Queen's Bench Divisional Court for leave to move against the three newspapers for contempt of court. Leave was granted on 29 April. Although the Attorney General was anxious to have the application determined speedily (as was the London Daily News) the Independent wished to conduct considerable research before putting in evidence in answer; no direction for speedy trial was made.

c On the same day that leave was granted to bring the contempt proceedings, 29 April, the Guardian and the Observer gave notice of motion in the Chancery Division to discharge or vary the 1986 injunctions. The motion came before me on 7 May 1987. There were two grounds for the application: the first relied on what had transpired in the Australian courts and in particular on the evidence given by Sir Robert Armstrong under cross-examination; the second relied on the publication of the articles in the three newspapers which had been followed by a large number of other reports (both here and abroad) revealing the allegations made and ascribing them to Mr Wright. This second ground gave rise to the formidable argument: how can it be right to continue an injunction which prevents only the Guardian and the Observer from publishing matters which the rest of the world are freely publishing?

e It seemed to me that the validity of the second ground on which the Guardian and the Observer were relying largely depended on whether or not the publications by other papers were contempts of court and could therefore be punished or restrained. Doubts had arisen whether the contempt proceedings were properly brought in the Queen's Bench Division since they relate to an order made in the Chancery Division. I therefore suggested (and I must take full responsibility for the suggestion if it is thought to be mistaken) that the contempt proceedings against the three newspapers should be brought before me by a fresh notice of motion so that I could first determine the preliminary point of law whether the publication could be a contempt of court, given that the three newspapers (as opposed to the Guardian and the Observer) were not subject to any order restraining them from publishing the material. This suggestion was adopted and I directed a preliminary point of law in these terms:

f 'Whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding Injunction against another party and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof, constitutes a criminal contempt of Court upon the footing that it assaults or interferes with the process of Justice in relation to the said Injunction.'

h This is my judgment on that preliminary point of law.

i In outline the parties submissions are as follows. Counsel for the Attorney General accepts that the publication by the three newspapers did not constitute a breach of the 1986 injunctions since the publication was not made by the only persons restrained by the 1986 order but independently by the three newspapers. However, says counsel, there are two types of contempt. The first is civil contempt which consists of a breach by a party to proceedings of an order made against him: that is not the present case. The second type is a criminal contempt which consists of conduct which frustrates or impedes the due administration of justice: that, says counsel, is the present case. The conduct of the three newspapers in publishing the very material publication of which, to the knowledge of the newspapers, Millett J and the Court of Appeal have held to be contrary to the public interest constitutes a criminal contempt in that it thwarts and frustrates the 1986 injunctions. They were made for the purpose of preserving the right of the Crown to preserve the confidentiality of the matters contained in Mr Wright's memoirs. If those memoirs or excerpts therefrom are published by others, that very confidentiality has gone, robbing the 1986 injunctions of their utility and indeed destroying the very subject matter of the action, ie the confidentiality of the information. What is more, in frustrating an interlocutory order by publication, the three newspapers have deprived or impaired the Crown's right to a trial on the merits of the main hearing of the action against the Guardian and the Observer: the sole, or main, purpose of such hearing would be to obtain a permanent injunction so as to preserve the secrecy of the information relating to security services which, in the public interest, must remain confidential. So runs the argument for the Crown.

On the other side, the three newspapers contend that the Attorney General is seeking to widen the law of criminal contempt and that any extension of the criminal law is nowadays a matter for Parliament, not the judges. To hold that a third party who is not subject to the order is bound to give effect to its purpose would run contrary to the whole basis of English law: the court decides the issues between the parties before it and makes orders which bind the parties only. The court acts in personam not in rem. To hold the three newspapers guilty of contempt by breaking the spirit, but not the letter, of the 1986 injunctions would offend all the basic principles of natural justice: they would be held guilty of a crime in treating as not applicable to them an order not directed to them, made by a court which had not given them an opportunity to be heard and which made its order in ignorance of the facts and circumstances applicable to the three newspapers. Moreover, once the Crown accepts that there is no breach of the 1986 injunctions, what constitutes contempt by acting contrary to the purpose or spirit of that order becomes wholly uncertain.

Before dealing with these arguments, there are two fundamental factors which have to be borne in mind. First, this case arises out of facts affecting national security and state secrets which have attracted massive attention from the media. But that background must not obscure the fact that the only right asserted by the Crown before Millett J and the Court of Appeal and the only right protected by the 1986 injunctions is a private right of action under the civil law, viz the right of an employer to restrain a former employee from disclosing confidential information. Of necessity, the public interest in preserving national security was a major factor in assessing the degree of confidentiality required of a member of the security service and in considering the balance of convenience. But the basic right protected by the 1986 injunctions is exactly the same as the right of a manufacturer to stop an employee disclosing trade secrets or of one spouse to restrain the other from revealing 'pillow-talk'. The court in granting the 1986 injunctions was not enforcing any public right referable to the preservation of official secrets or the public welfare.

The second factor flows from the first. Since the 1986 injunctions are protecting a private, not a public, right of the Crown, the question I have to determine will affect many other types of case involving private litigants in which the Crown is not a party. In such cases no question of national interest or national security will apply. It is therefore important not to allow the decision in this case to be overborne by the desire to preserve state secrets. If the Attorney General is right in the principle he asserts in this case it will be applicable in many other cases as between private individuals where no question of security arises. It is important not to distort the general law of contempt so as to make it applicable in such cases in a manner which would be capricious, unfair or unworkable.

As I have said, the three newspapers allege that the Attorney General is extending the law of contempt. Counsel for the Attorney General, whilst denying that he is seeking any extension of the law, accepts that I am being asked to 'elucidate' the application of a general principle to a new state of facts. Either way, I must first consider how the law presently stands.

The basic principles of criminal contempt are not in dispute. It has often been said that contempt of court is an unhappy phrase, suggesting as it does that a judge is a concerned to protect his personal or judicial dignity. That is far from the case. One of the foundations of a free society is that there should be courts to which all can have access, in which the justice dispensed is impartial and whose orders are obeyed. The law of contempt is the means by which these vital requirements are preserved. Thus to seek to prevent or dissuade a litigant or witness from coming to court is a criminal contempt. So is any interference with the impartiality of the judge or jury. So is any interference with the course of the trial. Disobedience to a court order by a party to the proceedings against whom the order has been made is a civil contempt. I accept fully that the public interest in ensuring fair and effective justice is very great. However I am not prepared to go as far as counsel for the Attorney General submitted in holding that a judge should prefer that public interest to any other public interest with which it may come in conflict: there are many cases where such preference has not been given, for example, in allowing the public interest in preserving the confidentiality of certain documents to outweigh the requirements of justice that they should be available as evidence in a trial.

b The English authorities demonstrate that hitherto actions by a third party which interfere with a court order have only been held to constitute a criminal contempt of court if both (a) the action by the third party complained of constituted a breach of the express terms of the order and (b) the third party has aided and abetted or been privy or party to a breach of the order by the person enjoined by the order. In this judgment I will refer to the plaintiff in the proceedings as 'A', the defendant in the proceedings who is enjoined from doing the act complained of as 'B' and the third party who is not a defendant and is not enjoined by the express terms of the order from doing the act as 'C'.

d The authorities establish that if B breaches the order he is guilty of a civil contempt which the court will punish in proceedings brought by A: see Seaward v Paterson [1897] 1 Ch 545, [1895-9] All ER Rep 1127. If C aids and abets B to do the act which B is enjoined from doing, he does not commit a breach of the order. In Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 1) (1848) 11 Beav 180, 50 ER 785 the agent of Lord Mornington, who cut down the trees which Lord Mornington was forbidden to fell, was held not guilty of the civil contempt of disobedience of the order against Lord Mornington. However, one month later the agent was held liable in criminal contempt in knowingly aiding and abetting a breach of the order (see Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 2) 11 Beav 181, 50 ER 786). Lord Langdale MR said that the agent 'in the position in which he was, and knowing the duty of the Earl of Mornington, ought to have taken care not to do any acts, in violation of the order of the Court' (see 11 Beav 181 at 183, 50 ER 786 at 787).

f The same conclusion was reached in Seaward v Paterson. The rationale behind holding C liable for criminal contempt was set out by Lindley LJ in Seaward v Paterson [1897] 1 Ch 545 at 554, [1895-9] All ER 1127 at 1130:

g 'Now, let us consider what jurisdiction the Court has to make an order against [C]. There is no injunction against him—he is no more bound by the injunction granted against [B] than any other member of the public. He is bound, like other members of the public, not to interfere with, and not to obstruct, the course of justice; and the case, if any, made against him must be this—not that he has technically infringed the injunction, which was not granted against him in any sense of the word, but that he has been aiding and abetting others in setting the Court at defiance, and deliberately treating the order of the Court as unworthy of notice. If he has so conducted himself, it is perfectly idle to say that there is no jurisdiction to attach him for contempt as distinguished from a breach of the injunction, which has a technical meaning . . . It has always been familiar doctrine . . . that the orders of the Court ought to be obeyed, and could not be set at naught and violated by any member of the public, either by interfering with the officers of the Court, or by assisting those who were bound by its orders.'

i Counsel for the Attorney General submits that, although the actual decision does not cover the present case, the rationale extends to a case such as the present where C has not aided and abetted B and there has been no breach of the express terms of the order. It is to be noted that in those two cases (and indeed in all the other cases cited to me) although C is said to be in criminal contempt, the proceedings to punish such criminal contempt have been brought by A (the plaintiff in the main proceedings) and not by the Attorney General. a

Counsel for the Attorney General also relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556, [1982] QB 558. In that case the Court of Appeal considered the impact of a Mareva injunction on banks holding the assets of the defendant against whom the order was made. In particular, it considered the position where the bank, but not the defendant who was enjoined, had been served with the order. It was argued that in such a case the bank could not be guilty of contempt of court by disposing of the defendant's assets under its control since the defendant could not himself be in contempt: the bank could not be aiding and abetting someone who was not himself in contempt. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument. Lord Denning MR founded his decision that the bank could be in contempt on the grounds that a Mareva order operated in rem in the same way as an Admiralty order arresting a ship (see [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 562, [1982] QB 558 at 573). With respect, I am unable to accept this as being correct. The Court of Appeal in an earlier case, Cretanor Maritime Co Ltd v Irish Marine Management Ltd [1978] 3 All ER 164, [1978] 1 WLR 966 (which was not cited in Z Ltd v A), expressly held that a Mareva injunction does not operate in rem but in personam (see [1978] 3 All ER 164 at 170, 172, [1978] 1 WLR 966 at 974, 976 per Buckley LJ). b

Reverting to Z Ltd v A, Eveleigh LJ did not adopt the same reasoning as Lord Denning MR. He said [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 566–567, [1982] 1 QB 558 at 578:

‘I think that the following propositions may be stated as to the consequences which ensue when there are acts or omissions which are contrary to the terms of an injunction. (1) The person against whom the order is made will be liable for contempt of court if he acts in breach of the order after having notice of it. (2) A third party will also be liable if he knowingly assists in the breach, that is to say if knowing the terms of the injunction he wilfully assists the person to whom it was directed to disobey it. This will be so whether or not the person enjoined has had notice of the injunction . . . I will give my reasons for the second proposition and take first the question of prior notice to the defendant. It was argued that the liability of a third party arose because he was treated as aiding and abetting the defendant (ie he was an accessory) and as the defendant could himself not be in breach unless he had notice it followed that there was no offence to which the third party could be an accessory. In my opinion this argument misunderstands the true nature of the liability of the third party. He is liable for contempt of court committed by himself. It is true that his conduct may very often be seen as possessing a dual character of contempt of court by himself and aiding and abetting the contempt by another, but the conduct will always amount to contempt of court by himself. It will be conduct which knowingly interferes with the administration of justice by causing the order of the court to be thwarted.’ e

As those words made clear, Eveleigh LJ was considering a case where the act of C (the bank) did constitute a breach of the order. Although B (the defendant) could not be liable for contempt until he had notice of the order, the order took immediate effect. Therefore if a bank in handling B's money disposes of it the bank is a party to a breach of the precise terms of the order. Z Ltd v A does show that an act by C can be a criminal contempt even if, in terms of strict criminal law, C is not ‘aiding and abetting’ B to commit the breach. But it is no authority for the proposition that C can be liable for doing or being party to any act which does not constitute a breach of the precise terms of the order. h

Counsel for the Attorney General also relied on a recent decision of Henry J in UK Nirex Ltd v Barton (1986) Times, 14 October, in which, at the end of a judgment in which he varied two injunctions granted against named defendants in a representative capacity so as to exclude such representative capacity, he said that if anyone were knowingly to do a the acts which the named defendants were enjoined from doing that would prima facie be a wrongful interference with the administration of justice and would be a contempt. For this proposition he relied on Z Ltd v A. Although this directly supports counsel's main submissions, those remarks were obiter dicta and, so far as the judgment shows, were made without much argument being directed to the point.

b Certain Canadian authorities were referred to in argument. The guidance they offer is limited and confused. In English law an order should only restrain the defendant (B) from doing an act; it should not be framed so as to enjoin any person who is not a party: see Marengo v Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd [1948] 1 All ER 406. In Canada the practice is apparently different. In Bassel's Lunch Ltd v Kick (No 1) [1936] OR 445 an order had been made restraining named defendants 'and any one assisting or aiding them' from picketing. It was held by the Court of Appeal of Ontario that persons not parties to the proceedings who had picketed were in contempt: it was said, in reliance on Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 2) that anyone who knows of an injunction forbidding a person doing a specified act and who himself acts in contravention thereof can be committed for contempt in intermeddling. However in Bassel's Lunch Ltd v Kick (No 2) [1937] 1 DLR 235 a differently constituted Court of Appeal of Ontario apparently reached a different conclusion in relation to alleged contempt by different third parties in acting contrary to the same order. They said (at 235-236):

d 'An injunction restraining A from doing some act is not an injunction restraining B or C from doing it. In many instances, also, the fact that B or C do the act prohibited to A, does not amount to any assisting or aiding of A by B or C; the latter may be acting quite independently of A. On the other hand it is sophistry to argue that, because A refrains from doing the act, therefore B or C's doing it in his place is not assisting or aiding him. Where B and C act not independently but because of their interest in A, it may well be held that they are assisting or aiding him; at least they are intermeddling and so may be found guilty . . .'

e This later decision, accepting as it does that the third party may not be liable for contempt even though his actions thwart the effect of the order, is strongly against the submissions of counsel for the Attorney General.

f In Re Tilco Plastics Ltd v Skurjat (1966) 57 DLR (2d) 596 an order had been made restraining the defendants 'or person or persons having notice of this Order' from industrial picketing. It was held that persons other than the defendants who with knowledge of the order picketed were in contempt of court. The earlier decisions of the Ontario Court of Appeal were not cited. The judge sitting in the Ontario High Court at first instance expressly said (at 619): 'Any person who is aware of the substance or nature of a Court order cannot flout it simply because he is not expressly named in that order.' This again strongly supports the argument of counsel for the Attorney General. That decision was followed, on very similar facts, in Catkey Construction Ltd v Moran (1969) 8 DLR (3d) 413. The state of the authorities under the law of Canada seems to be confused. However one thing is clear: in every case the act by the third party which was held to be a contempt constituted a breach of the precise terms of the order, albeit the order was made in a form which could not properly be made under English law.

h Finally I should notice an Irish case, Smith-Barry v Dawson (1891) 27 LR Ir 558. The plaintiff in that case was entitled to a right of market. He had obtained an order against the defendants restraining them from disturbing it. Certain persons (not the defendants) had with knowledge of the order done acts which, if done by the defendants, would have been breaches of the order. They were held to be in contempt of court. Chatterton V-C based his decision on earlier Irish authorities: none of the English authorities were cited. There was no appearance or argument for those against who committal was sought. I do not find this a compelling authority.

j In my judgment the authorities show the present state of the law to be as follows. (a) In no case (apart from the Irish case) has a third party, C, been held to be in contempt of an order restraining a named person, B, from doing an act unless C has been privy or party to the doing of an act which is a breach of precise terms of the order. (b) Under English law an injunction can only properly restrain a party to the proceedings from doing an act, although it may restrain him from doing the act 'by himself, his servant or agent'. (c) As a result of (a) and (b) above, there is no English case in which a third party, C, has been held in contempt for doing any act which does not constitute a breach by the defendant enjoined, B, of the precise terms of the order. (d) The plaintiff in the proceedings, A, can apply for the committal of C even though the act of C is a criminal contempt. (e) The principle underlying the law that C is in criminal contempt if he is party to a breach of the order is that the court will not allow its order to be knowingly flouted, thwarted or frustrated by any person even though he be a stranger to the action.

The first four of those propositions support the three newspapers in their defence to these proceedings. They show that the law has never hitherto extended to cover a case such as this where the three newspapers have not aided or abetted the Guardian and the Observer to breach the 1986 injunctions: there has been no breach of the 1986 injunctions since the only parties enjoined, the Guardian and the Observer, have done nothing. On the other hand, the final proposition ((e) above) supports the Attorney General, since the underlying principle could be held to cover the present case: the publication by the three newspapers, with knowledge of the 1986 injunctions, may well render those injunctions valueless and thwart the establishment of the Crown's rights against the Guardian and the Observer.

On this state of the authorities, it seems to me that the Attorney General is seeking to widen the application of the law of criminal contempt, albeit in accordance with established principle. The three newspapers submit that it is for Parliament, not the courts, to make any extension to the law of contempt since it is a change in the criminal law. I do not accept this contention. Punishment for contempt of court is the means by which the judges preserve the judicial process. It is essentially a matter on which the judges have to decide, in accordance with principle, whether or not certain types of action (which may well change over the years) are consistent with the maintenance of a fair and proper judicial process. However, I do accept that, in deciding whether to apply the law of contempt in new circumstances, the courts should tread warily bearing in mind that the law of contempt of court is a restriction on freedom of action which a citizen would otherwise enjoy and a breach of the law may lead to the loss of his liberty.

The strength of the argument of counsel for the Attorney General lies primarily in the facts of this case. Publication of the memoirs has been held by the courts in reasoned judgments to be contrary to national security: the 1986 injunctions were made to protect the public interest by preserving national security. Yet the three newspapers have, knowing of that decision, chosen to do what the court has held to be contrary to the public interest and published what was secret. How is the public interest to be protected if that is not a contempt of court? Even if, as is apparently the case, some people do not accept the decision of the court that the publication of the Wright memoirs would jeopardise national security, it is easy to postulate facts where the risks would be unarguable: for example if newspapers were publishing highly secret information as to the disposition of the Polaris submarines. It is almost incontrovertible that in such a case there ought to be a legal sanction against publication. But the question I have to decide is whether, due to the chance that there is in existence an order of the court preventing the Guardian and the Observer from publishing, the appropriate sanction is contempt of court.

I have reached the conclusion that it is not. So to hold would be to subvert the basic principles of our civil law and introduce into it uncertainty and unfairness.

English civil courts act in personam, that is to say they adjudicate on disputes between the parties to an action and make orders against those parties only. In certain instances where the court has assumed the care and administration of a person or property, the court does make orders which, in one sense, operate in rem. Any interference with the person or the property being administered constitutes a contempt of court: for example, a acts in relation to a ward of court, a ship subject to attachment or property of which the court has appointed a receiver. But in other cases so far as I am aware injunctions can only properly be made to restrain a defendant to the proceedings (as opposed to a third party) from doing certain acts: see Marengo v Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd [1948] 1 All ER 406 and X CC v A [1985] 1 All ER 53, [1984] 1 WLR 1422. Even a declaration made by a court is not binding on persons who are not parties to the suit. In my judgment this is the basis of the present state of the law that, for a third party, C, to be

b liable for contempt, the acts complained of must constitute a breach of the actual terms of the order. The Attorney General's contention, if correct, strikes at the root of this basic principle. An order of the court would, in effect, operate in rem, ie be enforceable against everyone who had notice of it. The practical implications of this in ordinary civil litigation would be far reaching and in many cases unjust. I will give a number of examples.

c Say an employer obtained an injunction against an employee restraining that employee from disclosing or using certain trade secrets. All other employees of that employer who knew of the order would be at risk of committal for contempt of court if they used or disclosed information derived from their employment: it is notoriously difficult to distinguish between information which is a true trade secret (and therefore protected) and other information which an employee is free to use on his own account. It would

d follow that, by getting an order against one employee, the employer would have imposed an effective muzzle on all his employees and that muzzle might well give protection to information that the employer was not entitled to protect.

Again, take the case of a newspaper, B, publishing an article defamatory of A. A obtains an injunction against B, B lacking the information necessary to justify the libel. Such order would expose any other newspaper which published the libel to proceedings

e for contempt of court. If newspaper C did have the information necessary to justify the libel and wished to justify, the law of contempt would operate indirectly so as to prevent publication by C in circumstances in which A could not have obtained an injunction directly against C: no injunction can be granted to restrain publication of a libel which the defendant intends to justify. Faced with this example, counsel for the Attorney General suggested that C could apply to the court for leave to publish. This would be

f a novel type of application. But, even assuming that some procedure could be found which enabled C to make it, the need for C to make such application is quite inconsistent with the normal concepts of freedom of the press. Newspapers are free to publish unless restrained by an order: their right hitherto, has not depended on obtaining prior leave of the court. Nor in my judgment should such leave be required.

g Again, say there was an industrial dispute and the employer obtained injunctions restraining named employees from picketing. Is that order to be enforceable by committal against all employees and others who have notice of the order thereby preventing anyone from picketing? That would be a grave inroad on private freedom and a power readily open to abuse.

h In a more commercial sphere, take the case of a take-over battle in which shareholder A is trying to maintain or secure a majority shareholding. A obtains an order restraining shareholder B from disposing of his shares to X, the rival bidder. Are all other shareholders to be at risk of committal for contempt if they sell their shares to X, whether or not A has any legal right to restrain them from selling? Yet the sale by other shareholders will thwart and frustrate the purpose of the injunction against B, ie to secure and maintain the majority shareholding for A.

j Finally, take the case of a householder, A, whose house enjoys a view of certain trees on adjoining land belonging to B. A obtains an injunction restraining B from cutting down the trees because of some agreement between A and B. Will it be contempt of court if C (in exercise of some right which he has against B) cuts down the trees otherwise than in collusion with B? Yet the felling of the trees by C will wholly frustrate the effect of the order against B.

These instances, which are not merely fanciful, to my mind show that the principle contended for by the Attorney General cannot be right.

There are other equally serious objections. Counsel for the Attorney General himself accepted that, in the case of some orders against B, it would not be a contempt for C to do the act which B is prohibited from doing. He instanced the case of an injunction granted in a matrimonial dispute which restrained the husband, B, from assaulting the wife, A: counsel accepts that if C assaults A he would not be in contempt of court. The reason, says counsel, is that the order restraining B is plainly personal to B. But the borderline between such 'plainly personal' orders and other orders must be very uncertain. All orders are expressed as being personal. Is an order restraining an act by B in breach of his contract with A personal? If so, can C safely do an act even if the result of such act will be to frustrate the order? For example, in the case I have given of the felling of the trees will it not be a contempt of court by C to fell the trees because A's right to prevent B from felling the trees lay in the contract between A and B? In my judgment, the distinction between personal and other orders is unworkable. It would lead to a degree of uncertainty whether or not an act was a contempt which is incompatible with the imposition of a criminal sanction.

The same vice of uncertainty could arise in a different way. Under the present law, committal for contempt of court is attended by very elaborate procedural safeguards. The order has to be personally served and in some cases carries a penal indorsement. When the proceedings are heard, great care is taken to ensure that the acts alleged do in fact constitute a breach of the express terms of the order: if they do not, then there is no contempt. Yet, if the Attorney General's contention is correct, a third party will enjoy none of those protections. In particular the alleged contempt will consist of the doing of some act inconsistent, not with the terms but with the purpose of the order. In the present case, it is clear what was the purpose of the 1986 injunctions. But, in most cases it would be far from clear. In my judgment it would be unjust to expose third parties to criminal sanctions for doing an act when it is not clear in advance whether or not the doing of that act is or is not lawful.

If, as I think, the effect of the Attorney General's contention would be to make enforceable against third parties an order made in their absence, such a result offends the basic principles of natural justice. If such an order were to be made by an inferior court or administrative body, it would be quashed by the High Court. This is again not merely a matter of principle but of substance. On an application by A for an interlocutory injunction against B, the judge has to consider the usual well-known factors, viz has A an arguable claim and B an arguable defence; will any damages payable by B be an adequate remedy to A and has B the means to pay such damages; will A's cross-undertaking in damages compensate B for any loss sustained by B if the injunction is not granted at the trial; what is the balance of convenience as between A and B?

On the making of the interlocutory order restraining B (which C is to be held to have contemptuously thwarted) C's circumstances will not have been known to, or considered by, the judge. C may have a defence where B had none. Damages may be an adequate remedy to A and C may be able to pay them but B not. Most importantly, the giving by A to B of the cross-undertaking in damages is a necessary precondition to the grant of any interlocutory injunction. But A will have given no such cross undertaking to C and C will have no recourse if, for fear of committing a contempt, he has refrained from taking a particular course of action.

For all these reasons, in my judgment, the law of contempt should not be extended, or held to apply, to a case where the only act alleged against the contemnor is the doing of an act which is not a breach of the express terms of the order and where the alleged contemnor has not been a party or privy to a breach of the order by others. I therefore answer the preliminary question No.

On the facts of this case (which have not been fully investigated before me) I reach the conclusion with some concern. There ought to be some sanction against the publication a of matters which prejudice national security and the decision as to what does prejudice national security should not be left to the individual judgment of the editors of individual newspapers. I had assumed that the Official Secrets Acts 1911 to 1939 provided the necessary sanction. If it does not, then it is for Parliament, if it thinks fit, to provide the necessary sanction by providing a public law remedy linked directly to the protection of public rights. Private rights should not be bolstered by a distortion of the law of contempt in an attempt to produce a judge-made public law protecting official secrets.

Appeal

The Attorney General appealed to the Court of Appeal.

c John Laws and Philip Havers for the Attorney General.
Christopher S C S Clarke QC and Adrienne Page for the Independent and its editor.
John Mathew QC and Jonathan Caplan for the London Evening Standard and its editor.
Charles Gray QC and David Pannick for the London Daily News and its editor.

d At the conclusion of argument on 15 July Sir John Donaldson MR made the following statement.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR. We propose to give full judgments at a later date but we are all aware that the public may have some difficulty in understanding what are the issues in this appeal, so let me explain.

e In June 1986 the government sought and was granted orders forbidding the Guardian and the Observer newspapers from publishing information derived from or attributed to Mr Wright concerning the British security service. They were not final orders. They were intended to last until the trial of the action unless earlier revoked on the application of the Guardian or the Observer. Those newspapers have in fact made such application, and it will be considered in the near future by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C.

f In April 1987 the Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News published information said to have been derived from Mr Wright. The Attorney General, acting in his official capacity as the person responsible for ensuring that there is no interference with the administration of justice in this country and not as a member of the government, complained that these publications constituted a contempt of court. The newspapers replied that the court orders did not require them to refrain from publication: they only required the Guardian and the Observer to do so.

g The matter came before the Vice-Chancellor. All concerned thought at the time, although with the benefit of hindsight possibly mistakenly, that the most convenient course was not to inquire into the full facts surrounding these publications, but instead to consider whether the conduct of the newspapers could in any circumstances be held to be a contempt of court. The Vice-Chancellor held that it could not.

h The Attorney General appealed. Once again, he was not acting on behalf of the government. He was performing his duty to safeguard the administration of justice. This does not mean to say that he was right, but, believing as he did that there had been a serious contempt of court, he was doing no more than his duty in bringing it to the attention of the court. It is this appeal with which we have been concerned.

j Last weekend the Sunday Times published extracts from Mr Wright's book. Yesterday the book was published in the United States and some copies were imported in a blaze of publicity. These are not matters which should or can concern us at present. It is for the government to decide what it wishes to do about its action against the Guardian and the Observer. It is for the Guardian and the Observer to ask the Vice-Chancellor to expedite their applications to be released from the injunctions which bind them at present, if that is what they wish. It is for the Attorney General to decide whether to charge the Sunday Times with contempt of court.

Our concern is solely with the appeal from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. He held that the three newspapers could not be in contempt of court. In our judgment he was wrong. All three newspapers could indeed have been in contempt of court. So could the Sunday Times and any other newspaper which published information attributed to Mr Wright. We say 'could be' in contempt of court and not 'were' in contempt of court because none has as yet had an opportunity of putting forward a defence. We should also make it clear that if any publisher has been advised that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor gave them a licence to publish without committing a contempt of court his adviser has made an elementary error of law. In reversing the decision of the Vice-Chancellor we are not changing the law; we are declaring what it has always been. If, for example, the publication by the Sunday Times would otherwise have been a contempt of court, the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor did not make it anything else. a

The situation which has arisen is completely novel, but it could be repeated in quite different contexts. It is therefore important that we should give guidance on the relevant law. This concerns in particular the intentions of the person said to be in contempt of court. This is a complex problem. Since, subject to the views of the House of Lords, our judgments will determine the law which is to be applied not only in these cases but in any other similar cases, we wish to take time to consider our judgments and put them into writing. I should like to emphasise that the issues with which we are concerned do not depend in any way on the continuance of the government's claims against the Observer and the Guardian. They are of permanent importance. b

That said, the media need to know where they stand. The answer is that any publication of information derived from or attributed to Mr Wright could be a contempt of court. Whether it will in the event be held to be a contempt of court will depend on a number of factors on which we shall seek to give guidance in our judgment. However, no one can be held guilty of being in contempt of court unless and until they have been given an opportunity of putting forward their defence. None of these three newspapers has as yet had that opportunity, which must await a further hearing in the Chancery Division of the High Court. Meanwhile, all we can say is that interference with the course of justice is a very serious matter, and publishers will no doubt wish to consider their duty with care before they do anything which could have this result. c

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR. In this appeal the Attorney General seeks to reverse the answer given by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C to a preliminary question of law formulated in contempt proceedings brought by him against the respondents. I can well understand the attraction of formulating such a preliminary point, but, as so often happens, it can seem less obviously sensible at a later stage in the proceedings. Thus, in the present case, I personally do not think that the question as framed permits of any answer other than 'It all depends', which is not very helpful. However, all concerned know that the real issue is whether in the circumstances of this case, which are not substantially in dispute, the respondents could be guilty of contempt of court and the question can, if necessary, be rephrased to raise that issue (see Ismail v Polish Ocean Lines [1976] 1 All ER 902, [1976] QB 893). e

The circumstances being all important, I must now advert to the background facts, although they are well known to all. Mr Wright, who lives in Tasmania, was for many years a servant of the Crown and a member of the British security service. He retired on 31 January 1976. Rightly or wrongly he concluded that the activities of the service whilst he was a member had been unlawful and that this should be investigated and exposed. He therefore submitted a memorandum to the chairman of a select committee of the House of Commons. The result was, in his view, unsatisfactory and he decided to write and publish his memoirs in Australia. This came to the notice of the authorities in this country and in September 1985 the Attorney General began proceedings in the Supreme f

b So much has been said about state secrets that I must stress that the basis of the Attorney General's claim to be entitled to restrain publication was not that Mr Wright might be in breach of the Official Secrets Acts 1911 to 1939. It was that by the terms of his employment with the security service he had a duty of confidentiality which would be breached if he published his memoirs. Confidentiality, not official secrecy, was and still is the central issue.

c Now it is a fact that a major legal action takes time to prepare and justice cannot be done if it is ill-prepared. Meanwhile the court does not know which party is right and it must therefore try to preserve the rights of both parties until the trial. This is plain common sense and basic justice. How this is done depends very much on the nature of the rights being asserted, the ability of each party to compensate the other if it is held to be in the wrong and the background circumstances of the case. Sometimes the court can allow the defendant, pending the trial, to continue with the action which is said to be unlawful, because it is satisfied that if indeed it is ultimately so held, the complainant, who has had to put up with the continuance of the unlawful action, can be compensated by an award of damages. In others it will decide that the rights of both parties are better preserved by forbidding the continuance of the allegedly unlawful action because, for example, if the action is ultimately held to have been lawful and the defendant has suffered damage by the suspension of his rights pending the trial, the complainant can be made to compensate him by an award of damages. This is not to say that a citizen can dash along to the court and get an order limiting the defendant's freedom of action simply on the basis of his, possibly paranoid, assertion that he will succeed at the trial. Far from it. The courts, whilst carefully refraining from reaching even a tentative conclusion on who is right, still have to make certain that the complainant citizen has a case which is sufficiently plausible to be taken seriously.

e In a word, if there is a genuine dispute which cannot be resolved at once, the court must hold the ring until this can be done. In that waiting period when each party is preparing for the trial, it must give each side the benefit of any doubts, it must assume that either party may win and it must seek to preserve the rights of both parties. In other words, it must undertake a damage limitation exercise for the benefit of whomsoever it may ultimately concern.

f It is at this point that a special consideration arises when the dispute concerns information which is said to be confidential. If the parties are arguing about the ownership of a horse or a car, it may not matter who keeps the horse or car pending the trial. If, as things turn out, the court has given it to the wrong party, it can get it back and give it to the right party after the trial, together with damages to compensate for having been deprived of the horse or car for the time being. Not so with confidential information where, as here, one party says that it is his private property and the other says that he is entitled to publish it to the world. If, pending the trial, the court prohibits publication, the information can still be published after the trial if the defendant succeeds. But if, pending the trial, the court allows publication, there is no point in having a trial since the cloak of confidentiality can never be restored. Confidential information is like an ice cube. Give it to the party who undertakes to keep it in his refrigerator and you still have an ice cube by the time the matter comes to trial. Either party may then succeed in obtaining possession of the cube. Give it to the party who has no refrigerator or will not agree to keep it in one, and by the time of the trial you just have a pool of water which neither party wants. It is the inherently perishable nature of confidential information which gives rise to unique problems.

j All this is totally elementary. So elementary is it that Mr Wright and his Australian publishers readily undertook to the Australian courts that, pending the trial of the action, neither they nor anyone acting on their behalf would publish Mr Wright's memoirs. Metaphorically they would be kept in the refrigerator. Had they not given this undertaking, I do not doubt that the Australian court would have ordered them to refrain from publication. a

Some time during the next nine months, the Observer and the Guardian newspapers obtained some knowledge of the contents of Mr Wright's memoirs. Rightly or wrongly they came to the conclusion that even if this was confidential information which belonged to the security service, the allegations being made by Mr Wright were so serious and so plausible that the public interest required that every citizen should know about them. The newspapers may or may not have been right, but the English courts became involved when the Attorney General began an action to prevent them publishing information derived from or attributed to Mr Wright in his memoirs. This is, of course, a paraphrase of the relief which was sought, but it suffices for present purposes. b

What were the courts to do? They did not know whether the Attorney General was right or whether the newspapers were right. What they did know was that there was a very serious issue to be tried and that if they forbade publication pending the trial there would still be confidential information which could be published after the trial, but that if they did not forbid publication there would no longer be any confidential information and it would be pointless even to have a trial. It was the ice cube problem once again. So the courts forbade publication pending the trial. c

Unlike Mr Wright and the Australian publishers, the Guardian and the Observer did not accept the logic of this approach and resisted the Attorney General's applications both in the High Court and in the Court of Appeal. This was their right and I make no complaint. They also sought and obtained leave to appeal to the House of Lords. Again this was their right and again I make no complaint, although I do not understand why, having obtained leave to appeal to the House of Lords, they do not appear to have taken any very vigorous steps to have that appeal heard. But what is interesting, and highly relevant, is that in this court, and possibly also in the High Court, the newspapers complained that it was unjust that they should be singled out for an order forbidding further publication of what they had already published, when their competitors in and around Fleet Street were not being subjected to any such order. This, they said, was grossly unfair. It was a fair point. d

The Attorney General's answer was twofold. First, he said, no other newspaper had shown any inclination to publish this confidential information which, in his submission, was the private property of the state. He therefore had no grounds for obtaining similar orders against them. Second, he said, how could he be expected to seek an injunction against every newspaper, every radio and television station and every publisher of books and magazines who might obtain this information and take it into the heads to publish it. Again it was a fair point. e

My own view, which I expressed in my judgment, was that the newspapers' contention was based on a false premise. If the Guardian and the Observer were restrained from republishing this allegedly confidential information, other publishers were not free to do so. But I would be the first to admit that this was to some extent an instinctive reaction and the point was not very fully argued. I am, therefore, quite prepared to accept that I may have been wrong and think that I am in no way bound by my previous expression of opinion (see A-G v Observer Ltd (1986) 136 NLJ 799 (the Observer/Guardian case)). f

There matters rested until 27 April 1987. By that time the Australian courts had concluded the trial of the action in which Mr Wright and his publishers were defendants and had refused a final injunction against publication. That decision is currently under appeal, but the outcome of those proceedings, whilst possibly relevant to the continuation of the injunctions against the Observer and the Guardian, is quite irrelevant for the purposes of the current proceedings or this appeal. What happened on 27 April was that the Independent published extensive extracts and summaries from Mr Wright's book and was immediately followed by the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News, who appear to have been basing themselves on the Independent. The Independent itself claims to have received an unsolicited copy of Mr Wright's manuscript and, after using it, to have destroyed it. g a The Attorney General thereupon launched the present proceedings against the publishers and editors of the Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News, alleging that the publications to which I have referred were—

b 'intended or calculated to impede, obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice in that they were severally intended or calculated and in any event likely to thwart Orders of the Court of Appeal made on the 25th day of July 1986 in the High Court proceedings brought by the Applicants against The Observer Limited and Others (1986-A-2507) and by the Applicant against Guardian Newspapers Limited and Others (1986-A-2509)' and claiming that accordingly the defendants were in contempt of court and should be punished.

c As I have said, the matter came before Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C on a preliminary point of law. This was:

d 'Whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding Injunction against another party and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof, constitutes a criminal contempt of Court upon the footing that it assaults or interferes with the process of Justice in relation to the said Injunction.'

e In a judgment of quite outstanding clarity the Vice-Chancellor reviewed the reported authorities both in this country and in Canada and concluded that this question was to be answered in the negative and that to answer it otherwise would be to 'subvert the basic principles of our civil law and introduce into it uncertainty and unfairness'. However, on the facts of the instant case he expressed concern at the conclusion which he had reached, saying:

f 'There ought to be some sanction against the publication of matters which prejudice national security and the decision as to what does prejudice national security should not be left to the individual judgment of the editors of individual newspapers. I had assumed that the Official Secrets Acts 1911 to 1939 provided the necessary sanction. If it does not, then it is for Parliament, if it thinks fit, to provide the necessary sanction by providing a public law remedy linked directly to the protection of public rights. Private rights should not be bolstered by a distortion of the law of contempt in an attempt to produce a judge-made public law protecting official secrets.'

h Whilst I agree that there ought to be some sanction against the publication of matters which prejudice national security, I should like to re-emphasise with all the power at my command that this case is not primarily about national security or official secrets. It is about the right of private citizens and public authorities to seek and obtain the protection of the courts for confidential information which they claim to be their property. The national security element in the present dispute is peripheral and is no more than one factor which the court had to take into account when deciding whether or not to preserve the confidentiality of the Wright information pending the trial of the Observer/Guardian action. Legislation could well take care of national security as the Vice-Chancellor suggested, but that would leave large numbers of people who claim rights of confidentiality wholly unprotected. Obvious examples are disclosures, sometimes sensational and of great interest to newspapers and their readers, by the personal staff of the famous.

j Whilst I am loath to increase the length of this judgment, I do not think that I should do justice to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor if I attempted to summarise that part in which, having set out the facts and reviewed the authorities, he stated his essential reasoning and conclusions. It was in the following terms. [Sir John Donaldson MR then set out the passage at pp 285 j to 288 j of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor and continued:] a

The situation with which we are faced is novel in the sense that there is no reported decision which provides any direct guidance. It is therefore appropriate to start with the first principles of the law of contempt of court and indeed by distancing myself from that phrase itself. As the Lord President (Clyde) pointed out in Johnson v Grant 1923 SC 789 at 790: b

'The phrase "contempt of Court" does not in the least describe the true nature of the class of offence with which we are here concerned . . . The offence consists in interfering with the administration of the law; in impeding and perverting the course of justice . . . It is not the dignity of the Court which is offended—a petty and misleading view of the issues involved—it is the fundamental supremacy of the law which is challenged.' c

'It has been well said that the law of contempt is of ancient origin yet of fundamental contemporary importance. Contempt of court certainly has a long history—contemptus curiae is said to have been a recognised phrase in English law since the twelfth century, and, as will be evidenced by the rest of this book, the law continues to play a key role in protecting the administration of justice. Essentially a creature of common law, contempt has been and continues to be developed and adapted to meet changing challenges to the "supremacy of the law". One result of this continuing development and concern to protect the many facets of the administration of justice is that there are many forms of contempt. One commentator has described contempt as "the Proteus of the legal world assuming an almost infinite diversity of forms", but equally it can be said that contempt of court is as diverse as are the means of interfering with the due course of justice.' d

Despite its protean nature, contempt has been classified under two heads, namely 'civil contempt' and 'criminal contempt'. Whatever the value of this classification in earlier times, I venture to think that it now tends to mislead rather than assist, because the standard of proof is the same, namely the criminal standard, and there are now common rights of appeal. Of greater assistance is a reclassification as (a) conduct which involves a breach, or assisting in the breach, of a court order and (b) any other conduct which involves an interference with the due administration of justice, either in a particular case or more generally as a continuing process, the first category being a special form of the latter, such interference being a characteristic common to all contempts (see A-G v Leveller Magazine Ltd [1979] 1 All ER 745 at 749 [1979] AC 440 at 449 per Lord Diplock). What distinguishes the two categories is that in general conduct which involves a breach, or assisting in the breach, of a court order is treated as a matter for the parties to raise by complaint to the court, whereas other forms of contempt are in general considered to be a matter for the Attorney General to raise. In doing so he acts not as a government minister or legal adviser, but as the guardian of the public interest in the due administration of justice. There is a further, but less important, distinction in that in the case of a failure to comply with some court orders, for example those relating to procedural timetables, the appropriate reaction by the court is not punishment in the form of committal, attachment or a fine, but an order striking out all or part of a claim or refusing to entertain the whole or part of a defence. f

Although it happens to be the case that the conduct complained of here is said to impinge on the trial of an action in which the Attorney General, acting as a minister and on behalf of the Crown, is the plaintiff, he brings the present proceedings in a quite different capacity independently of the government of the day, namely in that which I have described as 'guardian of the public interest in the due administration of justice'. In j

- the light of the fact that there has been a change in the holder of the office of Attorney General during the course of the proceedings, it should perhaps also be pointed out that they are brought not by an individual but by 'the Attorney General'. Consistently with acting in this capacity, the Attorney General's complaint is not that the respondent newspapers and their editors have breached or assisted in the breach of the orders which he obtained in the Observer/Guardian action, but that the conduct complained of 'was intended or calculated to impede obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice'.
- b* This raises two issues. What is the conduct complained of? Can it be said to have been intended or calculated to impede obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice? The latter is clearly a question which cannot be answered in the abstract, but depends on the course which the administration of justice has taken and is intended by the court to take. It is for this reason, and this reason alone, that it is necessary to take account of the course which the Observer/Guardian action had pursued, including the orders made restraining the Guardian and the Observer, but no other newspapers, from publishing what I may describe as 'Wright material', i.e. information obtained by Mr Wright in his capacity as a member of the British security service and which was known or reasonably believed to have come or been obtained, whether directly or indirectly, from Mr Wright or any information concerning the British security service which was attributed to Mr Wright.

- d* The Observer/Guardian action began on 27 June 1986 with the grant by Macpherson J of ex parte injunctions addressed to the two defendant newspapers restraining publication of Wright material. The newspapers applied to have them set aside and this application was heard and determined by Millett J on 11 July 1986. For present purposes the variations which he made in the ex parte order are immaterial. What is material is the judge's reasons which were expressed in a judgment given in open court and were widely reported. It is therefore relevant to recall extracts of what he said:

- e* 'It has not been disputed before me that Mr Wright's proposed book contains information acquired by him as a member of the security service, and that the disclosure of such information would constitute a breach of the duty of confidentiality which he owes to the Crown. Nor has this been challenged by Mr Wright himself in the Australian proceedings. There, his defence is that the information which he seeks to disclose is (i) in the public domain and no longer confidential; and
- f* (ii) evidence of unlawful acts or serious misconduct on the part of members of the British security service which it is in the public interest should be published. In the application before me, these defences are repeated, but in support of a wider and more fundamental proposition. It is said that: "Where an interim injunction is sought to restrain publication by a newspaper of information which is of public importance and legitimate public concern, only the most exceptional circumstances based on cogent and compelling evidence will induce the courts to prevent publication. This is because of the fundamental importance of the right to free expression in a democratic society. It is of even greater importance where the party seeking to prevent expression is the state or its agents, and the nature of the information whose publication is sought to be suppressed concerns serious
- g* allegations of criminal misconduct and other gravely reprehensible behaviour by agents of the state." Prior restraint of publication is a serious interference with the freedom of the press and the important constitutional right to freedom of speech. Those freedoms, however, are not absolute.'
- h*

Later in his judgment he said:

- j* '... pecuniary compensation to either party would be not merely inadequate but wholly inappropriate. In resolving the conflict, I must take all relevant considerations into account, and in my judgment these must include the facts that this is an interlocutory application and not the trial; that the injunctions sought are only temporary and not permanent; and that a refusal of injunctive relief may cause irreparable harm and effectively deprive the plaintiff of his right . . . It makes no difference that the claim to suppress publication is made by the government and not by a private litigant; the principles remain the same. Nor does the court abdicate its responsibility to decide where the public interest lies merely because national security is invoked by the Crown. The safeguard in a free society is that the conflict falls to be resolved not by the state itself but by an independent judiciary . . . the refusal of injunctive relief would permit indirect publication and effectively and permanently deprive the Attorney General of his rights in advance of the trial.’

On appeal to this court, the same points were made in judgments which again received wide publicity and I need only cite two passages. The first is from my own judgment, when I said:

‘Allied to this complaint is a plea that it is unjust that the defendants should be restrained from republishing allegations made by them whilst every other publisher is free to do so. The short answer to this is that if the original publications were unlawful, other publishers are not free to republish. It is true that the consequences of their doing so would be less serious, but that is another matter.’

We were told, and I accept, that this paragraph could be misunderstood by those who did not read it carefully and did not realise that I was speaking of republishing as contrasted with a publication of hitherto unpublished Wright material and that it was only republication whose consequences would be less serious than an initial publication. Any further publication by the Guardian, the Observer or other newspapers would quite clearly add to any damage already done and so be more serious.

The second is from the judgment of Nourse LJ:

‘Moreover, for the reasons given by Sir John Donaldson MR, it is clear to me that confidential information which comes into the hands of a member of the security service is information which prima facie may not in any circumstances be used by the employee, either during or after the employment, except for the benefit of the employer. As for the newspapers and any other third party into whose hands the confidential information comes, an injunction can be granted against them on the simple ground that equity gives relief against all the world, including the innocent, save only a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. It is obvious that nobody could obtain the sort of information which is under consideration in this case without being on notice that it was confidential to the Crown.’

It is against this background that I ask myself whether at the end of July 1986 (when the interim injunctive order was made against the Guardian and the Observer) a publication by the Independent of new, and apparently more authentic, Wright material, allegedly based on possession of a copy of Mr Wright’s manuscript, which neither the Guardian nor the Observer ever claimed or admitted having had, would ‘be calculated to impede, obstruct or prejudice the administration of justice’, to quote the words of the Attorney General’s application or ‘to involve an interference with the due administration of justice’, to quote the words of Lord Diplock in A-G v Leveller Magazine Ltd [1979] 1 All ER 745 at 749, [1979] AC 440 at 449. To that question I think that there can be only one answer, namely that it would. The issue in the Observer/Guardian action was not whether the information had been confidential to the Crown, but whether for one reason or another that confidentiality had evaporated or was overridden by a countervailing public interest. Millett J, and this court on appeal, had not only prohibited publication, including republication, by the Guardian and the Observer, but had held that, to quote Millett J, indirect publication of Mr Wright’s memoirs, the direct publication of which was prohibited by the Australian courts, would ‘permanently deprive the Attorney General of his rights in advance of the trial’. It could not have been made clearer. The court was making an order for the preservation of the confidentiality of the Wright material a pending the trial. Publication meanwhile, whether by those defendants or others, would deprive the Attorney General of his rights in advance of the trial, because information once published, at least on the scale achieved by publication in national newspapers, can never be truly confidential again.

I then ask myself whether this situation had changed in April 1987 when the Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News in fact published further Wright material. It is true that the Australian trial had concluded by then, and the judge had ruled that Mr Wright was entitled to publish, but the decision was under appeal and the Observer/Guardian action still awaited a full trial. The answer is plain. The publication of Mr Wright's memoirs in full at that time would have prevented any effective adjudication on the Attorney General's claim in the Observer/Guardian action and the publications complained of, whilst not going to this length, were very far from being of minimal effect. To the extent that they placed Wright material into the public domain, which had not previously been there, they deprived the Attorney General of a part of the rights which he was asserting in these actions and to this extent made it impossible for the court to do justice between the parties.

d '(a) In no case (apart from the Irish case) has a third party, C, been held to be in contempt of an order restraining a named person, B, from doing an act unless C has been privy or party to the doing of an act which is a breach of precise terms of the order' (see pp 285–286, ante)

The Irish case is Smith-Barry v Dawson (1891) 27 LR Ir 558. If the case is accurately reported, there was some confusion between the species of contempt which consists of disobeying, or assisting in the disobedience of, an order of the court and that which consists of interfering with the due administration of justice and this may have stemmed from the fact that no argument was addressed on behalf of the alleged contemnors. Mr Smith-Barry had been declared by a final judgment, to which the alleged contemnors were not parties, to be entitled to possession and to quiet enjoyment of his patent rights to hold a market in the Fair Green. The alleged contemnors had held a rival market in the Fair Green with knowledge of that decision and of the fact that an injunction had been granted against the defendant in the action prohibiting him from holding such a market. Chatterton V-C said that the alleged contemnors were—

g 'in my opinion, in just the same default as the original defendants would have been if they had done similar acts. The cases cited clearly established the right to have these attachments issued, and nothing can be more in point than the Killiney Foreshore Case (unreported). But even without any of these authorities, ordinary common sense would show that persons cannot be allowed to set at defiance the order of the Court because they do not happen to be named in the injunction.'

h If in an action between A and B for the possession of a dwelling-house, B is ordered to give up possession and to refrain from retaking possession, A's remedy, if someone, C, subsequently tries to dispossess him, is an action against C, not proceedings for contempt of court in disobeying an order to which C was never a party and in the breach of which he was not assisting.

i So long as the full importance of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C's words 'contempt of an order' are appreciated, I consider that this represents the law. The Attorney General does not allege that the defendants are in contempt of the orders made in the Observer/Guardian action or assisted in doing an act which is a 'breach of precise terms of the order', i.e. terms which restrained conduct by the Guardian and the Observer, their servants, agents, etc. He claims that, given the fact that these orders had been made with a view to preserving the subject matter of the dispute, destruction of that subject matter is an interference with the due administration of justice and so a contempt of court.

'(b) Under English law an injunction can only properly restrain a party to the proceedings from doing an act, although it may restrain him from doing the act "by himself, his servant or agent"' a

This appears to be a wholly correct statement of the law (see Marengo v Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd [1948] 1 All ER 406), but it is capable of being misleading. The form of order now usually adopted which enjoins the defendant 'by himself, his servant or agent' does not enjoin the servants or agents at all. All that the additional words do is to serve as a warning to such agents that they should not assist in the doing of the prohibited act. If they do so, they will not have disobeyed the order, but they will have interfered with the due administration of justice and may be liable to be proceeded against on that account. b

That this is the position is made even clearer by the two motions in Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 1) (1848) 11 Beav 180, 50 ER 785 and Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 2) (1848) 11 Beav 181, 50 ER 786. There the injunctive order omitted any reference to servants or agents. Lord Langdale MR dismissed the first motion to commit Mr Batley, the Earl's land agent, who had cut down some trees which the Earl had been forbidden to cut. He did so because the motion was based on an allegation that Mr Batley had acted in breach of the order. As Lord Langdale MR pointed out, the order was not addressed to Mr Batley and he was not enjoined thereby. However the second motion accused Mr Batley not of breaching the order, but of knowingly assisting in a breach of the order and thereby obstructing the process of the court. As Lord Langdale MR put it, 'If the matter had been pressed, I should have found it my duty to commit Mr Batley for his contempt in intermeddling in these matters' (see 11 Beav 181 at 183, 50 ER 786 at 787). c

'(c) As a result of (a) and (b) above, there is no English case in which a third party, C, has been held in contempt for doing any act which does not constitute a breach by the defendant enjoined, B, of the precise terms of the order' (see p 286, ante) e

I am not sure whether this adds anything to (a) and (b). Whilst it certainly records that no one has been able to find a reported decision involving a finding of contempt by C, where the act complained of was intimately related to an order against B but did not involve assisting in doing that precise act, I am not sure of its significance, save that it underlines the fact that this is a novel situation. There is at least one case in the books which, if C had acted differently, would have raised the point. This is Galaxia Maritime SA v Mineralimportexport, The Eleftherios [1982] 1 All ER 796, [1982] 1 WLR 539 where A obtained a Mareva injunction against B ordering B not to remove his assets from the jurisdiction including, in particular, cargo loaded on C's ship. C for his own purposes (he wished to have the use of his ship and to allow the crew to get home for Christmas) and regardless of the wishes of B, wished to remove his ship from the jurisdiction with or without the cargo. C applied successfully for the injunction to be discharged and seems to have assumed, as the court also assumed, that absent permission from the court or the discharge of the injunction, the ship could not sail. I think that C was right, but had the ship sailed with the cargo, it certainly could not have been said that he was in breach of the precise terms of the order which prohibited B exporting the cargo and still less that B would have been in breach. f

'(d) The plaintiff in the proceedings, A, can apply for the committal of C even though the act of C is a criminal contempt' (see p 286, ante) g

This is an historical anomaly arising out of the classification of contempts as civil and criminal. If, instead, they are classified as contempts involving (a) disobedience or assisting in the disobedience of orders and (b) other conduct interfering with the administration of justice, there is no problem. A can apply in category (a) and the Attorney General can apply in category (b). In any event it appears to cast no light on what has to be decided in this appeal. h

(e) The principle underlying the law that C is in criminal contempt if he is party to a breach of the order is that the court will not allow its order to be knowingly flouted, thwarted or frustrated by any person even though he be a stranger to the action' (see p 286, ante)

This is quite correct but, I think, nihil ad rem. The three newspapers were not parties to breaches of the actual orders in the Observer/Guardian action which prohibited publication by those newspapers. In publishing as they did, they were intending to serve their own interests or their view of the public interest and certainly not the interests of the Guardian and the Observer.

Based on these propositions of law, the Vice-Chancellor said that it seemed to him that the Attorney General was seeking to widen the application of the law of criminal contempt, albeit in accordance with established principle. This I am unable to accept. The law of contempt is based on the broadest of principles, namely that the courts cannot and will not permit interference with the due administration of justice. Its application is universal. The fact that it is applied in novel circumstances, for example to the punishment of a witness after he had given evidence (see A-G v Butterworth [1962] 3 All ER 326, [1963] 1 QB 696), is not a case of widening its application. It is merely a new example of its application. In that case, as here, the trial judge (Mocatta J) relied on the fact that there was no such case in the books, but this court held that that was a distinction of fact, not principle (see [1962] 3 All ER 326 at 332, [1963] 1 QB 696 at 724-725 per Donovan LJ).

Next, and this is really the final stage in his reasoning apart from the practical considerations with which I must deal hereafter, the Vice-Chancellor said (p 286, ante):

'... the question I have to decide is whether, due to the chance that there is in existence an order of the court preventing the Guardian and the Observer from publishing, the appropriate sanction is contempt of court.'

At the risk of appearing to be a carping critic, and I repeat my tribute to the clarity of his judgment, I think that the Vice-Chancellor misdirected himself in thus formulating the question. Contempt of court is not a sanction. Contempt of court is unlawful conduct, the sanction for which is imprisonment, attachment, a fine or an order to pay costs. So the question should at least be rephrased to read 'whether, due to the chance that there is in existence an order of the court preventing the Guardian and the Observer from publishing, the conduct of the Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News was unlawful as constituting an interference with the due administration of justice'. But even this is not correct. 'Chance' is not the right word. The existence of the restraining orders against the Guardian and the Observer was a fact. It was only a chance in the sense of being what I believe is known across the Atlantic as a 'happenstance', a past circumstance which was not created by any of the principal actors. So I would substitute 'fact' for 'chance', whilst at the same time appreciating that I have to consider whether it is a very material fact, one which made any real difference.

This brings me to the very interesting and, as I think, crucial decision in X CC v A [1985] 1 All ER 53, [1984] 1 WLR 1422. There Balcombe J made an order prohibiting publication of information about the ward by the News of the World, which was a party, and any other person who should have notice of the order. It was effective in fact and I am wholly satisfied that it was also effective in law. What is interesting is why it was effective in law.

As the Vice-Chancellor pointed out, English civil courts act in personam. They adjudicate disputes between the parties to an action and make orders against those parties only. This is true even in proceedings under RSC Ord 113, which permits proceedings against 'persons unknown'. They become parties. What is not permissible is to make an order against a stranger to the action:

'... I have no conception, that it is competent to this Court to hold a man bound by injunction, who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause ...'

Yet that is what Balcombe J purported to do. To say that the jurisdiction of the court in wardship involves a peculiar parental or administrative responsibility to which the disposal of controverted questions is only incidental, is no explanation. This only means that this jurisdiction is unusual in the extent to which it involves extended judicial supervision throughout the wardship, which may last for years. a

I sympathise with the position in which Balcombe J found himself. The proper discharge of the wardship by the court in the exercise of the ancient duties of parens patriae made it essential that there should be no publication and he had to find a way of achieving this result. But had any newspaper, other than the News of the World, published details of the ward and had the Attorney General sought to commit it or its editor for contempt consisting of disobedience of the order, the motion would have been dismissed. It would have been a replay of Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 1) (1848) 11 Beav 180, 50 ER 785, which would have been indistinguishable. The fact that the order was addressed to the alleged contemnor would rightly have been disregarded as done without jurisdiction. But if the Attorney General had moved, instead, on the grounds that the publication interfered with the administration of justice, he would have succeeded and the fact that publication had taken place notwithstanding the warning conveyed by the form of the order would have been an aggravating circumstance (Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 2) (1848) 11 Beav 181, 50 ER 786). b

Now what of the 'chance' or 'fact' that the court had made an order against the News of the World? The court is entitled to administer justice in whatever way it considers appropriate, although this is, of course, governed by precedent and principle. Thus, exceptionally, it can conduct proceedings wholly in camera, including concealing the identity of the parties and the judgment (see R v Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, ex p New Cross Building Society [1984] 2 All ER 27 at 29, [1984] QB 227 at 232). In the particular case Balcombe J decided to administer justice by concealing details concerning the ward and announced this fact because it was unusual. He would have had no need to announce that the court would not permit its ward to be married without its consent, because this is well known. Having once determined how justice was to be administered, any interference with that course of action would be unlawful and punishable as a contempt. e

The order was thus very material. Without it any newspaper could have said, rightly, that Balcombe J was not administering justice in a way which involved concealment of information about the ward, otherwise than in the context of particular applications in the wardship.

The instant case is almost exactly analogous. In fact the ex parte injunction was granted as soon as, or even before, the writ was issued and the proceedings begun. But suppose that there had been an interval of a week between the writ and the injunction, with publication of the Wright material meanwhile. This would not have been a contempt, because the court would not have indicated that it proposed to administer justice between the Attorney General and the Guardian and the Observer by preserving the confidentiality of the Wright material pending the trial and no one would have had any reason to know that it did so intend. Knowledge of how the court is administering, or intends to administer, justice is of the essence of the unlawfulness of conduct which interferes with that administration, whether or not that conduct consists of disobedience to an order. Once the court had announced its intention of preserving the confidentiality of the Wright material, the position was quite different. The order itself, reinforced by the statement of Millett J that 'the refusal of injunctive relief would permit indirect publication [of the Wright memoirs] and effectively and permanently deprive the Attorney General of his rights in advance of the trial' and by my own statement that other newspapers would not be free to republish, had made it abundantly clear that the court was intending to preserve the confidentiality of the Wright material pending the trial. This was its chosen method of administering justice and the Independent, the g

London Evening Standard and the London Daily News can have been in no doubt that this was the case.

- a I now turn to the practical considerations which moved the Vice-Chancellor or confirmed him in his view.

A take-over bid

- b It is difficult to comment on this without knowing more of the cause of action being alleged by B, but the short answer is that a sale by C to X could not interfere with the course of justice in any circumstances which I can foresee, because the sale, and everything done in consequence of it, could be reversed by court order if justice so required.

Cutting down trees

- c In the example given, A alleges a right to prevent B from cutting down trees on B's land and C claims a right against B to cut them down. If there was any question of C's right being subject to A's right, as well there might be, this would be a contempt and C should apply to be joined in the action. If C's right was wholly independent, so that, in effect, A's right was admittedly subject to C not exercising his right, there would be no contempt, because the administration of justice between A and B would not be interfered with.

d Defamation

- e Defamation is an assault on reputation analogous to a physical assault on the person. If B is enjoined not to assault A and C then assaults A, there is no interference with the administration of justice in the action A v B. It is simply a further tort or crime. Similarly with defamation. The court will prohibit a second defamatory statement (or blow) by B, but the subsequent making of the same defamatory statement by C (ie an additional blow) will not interfere with the administration of justice as between A and B. It is simply an independent tort if, in the end, it cannot be successfully defended. This is not to say that the publication by C might constitute a contempt of court, even if C was not enjoined and even if he claimed that he was in a position to justify his defamatory statement. It would all depend on whether it would in fact interfere with the administration of justice (see A-G v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1986] 2 All ER 833, [1987] QB 1, where this court made it clear that the rule in Bonnard v Perryman [1891] 2 Ch 269, [1891-4] All ER Rep 965 was subordinate to the rule of law that conduct which interfered with the administration of justice was a contempt of court).

g Trade secrets

- h This is another case on which it is difficult to comment without knowing more of the facts. The issue would be whether the revelation of trade secrets by C, whether authorised or not, would thwart the administration of justice as between A and B. I can imagine differing scenarios in which different answers might be given and it certainly cannot be said that an injunction restraining B would automatically restrain C. Indeed I should be surprised if it did, if only because A's claim would usually relate to trade secrets entrusted by him to B and not those entrusted by him to C, even if they were the same. In the instant case, what is being asserted by all the newspapers concerned is a similar right to break the confidentiality of the Wright material. This is being determined in the Observer/Guardian action and any publication by anyone else meanwhile would frustrate the administration of justice in that action. The element of uncertainty stems only from not knowing the full facts of the hypothetical case.

j An industrial dispute

An order restraining B from picketing A's premises would not render picketing by C a contempt of court, because it would not interfere with a determination of whether B was entitled to picket and the giving of remedies to A if it was unjustified. It is only if picketing by C would lead to the irreparable collapse of A's business rendering a resolution of his dispute with B impossible or irrelevant, that there would begin to be an analogy with the present situation. a

The Vice-Chancellor also expressed the view that if the Attorney General's submissions were correct, third parties alleged to be in contempt would be deprived of what he described as 'very elaborate procedural safeguards' and he instanced personal service of the order, the indorsement of a penal notice on the order and the care which is taken to ensure that the conduct complained of constitutes a breach of the express terms of the order. In particular, he said that if the Attorney General's contentions were right, the alleged contempt could consist of doing some act inconsistent, not with the terms of the order, but with the purpose of the order. This confuses the category of contempt which consists of disobeying or assisting in the disobedience of an order with the general category of contempt, namely interfering with the due administration of justice. None of these procedural safeguards has ever been applied, or could apply, in the latter category. The test of contempt or no contempt in that category is not inconsistency with the purpose of the court's order, it is in every case, and whether or not there is an order, simply whether the alleged contemnor knowingly interfered with the due administration of justice by the court. In almost all cases, given the facts the answer is obvious to anyone, as it is in this case, and, for my part, I can see nothing in the result which offends the basic principles of natural justice. What would offend those principles would be to hold that these newspapers were free to destroy the subject matter of the action between the Attorney General and the Guardian and the Observer newspapers, incidentally whilst denying the defendants in that action the same right, thus depriving both the Attorney General and those newspapers of their right to have their dispute determined in accordance with law. b

I am conscious that, despite the length of this judgment, I have not referred to the Canadian authorities. Suffice it perhaps to say that I, like the Vice-Chancellor, have found the guidance which they offer limited and confused. e

In general I think that there is force in the submission of counsel for the Attorney General that it would be unwise for courts to spell out in orders addressed to B what would or would not constitute a contempt by C, lest the failure to do so lead C to think that he was free to take any action not so specified, regardless of whether or not it would interfere with the due administration of justice. In the exceptional circumstances that one or more newspapers are forbidden to publish confidential information because to do so would destroy any rights which the plaintiff may have and that any publication by other newspapers would have the same effect, it seems, with hindsight, that this might have been a sensible course to have adopted and one which, however irregular, would probably in fact have prevented the present situation arising. However, I am quite clear that the failure to do so does not render the newspapers' conduct any less capable of constituting a serious contempt of court. f

In seeking to do justice to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor I have strayed, albeit sometimes somewhat tentatively, down a number of byways. Now I shall return to what actually happened. The first to publish was the Independent which stated in a leading article: h

'THE DECISION to publish material from the manuscript of Peter Wright's thus far unpublished book Spycatcher was not taken lightly. The Government's determined effort to prevent publication in Australia of Mr Wright's memoirs speaks for itself. Our justification is simple. It is in the public interest that facts about the operation of M15 become known in order that the debate about the proper oversight and supervision of the security and intelligence services can be better informed.'

The other two newspapers presumably were of the same view.

The preliminary question of law does not address itself to the questions of what was the justification for the newspapers' actions or what were their intentions in publishing.

a The assumption being made was that, on the view of the law which was put forward by the newspapers and accepted by the Vice-Chancellor, these considerations were irrelevant. With all respect I cannot accept this. Test it this way. Suppose, contrary to the facts, that the sole intention of the newspapers in publishing was to render nugatory the trial of the action brought by the government against the Guardian and the Observer. In my judgment there could not be a clearer contempt of court, but, on the answer given by the Vice-Chancellor, the newspapers could say that no offence had been committed. That b cannot be right.

Curiously, this point was never put to the Vice-Chancellor and was never raised in argument before us. It only occurred to us after we had adjourned to consider our judgments and it seemed so fundamental that we thought it right to invite further argument on whether intent to impede or prejudice the administration of justice (to quote s 6(c) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981) was or was not a relevant consideration
c and, if it was, what was the nature of the intention which had to be proved if a contempt of court was to be established.

Counsel for the Independent submitted that if the conduct of the newspapers does not constitute an actus reus, or criminal act, it matters not whether they have the necessary mens rea, or criminal intent. This is quite right and perhaps fortunate. If ordinary
d citizens could be convicted of offences which they intended to commit, but never got round to committing, the prisons would be even fuller than they are at present. But that is not this case. Indeed this is the converse of that case. Here the newspapers without doubt have interfered with the administration of justice by rendering the trial of the government's claims against the Guardian and the Observer less effective. They have therefore committed the actus reus. The real question is whether they had the necessary
e mens rea or criminal intent. It is to that question that I now turn.

Mens rea in the law of contempt is something of a minefield. The reason is that it is wholly the creature of the common law and has developed on a case by case basis, as no doubt it will continue to do.

The 1981 Act did not seek to systematise the approach of the courts. It simply defined, in s 1, a term of art, namely 'the strict liability rule' as meaning—

f 'the rule of law whereby conduct may be treated as a contempt of court as tending to interfere with the course of justice in particular legal proceedings regardless of intent to do so.'

There may well be instances of conduct which would be treated as contempt of court regardless of intent to do so, but which do not fall within this defined term. One example
g may be A-G v Butterworth [1962] 3 All ER 326, [1963] 1 QB 696, because the act complained of (punishing a witness for having given evidence in proceedings after those proceedings had been concluded) was calculated to interfere with future proceedings in general and not 'particular legal proceedings'. Another would be the offence of marrying a ward of court or taking the ward out of the jurisdiction without in each case first obtaining the court's permission, because the gravamen of the charge is not interfering h with the course of justice in proceedings.

The contempt alleged against the three newspapers quite clearly falls within the category of contempt to which the 1981 Act applies and accordingly the limitations and defences set out in ss 2 to 5 apply. The most important of these is s 2(3), which provides:

i 'The strict liability rule applies to a publication only if the proceedings in question are active within the meaning of this section at the time of the publication.'

The proceedings between the government and the Guardian and the Observer newspapers were not active in this sense when the three newspapers published the Wright material and accordingly they cannot be charged with contempt of court on a strict liability basis. This, counsel for the Attorney General fully accepts. But this does not mean that they cannot be charged on a basis which involves having regard to intent and indeed s 6(c) expressly contemplates and saves such a possibility when it provides: a

‘Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this Act . . . (c) restricts liability for contempt of court in respect of conduct intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice.’

This at once raises the question, ‘What kind of intent?’, counsel for the Attorney General contending for a general or basic intent and the newspapers for a specific intent. In the light of the policy of Parliament as evidenced by s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, and the likelihood that in passing the 1981 Act Parliament intended to accept the recommendations of the Phillimore Committee in 1977 (Report of the Committee on Contempt of Court (Cmnd 5794)), I am quite satisfied that what is contemplated, and what is ‘saved’, is the power of the court to commit for contempt where the conduct complained of is specifically intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. Such an intent need not be expressly avowed or admitted, but can be inferred from all the circumstances, including the foreseeability of the consequences of the conduct. Nor need it be the sole intention of the contemnor. And intent is to be distinguished from motive or desire (see R v Moloney [1985] 1 All ER 1025 at 1037, [1985] AC 905 at 926 per Lord Bridge). b

Summary

Although it has been necessary to explore this matter in considerable detail and depth, I can summarise the position very shortly. (1) Confidential information, whatever its nature (personal, financial, technical or security) has one essential common characteristic. It is irremediably damaged in its confidential character by every publication and the more widespread the publication, the greater the damage. (2) If a prima facie claim to confidentiality can be established, but this is opposed by a claim of a right to publish, whether on grounds of the public interest or otherwise, these opposing and wholly inconsistent claims must be evaluated and balanced the one against the other. (3) The public interest in ensuring that disputes are resolved justly and by due process of law may require a different balance to be struck at different stages. Thus, pending the trial of the action, the balance will normally come down in favour of preserving confidentiality, for the very obvious reason that, if this is not done and publication is permitted, there will be nothing left to have a trial about. (4) It is for the courts, and not for either of the opposing parties, to decide where, in the public interest, that balance lies. (5) Third parties (strangers to the action) who know that the court has made orders or accepted undertakings designed to protect the confidentiality of the information pending the trial, commit a serious offence against justice itself if they take action which will damage or destroy the confidentiality which the court is seeking to protect and so render the due process of law ineffectual. (6) If such third parties, having a legitimate interest in so doing, wish to contest the court’s decision to protect the confidentiality of the information on any grounds, including in particular that they have special rights or interests of which account has not been taken, they should apply to the court which will hear them and make any modification of its orders which may be appropriate. This is a well-established procedure which works speedily and well in the context of ex parte orders such as those made in the exercise of the Mareva and Anton Piller jurisdictions. Similarly they should apply to the court if they have doubts whether the action which they contemplate taking is lawful. (7) It is for the courts, and not for third parties, to decide whether, balancing competing public and private interests including those of the third parties, confidentiality should continue to be preserved at any particular time. e

I would answer the question raised on this appeal by holding that the conduct of the newspapers could constitute a criminal contempt of court, but that it is impossible to say whether it did or did not do so until they have been given an opportunity of being

- further heard and the court has determined whether, in so conducting themselves, the newspapers intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice.
- a I would allow the appeal and remit the matter to the High Court.

- LLOYD LJ. On the day on which the Independent published material from the manuscript of Peter Wright's book Spycatcher, there appeared in the same paper a leader under the heading 'When the Security Service turns to treason'. The theme of the leader
- b can be gathered from a single sentence:

'Mr Wright's first-hand description of illegality and incompetence within the Security Service is deeply shocking and amounts to an unambiguous case for a form of scrutiny which goes beyond the present system of ministerial oversight.'

- The Independent's justification for publishing the material is equally succinct:

- c '... It is in the public interest that facts about the operation of MI5 become known in order that the debate about the proper oversight and supervision of the security and intelligence services can be better informed.'

- It is obvious from these extracts that this case involves issues of the greatest public importance. It is therefore all the more important to be clear what this particular appeal
- d is about and what it is not about.

- It is not about the oversight and supervision of the security and intelligence services. Nor do we have to decide whether the articles in the Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News are in contempt of court. Our sole task is to answer the preliminary question of law formulated by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C, namely whether a person who is not party to an order of the court can nevertheless be in
- e contempt of court if he does something which interferes with the course of justice, by frustrating the purpose of that order. The Vice-Chancellor, in a judgment to which I too would pay my respectful tribute, has answered the question of law in favour of the respondents. The effect of answering the questions that way will be, as I understand it, to bring these contempt proceedings to an end. Thus the Independent and the other newspapers would not be liable for contempt even if it turned out that they intended to
- f interfere with the course of justice by frustrating the purpose of the order in A-G v Observer Newspapers Ltd (1986) 136 NLJ 799 (the Observer/Guardian case).

- The grounds of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment can be summarised as follows. (i) In no case other than the Irish case of Smith-Barry v Dawson (1891) 27 LR Ir 558 has a third party, not subject to the order of the court, been held liable for contempt for doing an act
- g which is prohibited by the order, unless he has aided and abetted a breach of the order by the person enjoined. Since there is no question here of the Independent having aided or abetted a breach by the Guardian or the Observer, it would involve an extension of the law of criminal contempt to apply it in the present case. (ii) While it is open to the court to extend the law, nevertheless the court should be wary of doing so, since the liberty of the subject is involved. (iii) To apply the law of contempt to a person who is not party to the order in question would not only widen the application of the law, but also infringe
- h a fundamental principle that the courts do not make orders against all the world. The court acts in personam. Accordingly its orders only operate in personam, never in rem. (iv) To hold that a person who is not party to the order, and not party to the breach of the order as aider and abetter, may nevertheless be liable for contempt on the grounds that he has contravened or frustrated the spirit of the order would be to introduce
- j a degree of uncertainty which is incompatible with the imposition of a criminal sanction. It would also be contrary to natural justice, since he would be bound by the effect of an order in respect of which he had no opportunity to be heard.

Now I agree entirely with the first two steps in the Vice-Chancellor's reasoning. Although there are dicta in Seaward v Paterson [1897] 1 Ch 545, [1895-9] All ER Rep

1127 and Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (No 1)(1848) 11 Beav 180, 50 ER 785 which may be said to support a wider principle, I regard those cases as having decided, and decided only, that a person may be liable in contempt if, with knowledge of the order, he aids and abets a breach of the order by the person enjoined. a

The same is true of Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556, [1982] QB 558, on which counsel for the Attorney General also relied. It was held in that case that the bank would be liable for contempt if, with knowledge of the Mareva injunction, it enabled its customer to act in breach of the terms of the injunction, even though the injunction had not yet been served on the customer. The customer could not, of course, be liable in contempt himself until notice of the injunction had been properly served. But he could breach the injunction as soon as it was granted; and the bank could therefore be liable in contempt for aiding and abetting that breach. b

So the cases are of no help to counsel for the Attorney General. I would only add, before leaving the cases, that it would be an improvement of this branch of the law if aiding and abetting a breach of a court order were reclassified as a civil contempt rather than a criminal contempt. The best course would no doubt be to abolish what remains of the distinction altogether, in accordance with the recommendations of the Phillimore Committee in 1977 (Report of the Committee on Contempt of Court (Cmnd 5794)). But if the distinction is to remain, it does not make sense that a stranger to the order, who aids and abets a breach, should be criminally liable while the person to whom the order is directed and who himself commits a breach should only be liable for civil contempt. That is the sort of nonsense which does no credit to the law, as was pointed out forcibly enough by Lord Atkinson nearly 75 years ago in Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417, [1911-13] All ER Rep 1. c

It is when he comes to the third step in his reasoning that I begin with great respect to part company from the Vice-Chancellor. I accept, of course, that it is a fundamental principle with certain very limited exceptions, of which the best established is wardship, that our courts act in personam. As Lord Eldon LC said in Iveson v Harris (1802) 7 Ves 251 at 256, 32 ER 102 at 104: d

‘I have no conception, that it is competent to this Court to hold a man bound by an injunction, who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause.’ e

That dictum was repeated with approval by Lord Uthwatt in Marengo v Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd [1948] 1 All ER 406 at 407. See also Brydges v Brydges [1909] P 187 at 191. f

But the question here is not whether a third party is bound by the injunction, but whether he can be liable for contempt even though he is not bound by the injunction. He cannot be liable in contempt for breach of an order to which he is not a party; nor, on the facts of the present case, could the respondents be liable for aiding and abetting a breach. But it does not follow that they may not be liable for interfering with the course of justice. Thus, to take a wholly improbable example in order to illustrate the point, suppose a party to certain proceedings assaults or abuses the judge; suppose the judge makes an order against him in the proceedings prohibiting him from repeating his abusive conduct. If a stranger comes to court and abuses the judge in like manner, it will surely not be a defence to a charge of contempt that he was not a party to the order. His conduct amounts to a contempt of court independently of any order made in the proceedings. Nor would holding such a man liable for contempt create any undesirable uncertainty or injustice. He is assumed to know that abusing the judge is a contempt of court. Ignorance of the law will afford him no more excuse in this than in any other branch of the criminal law. g

It may be said that abusing the judge is an obvious contempt, whereas interfering with the course of justice, in particular proceedings, is much less precise. This is true. Moreover, I would accept that not all acts which are calculated to interfere with the course of justice will necessarily ground a charge of contempt. The act must be sufficiently serious and sufficiently closely connected with the particular proceedings. h a But in the present case the conduct relied on by the Attorney General is not marginal. It is not a mere pre-judging of the issue to be decided in the particular proceedings. It is not a mere usurpation of the court's function. It is the destruction, in whole or in part, of the subject matter of the action itself. The central issue in the Observer/Guardian action is whether the Guardian should be restrained from publishing confidential information attributable to Mr Wright. Once the information has been published by another newspaper, the confidentiality evaporates. The point of the action is gone. It is difficult to imagine a more obvious and more serious interference with the course of justice than to destroy the thing in dispute.

b That brings me to what I regard as the central difficulty in this case. If the destruction of the subject matter, that is to say the publication of the confidential material, is sufficient to constitute the actus reus of contempt, then the injunction against the Guardian becomes irrelevant. The Independent, and the other newspapers, would be liable for contempt by reason of the destruction of the subject matter of the action, even if the court had never granted an interlocutory injunction against the Guardian. Counsel for the Attorney General was unwilling to take his argument that far, and I can understand why not. To take another example mentioned in the course of the argument, suppose the subject matter of the action (the res litigiosa) were the ownership of a racehorse. If a third party, knowing of the litigation, were to shoot the horse for reasons of his own, or for no reason at all, could he be liable for contempt? Counsel for the Attorney General shied away from answering that question Yes. Yet the subject matter of the action would have been destroyed just as surely as in the case of confidential information. So he was driven to accepting that the injunction against the Guardian is indeed an essential plank in the Attorney General's proceedings for contempt. The injunction is not irrelevant, as in the example of the stranger who abuses the judge.

e But if the injunction is not irrelevant, if it is something more than the fifth wheel of the coach, then counsel for the Attorney General is in the difficulty, which the Vice-Chancellor regarded as insuperable, that the injunction is being given at least some legal effect against a stranger, who is not party to the proceedings, and has not had an opportunity to be heard; the injunction is being treated as having at least some validity contra mundum.

f I am bound to say that I have not found the solution to this conundrum easy, and my mind has wavered during the course of the argument and since. The reasons marshalled by the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment, and the arguments advanced on behalf of the respondents in this court, are very powerful. But in the end I have come down in favour of the Attorney General. Before stating my reasons, I wish to quote what I regard as a crucial paragraph from the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, in which he is dealing with the objections to the principle contended for by the Attorney General (p 288, ante):

h "There are other equally serious objections. Counsel for the Attorney General himself accepted that, in the case of some orders against B, it would not be a contempt for C to do the act which B is prohibited from doing. He instanced the case of an injunction granted in a matrimonial dispute which restrained the husband, B, from assaulting the wife, A; counsel accepts that if C assaults A he would not be in contempt of court. The reason, says counsel, is that the order restraining B is plainly personal to B. But the borderline between such "plainly personal" orders and other orders must be very uncertain. All orders are expressed as being personal. Is an order restraining an act by B in breach of his contract with A personal? If so, can C safely do an act even if the result of such act will be to frustrate the order? For example, in the case I have given of the felling of the trees will it not be a contempt of court by C to fell the trees because A's right to prevent B from felling the trees lay in the contract between A and B? In my judgment, the distinction between personal and other orders is unworkable. It would lead to a degree of uncertainty whether or not an act was a contempt which is incompatible with the imposition of a criminal sanction." (The Vice-Chancellor's emphasis.)

Now I accept that the distinction between 'personal' and 'other' orders (though I would not adopt the terminology) may be hard to state in theory. But the line is by no means hard to draw in practice. For it corresponds to a difference in real life. 'Personal' orders are those which are made, usually at the conclusion of proceedings, but often at an interlocutory stage, which affect the person to whom the order is directed, and those who aid and abet him, but nobody else. 'Other' orders include orders by which the court regulates its own procedure, and determines how a case is to be tried. 'Other' orders will, of course, bind the parties to the proceedings. But I see no reason why such orders should not also be regarded as having a wider effect in shaping, or determining, the way in which justice is to be achieved in the particular case. If a third party with knowledge of such an order does something which disables the court from conducting the case in the intended manner, then I see no reason why that should not be regarded as an ordinary interference with the process of justice. The third party would be liable for contempt, subject to proof of mens rea, not because he is in breach of the order, but because he has prevented the court from conducting the proceedings in accordance with its intention.

Thus if, to return to the example of the racehorse, the court were to make an order under RSC Ord 29, r 2 for the interim preservation of the racehorse, pending the outcome of the proceedings, I can see no reason why a stranger who, with knowledge of the order, shoots the racehorse, should not be liable for contempt on the ground that he has interfered with the course of justice, even though he may not be bound by the order as such.

There is, I think, a useful analogy to be drawn with the power of a court to order a hearing in camera. Putting aside s 12 of the Administration of Justice Act 1960, publication of proceedings held in camera may be a contempt, not because it is in breach of the order of the court but because it is an interference with the course of justice. In Arlidge and Eady The Law of Contempt (1982) para 4-151 the authors, having discussed Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417, [1911-13] All ER Rep 1, Re F (a minor) (publication of information) [1977] 1 All ER 114, [1977] Fam 58, and A-G v Leveller Magazine Ltd [1979] 1 All ER 745, [1979] AC 440, conclude:

'Since the test of contempt is not breach of the order but interference with the administration of justice, it follows that at common law a contempt may be committed even if no specific order has been made by the court affecting anyone other than those involved in the proceedings. At common law, if the court makes an order regulating its own procedure and the purpose of the order is plainly to protect the administration of justice, then anyone who subverts that order will be guilty of contempt.' (The author's emphasis.)

In my judgment that represents an accurate statement of the law.

So my answer to the question of law, in general terms, would be in the affirmative. But in order to avoid any doubt as to what precisely I, for my part, am deciding, I would put it this way: 'The publication of confidential information which is the subject matter of a pending action, and which (i) is made in the knowledge of an outstanding injunction prohibiting the publication of that information and (ii) would have the effect of destroying the subject matter of that action, in whole or in part, may constitute the actus reus of contempt.'

I too would allow the appeal. But since the underlying question whether these articles are in contempt of court will now have to be tried, it may be helpful if, like Sir John Donaldson MR, I say a word or two on the question of mens rea.

Counsel for the Attorney General sought to persuade us that the strict liability rule, that is to say, the rule whereby a person may be liable for contempt of court regardless of whether he intends to interfere with the course of justice, never did apply to a case such as the present. I am not sure what counsel's purpose was in advancing that submission. But whatever his purpose, I was not persuaded. I can see no reason for distinguishing between an interference with the course of justice by, for example, pre-judging the issue a or bringing unfair pressure to bear on the parties, to which admittedly the strict liability rule always applied, and an interference with the course of justice by destruction of the subject matter. So the strict liability rule would, in my view, have applied to the present case prior to the passing of the 1981 Act.

b The purpose of s 2 of the 1981 Act was to confine strict liability as defined within narrow limits. Thus it was common ground that strict liability does not apply to the facts of the present case, because the proceedings against the Guardian were not active, within the statutory definition, at the time of publication. But the fact that the Independent could not be liable under the strict liability rule does not mean that the Independent cannot be liable at all. Section 6(c) specifically provides that nothing in s 2 shall restrict liability in respect of conduct intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. The question is what is the nature of that intent?

c There are three possibilities. The first is that the contemnor is liable if he intends to do the act in question, in this case publish the article, even though he does not intend to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. It is sufficient if the article in fact impedes or prejudices the administration of justice. The second possibility is that the contemnor is liable if he intends to interfere with the course of justice (I use that phrase for brevity) or is reckless whether or not he interferes with the course of justice. The third possibility is that the contemnor is only liable if he intends to interfere with the course of justice.

d Counsel for the Attorney General did not seek to support the first possibility. But he argued strongly in favour of the second. There was, he says, nothing in the pre-existing law to suggest that contempt of court was ever a crime of specific intent. If therefore it was necessary to show a guilty mind on the part of the contemnor, in other words when the strict liability rule did not apply, it was sufficient to show either that he intended to interfere with the course of justice, or that he was reckless whether he did so or not. This would be in accordance with the ordinary principles of criminal law. Moreover, if it were necessary to show in every case that the contemnor intended to interfere with the course of justice, the protection afforded by the law of contempt to the administration of justice would be undermined.

e Counsel for the Attorney General relied on the following passage from Arlidge and Eady, The Law of Contempt para 2-80:

'The best view is that contempt of court is a crime of general intent. There is insufficient authority to indicate that it is a crime of specific intent and the purpose of the jurisdiction might be too easily defeated if it were.'

f He also relied on a later passage, where the authors sound a less certain note (para 4-46):

g 'Since this type of offence has hitherto been absolute, there are no authorities which indicate the precise nature of the mens rea required in the case of prejudicial publications which fall outside the Act but which are nevertheless prima facie contempts. On principle the contemnor must know the publication contains matter capable of prejudicing particular proceedings; he must know the proceedings are pending or imminent, and he must intend to prejudice these proceedings. It may be that if he is reckless as to any or all of these requirements he will also be guilty.'

h If reckless interference with the course of justice was a ground of liability before the Act, as counsel for the Attorney General submits it was, then there is nothing in the Act itself which restricts that ground of liability. It is true that s 6(c) refers to conduct intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice, and there is nothing about recklessness. But s 6(c) was enacted for the avoidance of doubt. Since there is nothing in ss 1 or 2 to restrict liability based on recklessness, there was no need to refer to recklessness in s 6(c). Alternatively, 'intent' in s 1 and 'intended to impede etc', in s 6(c) must refer to general intent, i.e. basic mens rea, which would include recklessness.

j Such was the argument of counsel for the Attorney General. I cannot accept it. Counsel for the Independent is surely right when he submits that the statutory purpose behind the 1981 Act was to effect a permanent shift in the balance of public interest away from the protection of the administration of justice and in favour of freedom of speech. Such a shift was forced on the United Kingdom by the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245, and was in any event foreshadowed by the recommendations of the Phillimore Committee. If we were to hold that, where the strict liability rule does not apply (because, for example, the publication does not create a substantial risk that the course of justice would be seriously impeded, but only some lesser risk, or some minor impediment), the publisher might nevertheless be liable if he is reckless, we would certainly not be furthering the statutory purpose. a

But counsel for the Independent has a narrower, and even more compelling, point based on the language on s 1. The strict liability rule is expressed to be a rule whereby a person may be liable 'regardless of intent'. Now whatever else recklessness may or may not mean (and the cases show that the concept is not without its difficulties) it is clear that it is independent of, and frequently contrasted with, intent. Liability based on recklessness is thus a liability regardless of intent. If that is so, then liability based on recklessness is included within the statutory description of the strict liability rule, and is therefore subject to the restrictions imposed by s 2. It must follow that recklessness does not provide the Attorney General with an avenue of escape from s 2, which is the essence of the submission of counsel for the Attorney General. b

Putting the matter another way, s 6(c) of the 1981 Act saves from the operation of ss 1 and 2 conduct which is intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice. If it was the object of Parliament to save also conduct which is reckless, then Parliament would surely have said so. Sections 1, 2 and 6(c) cover the whole ground. In cases covered by the Act to which the strict liability rule does not apply, there is no room for a state of mind which falls short of intention. There is no middle way. c

I would therefore hold that the mens rea required in the present case is an intent to interfere with the course of justice. As in other branches of the criminal law, that intent may exist, even though there is no desire to interfere with the course of justice. Nor need it be the sole intent. It may be inferred, even though there is no overt proof. The more obvious the interference with the course of justice, the more readily will the requisite intent be referred. d

BALCOMBE LJ. I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgments of Sir John Donaldson MR and Lloyd LJ, and I gratefully adopt Sir John Donaldson's exposition of the facts relevant to this appeal. e

The question which Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C ordered to be tried as a preliminary point of law, and which he answered in the negative, was in the following terms: f

'Whether a publication made in the knowledge of an outstanding Injunction against another party and which if made by that other party would be in breach thereof, constitutes a criminal contempt of Court upon the footing that it assaults or interferes with the process of Justice in relation to the said Injunction.' g

In the course of the argument before us this preliminary point was refined in two particular respects. (i) It was taken to relate only to a case where the injunction in question is designed to preserve the subject matter of the action (in this case confidential information) pending the trial, and the nature of the subject matter is such that, if the injunction is broken, the subject matter will have ceased to exist, thereby rendering any trial between the parties pointless. (ii) The question was modified so as to ask whether such a publication was capable of constituting a criminal contempt of court, it being accepted by the parties that even if the publication was capable of being contempt of court, it would not be such unless the necessary element of intent were present. If this appeal is to be allowed, the question whether the respondents had the necessary intention h a to impede or prejudice the administration of justice will have to be decided, on evidence, by the court of first instance. In the event, and with the benefit of hindsight, I think that all parties would now accept that to try and resolve the issues between the parties by the determination of a preliminary point of law was a mistake.

b Contempt of court is generally categorised under two heads. Civil contempt comprises a specific failure to comply with an order of the court by which the contemnor is bound. Criminal contempt is constituted by interference with the administration of justice (see A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd [1973] 3 All ER 54 at 71, [1974] AC 273 at 307–308 per Lord Diplock). It is a contempt of the latter class which the Attorney General contends may have been committed in the present case.

c Undoubtedly an act which interferes with the course of justice is capable of constituting a contempt of court. The books are full of cases about such acts. Some, such as assaulting an officer of the court, interference with witnesses or jurors, or disrupting court proceedings, bear little relation to the present case. Much nearer to the circumstances of the present case are those cases where a person has been held guilty of contempt by 'aiding and abetting' the commission of the act forbidden by the court's order. A good example is the early case of Lord Wellesley v Earl of Mornington (1848) 11 Beav 180, 181, 50 ER 785, 786 where the distinction is made very clear. The Earl of Mornington was restrained by injunction from cutting timber. His agent, one Batley, cut the timber in question, knowing that this was forbidden. A motion to commit Batley for breach of the injunction was refused, since he was not enjoined, but a motion to commit him for contempt, in knowingly assisting in a breach of the injunction, would have been granted by Lord Langdale MR but for the forbearance of the plaintiff. So also in Seaward v Paterson [1897] 1 Ch 545, [1895–9] All ER Rep 1127 it was held that the court had jurisdiction to commit for contempt a person (one Murray) not bound by an injunction, and who, knowing of the injunction, aided and abetted a defendant in committing a breach of it. In the course of his judgment Lindley LJ said ([1897] 1 Ch 545 at 554, [1895–9] All ER Rep 112 at 1130):

f 'Now, let us consider what jurisdiction the Court has to make an order against Murray. There is no injunction against him—he is no more bound by the injunction granted against Paterson than any other member of the public. He is bound, like other members of the public, not to interfere with, and not to obstruct, the course of justice; and the case, if any, made against him must be this—not that he has technically infringed the injunction, which was not granted against him in any sense of the word, but that he has been aiding and abetting others in setting the Court at defiance, and deliberately treating the order of the Court as unworthy of notice. If he has so conducted himself, it is perfectly idle to say that there is no jurisdiction to attach him for contempt as distinguished from a breach of the injunction, which has a technical meaning. . . . It has always been familiar doctrine to my brother Rigby and myself that the orders of the Court ought to be obeyed, and could not be set at naught and violated by any member of the public, either by interfering with the officers of the Court, or by assisting those who were bound by their orders.'

j A modern example is to be found in Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556, [1982] QB 558. That case concerned the position of a bank which had notice of the terms of a Mareva injunction before the defendant had himself received notice of the injunction. The argument and the effect of the decision is summarised in the following passage from the judgment of Eveleigh LJ ([1982] 1 All ER 556 at 566–567, [1982] QB 558 at 578):

'As was recognised early in the arguments before us in determining what action is called for by a bank which has notice of the terms of a Mareva injunction it is necessary to determine the basis of liability for contempt of court. I think that the following propositions may be stated as to the consequences which ensue when there are acts or omissions which are contrary to the terms of an injunction. (1) The person against whom the order is made will be liable for contempt of court if he acts in breach of the order after having notice of it. (2) A third party will also be liable if he knowingly assists in the breach, that is to say if knowing the terms of the injunction he wilfully assists the person to whom it was directed to disobey it. This will be so whether or not the person enjoined has had notice of the injunction. The first proposition is clear enough. As to the second, however, it was submitted that until the defendant had notice of the injunction nothing done by the bank could amount to contempt of court. Also two opposing views were canvassed (I use this expression as the arguments were not strictly contentious) as to the extent to which mens rea was a necessary ingredient in determining the bank's responsibility to the court. I will give my reasons for the second proposition and take first the question of prior notice to the defendant. It was argued that the liability of a third party arose because he was treated as aiding and abetting the defendant (i.e. he was an accessory) and as the defendant could himself not be in breach unless he had notice it followed that there was no offence to which the third party could be an accessory. In my opinion this argument misunderstands the true nature of the liability of the third party. He is liable for contempt of court committed by himself. It is true that his conduct may very often be seen as possessing a dual character of contempt of court by himself and aiding and abetting the contempt by another, but the conduct will always amount to contempt of court by himself. It will be conduct which knowingly interferes with the administration of justice by causing the order of the court to be thwarted.'

My use of the phrase 'aiding and abetting' is intended to include conduct of the kind considered by the court in Z Ltd v A. But that is the extent of the English cases. There is no English authority which establishes that it is a contempt of court, in the sense of knowingly interfering with the course of justice, for a person who is not prohibited by an order to do something which is forbidden by the order, unless he is 'aiding and abetting' the person named in the order. (There is, however, an obiter dictum to this effect by Henry J in UK Nirex Ltd v Barton (1986) Times, 14 October.)

We were also referred to one Irish and three Canadian cases. The Irish case, Smith-Barry v Dawson (1891) 27 LR Ir 558, a decision of Chatterton V-C at first instance, is undoubtedly authority for the proposition which the appellant seeks to establish. However, the parties against whom attachment for contempt was sought did not appear and were not represented so that there was no argument against the application, and gave no reasoned judgment but followed an unreported case to the like effect (the Killiney Foreshore case). The persuasive effect of this case is thus extremely limited.

The Canadian cases were all concerned with injunctions to restrain picketing in the course of a labour dispute. In all cases the order in question was expressed to operate on third parties. Thus in Bassel's Lunch Ltd v Kick (No 1) [1936] OR 445, the order in question restrained 'the defendants . . . or any one assisting or aiding them'. In Tilco Plastics Ltd v Skurjat (1966) 57 DLR (2d) 596 the order restrained the defendants 'or person or persons having notice of this Order'. In Catkey Construction Ltd v Moran (1969) 8 DLR (3d) 413 the order restrained the defendants 'or anyone having notice or knowledge of such order'. If the court has jurisdiction to restrain persons who are not parties to the proceedings in which the injunction is granted, then it follows that the court will enforce its orders against those persons who knowingly break them, and this could be the explanation of all these cases. However, it is fair to say that in the Tilco Plastics case Gale CJHC expressly disclaimed this as the grounds of his decision. He said (at 619):

'In my opinion, the insertion of those words in the order of King, J., did not affect the legal obligations of members of the public, one way or the other. The words may have been inserted to remind the respondent that the order could not be circumvented by any one having knowledge of it, but that is not material. Any

a person who is aware of the substance or nature of a Court order cannot flout it simply because he is not expressly named in that order.”

b Further, a second decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Bassel's Lunch Ltd v Kick (No 2) [1937] 1 DLR 235, and which was not referred to in the Tilco Plastics case, is to the opposite effect. In my judgment the Vice-Chancellor in the present case was fully justified in saying that the state of the authorities under the law of Canada seems to be confused and I derive little or no assistance from these cases.

Accordingly, I reach the conclusion, as did the Vice-Chancellor, that the particular question we have to decide is not covered by binding authority. The result is that we have to approach the question as a matter of principle.

c I have already stated the principle that criminal contempt is constituted by interference with the administration of justice. Thus it will normally require two elements: (1) conduct which interferes with the administration of justice: the ‘actus reus’; and (2) the state of mind which accompanies this conduct: the ‘mens rea’. It was to the question whether the publication by the respondents of material prohibited by the Observer/Guardian injunctions constituted the actus reus that the Vice-Chancellor devoted his attention; the question of mens rea was not argued before him. It may have been the absence of any argument as to intent that caused the Vice-Chancellor to fall into error.

d Certainly for my part I was much impressed by the arguments of the respondents as to uncertainty and unfairness, which seemed conclusive to the Vice-Chancellor, as is apparent from the passages from his judgment that have been cited by Sir John Donaldson MR. Nevertheless, once the question of intent was raised, in the circumstances mentioned by the Master of the Rolls, it seems to me that the answer to the preliminary question of law became reasonably clear. I accept, of course, that wholly different considerations are e relevant in considering what conduct may constitute the actus reus, and what state of mind may constitute the mens rea. Nevertheless, in considering whether or not particular conduct is capable of constituting the actus reus, it may be appropriate to test it by considering it in relation to a particular state of mind.

f In the present case the orders made in the Observer/Guardian proceedings (A-G v Observer Ltd (1986) 136 NLJ 799) indicated the way in which the court intended those proceedings should be conducted, viz that the information derived from or attributed to Mr Wright should remain confidential until the trial of those actions. It cannot seriously be denied that the publications on 27 April 1987 by the present respondents may well have rendered the trial of those actions pointless, at least in relation to those matters which were then disclosed, and thereby prevented the court from conducting those proceedings in accordance with its intention. If one then considers the possibility that g those publications by the respondents might have been made with the sole intention of rendering pointless the Guardian/Observer litigation, then it seems to me impossible to say that there would then be no contempt of court: there would be both the necessary actus reus, the publications interfering with the prescribed course of justice in the Observer/Guardian action, and the necessary mens rea. I accept that it is highly improbable that it was the respondents’ sole intention to interfere with the Observer/Guardian actions, h but that is the difficulty of raising a preliminary question of law: the answer to it must be apt to fit all possible hypotheses.

i So for the reasons which have been given more fully by Sir John Donaldson MR and Lloyd LJ, I, too, would allow this appeal and would respectfully agree with Lloyd LJ in his formulation of the precise ambit of the decision at which we have arrived. I would remit the matter to the High Court.

j On the question of the necessary element of mens rea, it is sufficient to say that I agree with Sir John Donaldson MR and Lloyd LJ that it will be necessary for the Attorney General to establish that the respondents ‘intended to impede or prejudice the administration of justice’ within the saving provision of s 6(c) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 and that such intent does not include recklessness.

Although I hope I have made it clear in the earlier part of this judgment that the reason why I consider that the publications of the respondents are capable of constituting a criminal contempt of court is because they interfered with the administration of justice, and not because they disobey orders made in the Observer/Guardian actions which were not addressed to them, I am conscious that this conclusion is reached by a sophisticated argument which may not be readily apparent to the layman. It seems to me that it would be preferable, in an appropriate case, where it is apparent that the subject matter of an action (e.g. confidential information or a secret process) could be destroyed by its publication by any person, whether a party to the action or not, for the court to make its initial protective order in terms which make it clear to third parties that they, too, must not destroy that subject matter. The question is whether the court has power, in an appropriate case, directly to order third parties not to destroy the subject matter of the action. The general principle was stated by Farwell LJ in Brydges v Brydges [1909] P 187 at 191:

"But the Court has no jurisdiction, inherent or otherwise, over any person other than those properly brought before it as parties or as persons treated as if they were parties under statutory jurisdiction (e.g., persons served with notice of an administration decree or in the same interest with a defendant appointed to represent them), or persons coming in and submitting to the jurisdiction of their own free will, to the extent to which they so submit (e.g., creditors of a bankrupt executor, who has carried on business under a power in the will, coming in to claim against the testator's estate in order to obtain subrogation to the executor's right of indemnity). But the Courts have no jurisdiction to make orders against persons not so before them merely because an order made, or to be made, may or will be ineffectual without it. Even in the case of an injunction Lord Eldon says in Iveson v. Harris ((1802) 7 Ves 251 at 256-257, 32 ER 102 at 104): "I have no conception, that it is competent to this Court to hold a man bound by an injunction, who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause. The old practice was that he must be brought into Court, so as according to the ancient laws and usages of the country to be made a subject of the writ."

See also Ranson v Platt [1911] 2 KB 291 and Marengo v Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic [1948] 1 All ER 406. The last case, being a decision of the House of Lords, is clearly binding on this court, unless there is any relevant exception to the general rule. That there is at least one exception appears from a case of my own at first instance, X CC v A [1985] 1 All ER 53, [1984] 1 WLR 1422. In that case I held that, in the exercise of the wardship jurisdiction, there was power to make an order (prohibiting the publication of information about the ward) binding on the world at large, when persons who were potentially subject to that order had not been parties to the proceedings in which the order was obtained. (With all respect to Sir John Donaldson MR that was the ratio of my decision, and I still believe it to have been correct.) It is true that I then said that I was satisfied that, if it were not an exercise of the parental jurisdiction in wardship, there would be no such power, but the question whether there might be other exceptions to the general rule was not then before me. I believe that there can be another exception to the general rule which would enable the court to make an order, binding on the world at large, in the circumstances of the present case, where such an order may be appropriate to preserve the subject matter of an action pending trial. The law of contempt is but one example of the court's ability to regulate its own procedures so as to ensure that justice prevails. The rule that courts normally act only in personam is but another example of the same process. If the court needs to ensure that the subject matter of an existing action be preserved against all comers pending the trial of the action, then in my judgment the court can obtain the desired result by introducing another exception to the general rule that the court acts only in personam. I can find nothing in the cases to which I have referred, in which the general rule is stated, to say that the rule is wholly without exception, and it is not without significance that the Canadian courts have felt themselves able to make such orders.

In this connection the following passage from the speech of Viscount Haldane LC in Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417 at 437, [1911-13] All ER Rep 1 at 9 is very much in point:

'While the broad principle is that the Courts of this country must, as between parties, administer justice in public, this principle is subject to apparent exceptions, such as those to which I have referred. But the exceptions are themselves the outcome of a yet more fundamental principle that the chief object of Courts of justice must be to secure that justice is done. In the two cases of wards of Court and of lunatics the Court is really sitting primarily to guard the interests of the ward or the lunatic. Its jurisdiction is in this respect parental and administrative, and the disposal of controverted questions is an incident only in the jurisdiction. It may often be necessary, in order to attain its primary object, that the Court should exclude the public. The broad principle which ordinarily governs it therefore yields to the paramount duty, which is the care of the ward or the lunatic. The other case referred to, that of litigation as to a secret process, where the effect of publicity would be to destroy the subject-matter, illustrates a class which stands on a different footing. There it may well be that justice could not be done at all if it had to be done in public. As the paramount object must always be to do justice, the general rule as to publicity, after all only the means to an end, must accordingly yield. But the burden lies on those seeking to displace its application in the particular case to make out that the ordinary rule must as of necessity be superseded by this paramount consideration. The question is by no means one which, consistently with the spirit of our jurisprudence, can be dealt with by the judge as resting in his mere discretion as to what is expedient. The latter must treat it as one of principle, and as turning, not on convenience, but on necessity.'

In my judgment this passage can apply, mutatis mutandis, to the circumstances of the present case. If an interlocutory order to prevent publication of the details of a secret process, where the effect of publicity would be to destroy the subject matter, requires to be made so as to affect third parties, then the inability to make such an order would be just as much a denial of justice as if the litigation had to take place in public.

The ability to make an order against the world at large would of necessity be extremely limited, to be granted only in the most exceptional cases (of which I concede the present could be one), but this seems to me the more satisfactory way of dealing with the problem thrown up by the facts of this case. What I have said in the last part of this judgment is merely an attempt to suggest how the problem might better be dealt with in the future. This course would also have the advantage that a third party in breach of the terms of the order would be liable for civil, rather than criminal, contempt. There is much to be said for treating all contempt which consists (in effect) of disobedience to the terms of an order of the court in one and the same manner.

Appeal allowed. Matter to be remitted to High Court. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd and others and related appeals

20, 21, 22 JULY 1987

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR, RALPH GIBSON AND RUSSELL LJJ

22, 23, 24 JULY 1987

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH, LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK, LORD TEMPLEMAN, LORD ACKNER AND LORD OLIVER OF AYLERTON

27, 28, 29, 30 JULY, 13 AUGUST 1987

Injunction – Interlocutory – Preservation of position pending trial – Prevention of disclosure of confidential information – Protection of security service – Former security service officer proposing to publish memoirs – Attorney-General obtaining interlocutory injunction against defendant newspapers restraining publication of material derived from officer's memoirs – Subsequent publication of memoirs outside jurisdiction – Whether protection of security service a ground for granting interlocutory injunction – Whether interlocutory injunction should be continued.

W, a former member of the British security service, who had had access to highly classified and sensitive information, proposed to publish his memoirs in Australia but the Attorney General, claiming that in doing so W would be committing flagrant breaches of his duties of secrecy and confidentiality owed to the Crown, obtained an interim injunction in Australia restraining him from publishing there. In June 1986 two national newspapers, the Guardian and the Observer, published an outline of certain allegations made by W in the manuscript of his memoirs. On 11 July the Attorney General obtained interlocutory injunctions in the Chancery Division restraining them from disclosing or publishing any information obtained by W in his capacity as a member of the British security service. The Attorney General intended to seek final injunctions in the same or similar terms, on the grounds that W owed to the Crown a life-long duty of confidentiality and non-disclosure relating to his work in the security service and would be in breach of that duty if he published his memoirs, that the newspapers were under the same duty and that publication would do great harm to the security service. The interlocutory injunctions did, however, except publication of material which was disclosed in open court in the Australian proceedings. In April 1987 three more newspapers, which had not been parties to the injunction proceedings, published further material derived or taken from the manuscript of W's memoirs. The Attorney General subsequently brought proceedings for criminal contempt against those newspapers. In July W's memoirs were published in the United States and became freely available there. Under United States law it was not possible for the Attorney General to obtain an injunction restraining publication. W's book was not disseminated commercially in the United Kingdom but no attempt was made to ban its importation and individual copies could be obtained in the United Kingdom. At the same time another national newspaper, the Sunday Times, published substantial extracts from W's book. Because of the changed circumstances arising from the publication in the United States, the availability in the United Kingdom of W's book and the disclosures in other newspapers, the Guardian and the Observer applied to have the interlocutory injunctions discharged. Meanwhile the Attorney General applied to commit the Sunday Times for contempt. The applications by the Guardian, the Observer and the Attorney General were heard together by the Vice-Chancellor who discharged the interlocutory injunctions made against the Guardian and the Observer and dismissed the application to commit the Sunday Times. On appeal by the Attorney General the Court of Appeal reversed the Vice-Chancellor's decision and reimposed the injunctions with variations. The newspapers appealed to the House of Lords. The Attorney General cross-appealed against the variation of the injunctions.

b Held (Lord Bridge and Lord Oliver dissenting) – The appeals would be dismissed and the cross-appeals allowed for the following reasons—

(1) (Per Lord Brandon and Lord Ackner) The Attorney General's case for obtaining a final injunction at trial restraining publication of material obtained by W as a member of the security service remained arguable notwithstanding the publication of W's book in the USA, and since the effect of discharging the interlocutory injunctions would be to deprive the Attorney General of any chance of success at trial it would be a denial of justice to refuse to allow the injunctions to continue until the action was heard (see p 347 g to j, p 351 c d f to h j to p 352 a, p 360 g, p 362 d and p 365 j, post).

(2) (Per Lord Templeman and Lord Ackner) The right of the public to be protected by the security service, the need to protect the efficient functioning of the security service in its defence of the realm and the need to prevent the disclosure of information received by W in confidence prevailed over the right of the public to be fully informed by the press and therefore the continuance of the interlocutory injunctions was necessary in the interests of national security (see p 355 c, p 356 a to c, p 358 c d, p 361 a to c, p 362 e h j to p 363 d and p 365 j, post).

(3) Furthermore, in the interests of preventing publication of W's memoirs the proviso to the interlocutory injunctions permitting the publication of material disclosed in the Australian proceedings would be deleted with the result that such material would fall within the ambit of the injunctions (see p 351 h, p 358 a to c and p 365 e f, post).

Motions

On 11 July 1986, on the application of Her Majesty's Attorney General, Millett J granted injunctions restraining the defendants, (1) Guardian Newspapers Ltd, Peter Preston and Richard Norton-Taylor and (2) The Observer Ltd, Donald Treford, David Leigh and Paul Lashmar, until after judgment in the action or further order from (a) disclosing or publishing or causing or permitting to be disclosed or published to any person any information obtained by Peter Maurice Wright in his capacity as a member of the British security service and which they knew, or had reasonable grounds to believe to have come or been obtained directly or indirectly from Mr Wright, and (b) attributing in any disclosure or publication made by them to any person any information concerning the British security service to Mr Wright whether by name or otherwise. On 25 July 1986 the Court of Appeal affirmed the injunctions but subject to, inter alia, the proviso that no breach of the order would be constituted by the disclosure or publication of any material disclosed in open court in the Supreme Court of New South Wales unless prohibited by the judge there sitting or which after the trial there in action no 4382 of 1985 was not prohibited from publication. On 1 May 1987 the defendants applied by notice of motion for the injunctions to be discharged. On 13 July 1987 the Attorney General applied for an order under RSC Ord 52 that Times Newspapers Ltd and Andrew Neil, the publisher and editor of the Sunday Times, be respectively fined and committed to prison for contempt of court in publishing articles entitled 'My MI5 memoirs, by Peter Wright' and 'Spycatcher—the book they tried to ban' published in the issue of the Sunday Times for 12 July 1987. The three motions were heard together. The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C.

John Mummery and Philip Havers for the Attorney General.

Desmond Browne for the Guardian.

Stephen Nathan for the Observer.

Anthony Lester QC and David Pannick for the Sunday Times.

SIR NICOLAS BROWNE-WILKINSON V-C. These are three applications. The first two are made by the Guardian and Observer newspapers to discharge interlocutory injunctions made against them in two orders made by Millett J on 11 July 1986 and confirmed (subject to minor modifications) by the Court of Appeal on 25 July 1986. The two orders made against the newspapers are in the same terms. As amended, the newspaper is restrained from—

(1) disclosing or publishing or causing or permitting to be disclosed or published to any person any information obtained by Peter Maurice Wright in his capacity as a member of the British Security Service and which they know, or have reasonable grounds to believe to have come or been obtained whether directly or indirectly from the said Peter Maurice Wright

(2) attributing, in any disclosure or publication made by them to any person any information concerning the British Security Service to the said Peter Maurice Wright whether by name or otherwise

(1) this Order shall not prohibit direct quotation of attributions to Peter Maurice Wright already made by Mr. Chapman Pincher in published works, or in a television programme or programmes broadcast by Granada Television

(2) no breach of this Order shall be constituted by the disclosure of publication of any material disclosed in open Court in the Supreme Court of New South Wales unless prohibited by the Judge there sitting or which, after the trial there in action no 4382 of 1985 is not prohibited from publication

[(3)] that no breach of this Order shall be constituted by a fair and accurate report of proceedings in (A) either House of Parliament in the United Kingdom whose publication is permitted by that House; or (B) a court of the United Kingdom sitting in public.'

The order gives the parties liberty to apply.

The third application is technically one by the Attorney General against the Sunday Times claiming an injunction restraining the further publication of extracts from Mr Wright's memoirs called Spycatcher, the ground of the application in that case being that such publication would constitute a contempt of court in that it would thwart or frustrate the orders of the Court of Appeal made against the Guardian and the Observer.

It is common ground that if I discharge the orders of 25 July 1986 made against the Guardian and the Observer, the Attorney General's claim for relief against the Sunday Times on the ground of contempt of court must also fail. I will therefore consider, first, the applications made by the Guardian and the Observer to vary or discharge the orders made against them.

The questions raised on this application are of very great importance, of public interest and of not a little legal difficulty. In any ordinary circumstances I would have reserved my judgment, but, due to the pressure of time and the desire of all parties (whatever the outcome) to go to the Court of Appeal, I must do my best to give my reasons at once.

The background facts are by now only too well known. It is not necessary for me to state them again in any detail. Shortly, Mr Wright was employed for many years in a senior capacity by the British security service. He retired in 1976 and now lives in Australia. Due to circumstances which I need not recount, he was determined to write and publish his memoirs in which he detailed allegations, amongst other things, of activities in the security service, some of which are allegedly illegal.

The publication by Mr Wright appears to be a most serious breach of the duty of confidence which, so the Crown alleges, might gravely prejudice the efficiency of the British security service.

When it became known that he was to write his memoirs the Crown began proceedings in Australia in the Supreme Court of New South Wales against Mr Wright and the publishers who were proposing to publish his memoirs. The claim in Australia is based on breach of the duty of confidentiality which exists between the Crown and its servants. As I understand it, that such a duty of confidentiality existed has been admitted at all times by all concerned. The question arising in the Australian case was whether the Crown had in some way lost its right to enforce that obligation of confidentiality. a

The subsequent history is long and rather involved. On Sunday, 22 June and Monday, 23 June 1986 the Observer and the Guardian published an outline of the allegations, so it was said, that were going to be made in the Australian proceedings. As a result the Crown, in the form of the Attorney General, moved for an order before Millett J, which, as I have said, was made on 11 July. On appeal by the newspapers Millett J's judgment was upheld. At that time there was no subsisting publication of any reports, let alone memoirs, of Mr Wright and the allegations that he made. It was the first breach in the security wall. b

The Guardian and the Observer obtained leave to appeal to the House of Lords and, unfortunately, due to circumstances beyond everybody's control, that appeal against the interlocutory order has not yet been heard and is not to be heard until, I think, November of this year. c

After the Court of Appeal order, the trial in Australia took place before Powell J, in November and December 1986. It received massive publicity in this country and, I believe, elsewhere. On 13 March 1987 Powell J gave judgment in New South Wales in which he rejected the Attorney General's claim for injunctions against Mr Wright and the publishers. The Attorney General immediately appealed to the Court of Appeal of New South Wales. That appeal is to commence being heard on 27 July this year. Pending the appeal Mr Wright and the publishers have given undertakings in the Australian courts not to publish the memoirs. d

On 27 April 1987 the Independent published a major summary of the allegations and statements made in Mr Wright's book, attributed them expressly to Mr Wright and, I think I am right in saying, included verbatim quotations from the book. On the same day the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News copied parts of what the Independent published. Similarly, at much the same time, I think on 28 and 29 April, the Melbourne Age and the Canberra Times in Australia published a major disclosure of what was contained in Spycatcher, the book. e

Prompted by the Independent's publication, the Attorney General moved to commit the editor of the Independent and to sequester its assets for contempt of court, on the grounds that the Independent by so publishing was frustrating the administration of justice, in that the publication by the Independent would frustrate and render worthless the orders which the Attorney General had obtained against the Guardian and the Observer. f

At much the same time the Guardian and the Observer themselves applied to discharge the injunctions made against them. The grounds of such application were that there was a change of circumstance, that the decision in the Australian court and the cross-examination of the Crown's leading witness, Sir Robert Armstrong, showed a material change in circumstance since the order was granted by Millett J and they additionally relied on the publication in the Independent. g

At much the same time, again, I think, on 3 May, the Washington Post published an extensive article about the contents of Spycatcher. h

On 7 May I started to hear the application by the Guardian and the Observer to discharge the order made against them. At that stage it seemed to me that the determination on the facts then before me of the question whether or not the order should be discharged was largely dependent on whether similar injunctions could directly or indirectly be made to restrict the rest of the English press from publishing the material which the Guardian and the Observer were publishing. I accordingly determined to deal with the contempt proceedings against the Independent on a preliminary point, to see whether or not the application by the Attorney General for contempt against the i Independent, not being a party enjoined by any order of the court, could succeed. I ruled that it could not succeed since no order was extant against the Independent (see A-G v Newspaper Publishing plc [1987] 3 All ER 276).

On 14 May Viking Penguin Inc, a subsidiary of an English company, announced its intention of publishing Spycatcher in the United States.

On 2 June I gave the judgment that I have mentioned, holding that the Independent was not in contempt. There was an immediate appeal to the Court of Appeal. On 15 June the Guardian and the Observer applied to restore the hearing designed to discharge the orders against them, relying on the threatened publication by Viking Penguin in the United States. I refused to deal with the matter until the Court of Appeal had given their decision on the contempt case.

On Sunday, 12 July, the Sunday Times contained the first instalment of the serialisation of very extensive extracts from the book Spycatcher itself. The editorial covering the publication stated that the serialisation in the Sunday Times was timed to coincide with the publication of the book in the United States and was also thought not to breach the law of this country, on the basis of the judgment that I had given, ie that the Independent was not in contempt. On the next day, 13 July, the Attorney General launched committal proceedings against the Sunday Times on the basis that the publication of the Spycatcher extracts was a contempt of court.

On 14 July Viking Penguin in the United States had copies of the book Spycatcher on sale throughout the United States. The putting of the book on sale took nobody by surprise. The Treasury Solicitor was aware of the matter. The evidence before me shows that steps were taken, first to try and persuade the English holding company to use its powers to dissuade Viking Penguin Inc in New York from publishing. The English company declined so to do, whether rightly or wrong it is not for me to say, on the basis that that would be interfering with the internal business of one of their subsidiaries. The Treasury Solicitor, as I understand it, also took advice whether proceedings in the United States court could succeed in restraining the publication of Spycatcher in the United States. He was told that he would not succeed, and no proceedings were started. However, a letter seeking to dissuade Viking Penguin Inc from publishing was sent, without success.

The putting of the book on sale on the United States produced, according to the evidence, this result. The book rapidly moved into the best seller category, being on display in bookshops throughout the United States, and in particular on the bookstall at John F Kennedy Airport. The book was selling like 'hot cakes', if I may use a colloquialism, particularly to people of English descent. The evidence shows that books purchased in the United States were being brought back from the United States to this country. One entrepreneurially-minded person brought a very substantial quantity of the books, sought to sell them in Parliament Square and, having failed there, was apparently last seen trying to sell them on the A40. The fact is that the book is available in this country and has been imported. In addition, it is possible by mail order and use of credit cards to order the book by telephone from the United States. The position is, therefore, that the total text of Spycatcher has now been published in the United States and is readily available to anybody in this country who has the necessary money and knowhow to obtain it from America.

The evidence discloses that the government considered whether they should use available powers to prevent the import of the book. The decision was taken not to prevent such import, on the grounds that it would be unworkable and ineffective.

On 15 July the Court of Appeal concluded the hearing of the Independent contempt proceedings, and announced that it was allowing the appeal against my decision, but without giving its reasons at that stage.

On 16 July the Attorney General applied for an injunction against the Sunday Times to restrain it from continuing the serialisation of Spycatcher in that paper. At the time the reasons of the Court of Appeal for holding that a contempt was possible were not available, and I granted an injunction against the Sunday Times prohibiting the publication last Sunday, such injunction to last over until Tuesday of this week.

On 17 July the Court of Appeal gave its reasons for holding that the Independent could be guilty of contempt (see A-G v Newspaper Publishing plc [1987] 3 All ER 276). Very shortly stated, they were these: that the publication of excerpts from Mr Wright's book was capable of being a contempt of court, as being the guilty act, provided that in publishing the Independent had the necessary intent to constitute contempt of court.

On the same day, I am told, in New South Wales an application was made by Mr Wright and the publishers to the Court of Appeal, which application is to be heard on 27 July, that they should in any event be released from their undertakings not to publish in Australia on the grounds of the publication by Viking Penguin of the whole book.

On 20 July these three applications started to be heard before me. That is the history to date.

The application by the Guardian and the Observer is made under the liberty to apply reserved in the orders. There is no dispute as to my jurisdiction to vary the order or as to the proper approach to the matter. It is common ground that the first thing that has to be shown is that there has been a material change of circumstances since July 1986. If there has been a material change of circumstances, then I must start afresh and determine whether, in the light of the circumstances which now exist, it is or is not appropriate to grant injunctions against the Guardian and the Observer.

As I understand it, counsel for the Attorney General did submit that there was no material change in circumstances justifying my reviewing and discharging the existing order. He points out that many of the material factors which existed in 1986 still exist. The injunction was purely an interlocutory injunction against the Guardian and the Observer until the trial of the action: that action against the Guardian and the Observer is still pending. The appeal to the House of Lords against the interlocutory order is still pending. The Australian action has not yet been determined, the appeal there is still pending. There is an undertaking prohibiting publication in Australia still. And he submits that the facts relied on in Sir Robert Armstrong's affidavit, which was the basis of the judgment given in July 1986, remain the same.

I am unable to accept those submissions. In my judgment, there has been a most substantial change in circumstances. In 1986, as I have said, the publication in the Guardian and the Observer was, so far as that court was aware and so far as I am aware, the only breach in the security walls. Otherwise the matter had not hit the press in any way, save that the action was pending in Australia. Of the allegations made by Mr Wright in the book there had been no other indication.

The case as made before Millett J in 1986 was based on Sir Robert Armstrong's affidavit, which was not contraverted as a matter of fact and on which there was no cross-examination, a fact to which the Court of Appeal attached importance. In para 10 of that affidavit, his first affidavit, he deposed as follows:

'The publication of any narrative prepared or contributed to by the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] which is based upon information available to him as a senior member of the British Security Service would be likely to cause unquantifiable damage by reason of the disclosures involved. Additionally, it will clearly damage the work of the British Security Service and thereby the national security of the United Kingdom in the following further respects:—(a) the intelligence and security services of friendly foreign countries with which the British Security Service is in liaison would be likely to lose confidence in its ability to protect classified information (b) the British Security Service depends upon the confidence and co-operation of other organisations and persons. That confidence would suffer serious damage should the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] reveal information of the nature described above (c) there would be a risk that other persons who are or have been employed in the British Security Service who have had access to similar information might seek to publish it.'

Millet J summed up the position as it was before him in these words:

a 'It is clear from those passages that the true nature of the Attorney General's objection is not to the fresh dissemination of allegations about past activities of security service of the kind outlined in the recent articles published by the defendants. They are ancient history and have been the subject of widespread previous publicity. The Attorney General's concern is twofold: first, that a former senior officer of the security service should publicise what he has learnt in the service, a fact which of itself has grave consequences for the proper working of the security service; and secondly, that he should disclose the part he played himself in the actions of the security service, disclosure which could provide information not previously known to foreign powers and endanger the effective discharge by the service of its responsibilities. Although I do not overlook or underestimate this second aspect, the whole thrust of Sir Robert's evidence seems to me to be directed principally to the first . . . If the appearance of confidentiality is essential to the effective operation of the security service, then damage will have been caused by the news that Mr Wright was even contemplating writing his memoirs. That is unfortunate, but cannot be helped. The damage can, however, be undone only if he is swiftly and effectively stopped, and seen to be stopped. There can be no objection to the disclosure of the fact that Mr Wright is seeking to publish information acquired by him as a member of the security service, and that the government is seeking to restrain him. But publication in the meantime of extracts from or summaries of what Mr Wright wishes to publish must cause the very harm which Sir Robert Armstrong describes.'

e Therefore, the approach taken by Millet J, which was expressly approved and upheld by the Court of Appeal, was that the essence of the claim then before him was that the Crown must be able to stop the publication and attribution to Mr Wright of his version of events occurring within the security service at the time when he was in a relationship of the strictest confidence. The only way that could be achieved was by granting an injunction effectively to demonstrate that the security service was leakproof.

f In my judgment, the facts I have already recounted show that that position has radically altered since 1986. First of all, the trial in Australia has taken place amid wide publicity. There has been the publication by the Independent which may well be a contempt of court. In any event, summaries and quotations from the book have appeared. There has been widespread publicity in the foreign press. The Sunday Times, again possibly in contempt of court, has published the first instalment. Those matters by themselves might not be sufficient. Certainly there must be some question whether publications in contempt of court can have any effect on the validity of an existing order. But, far more important than any of those, is the outstanding fact that the whole book Spycatcher has been published. It is not a question of part revelation of what is in it: the whole of it has been published in the United States and is available and has reached this country. The scale of publication appears to be that some 50,000 copies have already been printed and largely sold and a further order for 25,000 has been made.

h On the grant of the original injunction the judge had to weigh up various conflicting issues. The issue that he had before him at that stage was the freedom of the press to publish allegations of unlawful conduct by the security service as opposed to the harm done, outlined by Sir Robert Armstrong in his affidavit, in allowing an ex-member of the security service to publish his memoirs with all the consequent effects on the confidence of friendly intelligence services and the possible disclosure of damaging information to less friendly intelligence services.

j In the contempt proceedings in the Court of Appeal Sir John Donaldson MR graphically described the nature of confidential information. He explained why proceedings relating to confidential information fall into such a very special category, and in particular why an interlocutory injunction preserving the confidentiality is so critical. In A-G v Newspaper Publishing plc [1987] 3 All ER 276 at 291 he said:

'But if, pending the trial, the court allows publication, there is no point in having a trial since the cloak of confidentiality can never be restored. Confidential information is like an ice cube. Give it to the party who undertakes to keep it in his refrigerator and you still have an ice cube by the time the matter comes to trial. Either party may then succeed in obtaining possession of the cube. Give it to the party who has no refrigerator or will not agree to keep it in one, and by the time of the trial you just have a pool of water which neither party wants. It is the inherently perishable nature of confidential information which gives rise to unique problems.'

It was that factor which led the Court of Appeal, on the facts of that case, to hold that publication by another newspaper of the confidential information could destroy the subject matter of the claim by the Crown in the action against the Guardian and the Observer and, thereby, could constitute a contempt of court. The point is mentioned at several points by Sir John Donaldson MR. He said of the 1986 orders (at 296-297):

'The court was making an order for the preservation of the confidentiality of the Wright material pending the trial. Publication meanwhile, whether by those defendants or others, would deprive the Attorney General of his rights in advance of the trial, because information once published, at least on the scale achieved by publication in national newspapers, can never be truly confidential again . . . The publication of Mr Wright's memoirs in full at that time [that is, in 1986] would have prevented any effective adjudication on the Attorney General's claim in the Observer/Guardian action and the publications complained of, whilst not going to this length, were very far from being of minimal effect. To the extent that they placed Wright material into the public domain, which had not previously been there, they deprived the Attorney General of a part of the rights which he was asserting in these actions and to this extent made it impossible for the court to do justice between the parties.'

Speaking of an argument that to allow the contempt of court would offend the principles of natural justice, he said (at 302):

'What would offend those principles would be to hold that these newspapers were free to destroy the subject matter of the action between the Attorney General and the Guardian and Observer newspapers, incidentally whilst denying the defendants in that action the same right, thus depriving both the Attorney General and those newspapers of their right to have their dispute determined in accordance with law.'

To a similar effect was Lloyd LJ's judgment, where he said of the Independent's actions (at 307):

'It is not a mere usurpation of the court's function. It is the destruction, in whole or in part, of the subject matter of the action itself.'

Now all those statements were made in a different context, namely the context of contempt of court; the Court of Appeal made clear that in the Independent contempt proceedings they were not dealing with the impact of the Viking/Penguin publication or the Sunday Times publication. But the reasoning behind the decision in the contempt case seems to me to apply with great force on the applications before me. If it is right that publication of part of the Wright memoirs is destructive of the Attorney General's rights in the action against the Guardian and the Observer, the same must be true, and indeed truer, of the publication and availability of the whole of the memoirs even if published by a third party. The publication of the book in the United States had completely undermined the basis on which Millett J weighed the conflicting public interest in the way that he had to do. It has, to my mind most unfortunately, been demonstrated that the security service is not leakproof. Publication in the United States is publication and those friendly allied security services which, on Sir Robert Armstrong's evidence, rely to a considerable extent on the leakproofness of the British security service will have been disillusioned by that publication wherever it took place. Similarly all the allegations that Mr Wright has made in his memoirs and all the information that is sensitive if it reaches the hands of unfriendly powers is now available. It would be naive to suppose that those in the security field for other governments are less able to buy the book in New York than anybody else. Therefore, to my mind, there is a basic change in the very matters which were the foundation of the grant of the injunctions in 1986. They have ceased to apply; the injunction no longer preserves a position in which it can be said that the British security service is leakproof; the various matters which Sir Robert Armstrong deposed to in his affidavit are now known. Accordingly, I approach this case on the basis that there has been a material change of circumstances and I must now, in the light of present circumstances, decide how it is proper to exercise my discretion.

The Attorney General maintains that it is right, even in the present circumstances, to restrain the Guardian and the Observer from publication. The first question I have to determine is whether the Attorney General, in the changed circumstances, has an arguable case such that at the trial he might obtain an injunction against the Guardian and the Observer.

The contention by the Guardian and the Observer is that the publication of Spycatcher and its free availability to anyone in the United Kingdom who has the money and the skill to obtain it has completely changed the matter. They say the Crown no longer has an arguable case for an injunction at the trial. They say it is of the essence of any claim based on confidential information that the information should be confidential and remain confidential. They submit that if the information in question is known to an appreciable section of the public an injunction can no longer be granted against republication of such information. They rely on the well-known statement of Lord Greene MR in Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 413 at 415 where he said:

'I think that I shall not be stating the principle wrongly, if I say this with regard to the use of confidential information. The information, to be confidential, must, I apprehend, apart from contract, have the necessary quality of confidence about it, namely, it must not be something which is public property and public knowledge.'

They also rely on other decisions: Williams v Williams (1817) 3 Mer 157, 36 ER 61, the decision of the House of Lords in O Mustad & Son v S Allcock & Co Ltd and Dosen [1963] 3 All ER 416, [1964] 1 WLR 109 and Franchi v Franchi [1967] RPC 149.

They also rely on the statement by Lord Denning MR in Woodward v Hutchins [1977] 2 All ER 751 at 754-755, [1977] 1 WLR 760 at 764. In that case it was sought to restrain Mr Hutchins, the former press agent of the plaintiffs, from disclosing information. Lord Denning MR said:

'As Bridge LJ pointed out in the course of the argument, Mr Hutchins, as a press agent, might attend a dance which many others attended. Any incident which took place at the dance would be known to all present. The information would be in the public domain. There could be no objection to the incidents being made known generally. It would not be confidential information. So in this case the incident on this jumbo jet was in the public domain. It was known to all the passengers on the flight. Likewise with several other incidents in the series.'

Lord Denning MR is plainly indicating that once in the public domain no injunction will be granted.

In Commonwealth of Australia v John Fairfax & Sons Ltd (1980) 147 CLR 39 the Crown was claiming an injunction against the publishers of certain government documents which were plainly confidential and which were to be serialised in a newspaper. An injunction was granted but before the existence of the injunction was known certain newspapers and certain copies of the book had been distributed. Mason J held that the Crown was not entitled to an injunction on the grounds of breach of confidence, but went on and said (at 54):

'In any event, the question whether an injunction should be granted on this ground is resolved against the plaintiff by the publication that has taken, and is likely to take, place. The sales of the book already made, including those made to Indonesia and the United States, the countries most likely to be affected by its contents, and the publication of the first instalment in the two newspapers, indicate that the detriment which the plaintiff apprehends will not be avoided by the grant of an injunction. In other circumstances the circulation of about 100 copies of a book may not be enough to disentitle the possessor of confidential information from protection by injunction, but in this case it is likely that what is in the book will become known to an ever-widening group of people here and overseas, including foreign governments.'

It should be noted that the publication in that case was publication by the very defendants themselves and not by any third party.

That is a substantial body of authority supporting the proposition that once information has got into the public domain, as it has in the present case, the right to an injunction goes. However, counsel for the Attorney General submits that is far too simplistic a view, and I agree with him. He submits that there is here a difficult point of law which, on ordinary principles of American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd [1975] 1 All ER 504, [1975] AC 396, should await the trial of the action. He submits that a distinction must be drawn between the position at the date the confidential information was communicated and any later date. He accepts that if, at the date the information was communicated, it was not in fact confidential it cannot be confidential information capable of protection. That position, says counsel, is to be contrasted with one in which, there having been the imparting of confidential information to a confidant, there has been a subsequent publication, in whole or part, after the information has been imparted in confidence. He says that is the present case. The information acquired by Mr Wright was acquired in confidence. That duty of confidentiality remains and is a live one. That confidentiality having attached in Mr Wright, the fact that information subsequently becomes available to the public cannot alter the position. It remains confidential information; anybody obtaining it with notice of the fact that it was communicated in confidence himself comes under the same obligation not to disclose it further, whether or not at the time he learns of it it is still confidential information.

Counsel for the Attorney General relies heavily on two decisions of the Court of Appeal. The first is the decision in Speed Seal Products Ltd v Paddington [1986] 1 All ER 91, [1985] 1 WLR 1327. That was a case in which an injunction was claimed restraining the defendants from disclosing confidential information. The defendants applied to strike out the claim for an injunction on the ground that they, the defendants, by their own action had rendered the information unconfidential. The judge had struck out the claim for an injunction. The Court of Appeal reversed him and Fox LJ said ([1986] 1 All ER 91 at 94, [1985] 1 WLR 1327 at 1331):

'In relation to the protection of confidential information which has been published, there are three situations. (1) The publication is made by or with the consent of A (the person to whom the obligation is owed). In such a case, the owner of the confidential information, A, has given it to the public at large. B, who previously owed A a duty not to disclose the information is released from that duty (see O Mustad & Son v S Allcock & Co Ltd and Dosen [1963] 3 All ER 416, [1964] 1 WLR 109). He has the same rights as every other member of the public. (2) The publication is made by or with the consent of X (a stranger).'

a Fox LJ then read certain quotations from a judgment of Roskill J in Cranleigh Precision Engineering Ltd v Bryant [1964] 3 All ER 289 at 300, 302, [1965] 1 WLR 1293 at 1316, 1319 and continued ([1986] 1 All ER 91 at 95, [1985] 1 WLR 1327 at 1332):

b 'It appears, therefore, that the fact that a third party has published the information does not necessarily release B (the person who owed the duty of confidence) from his obligations. The court will prevent B from abusing his position of confidence. (3) The third case is where the publication is by or with the consent of B (the person who owes the obligation of confidence). He, I would suppose, cannot be in a better position than he would be if publication had been made by a stranger.'

c It should be noted that the Court of Appeal is there dealing with a case in which an injunction is sought against the person to whom the information is disclosed in confidence, that is to say the person who owed the direct duty to the confider.

d Counsel for the Attorney General also relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd [1982] 2 All ER 321, [1982] QB 1. In that case an injunction was granted against the original confidant of the information, a Mr Elstein, and also against Thames Television, who were employing Mr Elstein to publish the confidential material. That injunction was granted notwithstanding the fact that the information which they were using was apparently available from some other public source. It may well be that Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd is explicable on the basis of the springboard doctrine, namely that you cannot protect yourself from liability for the use of confidential information if you have used a compilation of that information as a springboard to get yourself into the market quicker.

e So stand the arguments. I find the difficulty of this subject arises largely from the fact that virtually all cases, like the present, have been decided under pressure of time. The principles on which the law of confidential information is based have never been clarified and remain, to my mind, obscure. That makes it difficult when, as I believe is the present case, the law is applicable to a different set of circumstances from those which have previously arisen. In most cases it is not necessary to determine what is the position of a third party coming into possession of the confidential information. The proceedings are usually between the impartor of the confidential information (the confider) and the person to whom confidential information was disclosed (the confidant). To the extent that third parties are involved, so far as I can see in all cases hitherto decided the third parties are those who have been assisting the confidant in committing the very breach of duty that he was precluded from doing, namely publication. For example, the third parties have been publishers or employers who have sought to use the confidential information of 'poached' employees. In such cases it really does not matter much whether the claim by the confider is based on contract, equitable rights, property rights or many other different forms of rights which have been mentioned in the cases. The matter only becomes of importance where one has the use of confidential information by a third party who has not himself been a party in any way to the revelation of the confidential information to the public. So, in the present case, it is not suggested, nor could it be, that the Guardian and the Observer have in any sense been involved in any activity with Mr Wright leading to the publication of his book. Anything they would wish to publish in the future would be obtainable from the public domain from Spycatcher itself. They have not aided and abetted Mr Wright in his breach of duty. That seems to me to be a new case not covered by authority.

f As at present advised I consider that the law as to the enforceability of rights of confidence against third parties would be best analysed in the traditional terms of equitable rights over property. This is a field in which the experience of equity has spread over many centuries in seeking to enforce property rights against others who have come into possession of the property. The position, as I see it, is this. Information as such is not property in any sense; it is available to the whole world. If, however, it is communicated in circumstances which impose a duty of confidence on a confidant, the information becomes subject to certain specific rights. Those rights may arise under contract between the confidant and the confider, or they may arise by way of some fiduciary duty enforceable in equity. That duty as between confidant and confider, as in many other spheres, will be specifically enforceable in equity. The personal obligation as between the two original parties may, therefore, give rise to a property right, i.e. an equitable interest in the property in relation to which the duty exists. That would apply whether the property was tangible or intangible. The equitable interest of the confider in the confidential information would, in accordance with ordinary equitable principles, be enforceable against the whole world save the bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the confider's rights to confidentiality. So far as I can see, such a formulation covers all the cases to which I have been referred. a

As between the confider and the confidant there may be a duty, either under contract or in some other way, which remains enforceable by injunction notwithstanding that the information in relation to which it arose has since come into the public domain, as in Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd and Speed Seal Products Ltd v Paddington. The same would be true of any person who knowingly participated in the dishonest breach of trust, that is the unlawful disclosure by the confidant of the information, for example the publisher or the employer of the employee who is disclosing trade secrets in breach of obligation. Such a person, on ordinary equitable principles as set out in Barnes v Addy (1874) LR 9 Ch App 244, would be liable himself for participating in the dishonest breach of trust and to have an injunction granted against him even though the information had otherwise ceased to be wholly confidential. That would cover the position of Thames Television in Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd. b

If, as in a number of the cases, the confider himself had been the person who has made public the information which he subsequently claims to be confidential, on ordinary principles he is precluded from enforcing an obligation of confidentiality when he himself has breached it. That, as I understand it, is O Mustad & Son v S Allcock & Co Ltd and Dosen. A third party, learning of information which is still confidential, and who has knowledge of the fact that it is confidential, will himself be bound by the equitable right of the confider because he has obtained a species of property, or quasi-property, namely the confidential information, with notice of the confider's rights and otherwise than by way of purchase for value. On ordinary equitable principles the duty of confidence would be enforceable against him. That approach is clearly reflected, although without full argument, in the judgment of Nourse LJ, where he said ([1986] CA Transcript 696): c

'As for the newspapers and any other third party into whose hands the confidential information comes, an injunction can be granted against them on the simple ground that equity gives relief against all the world, including the innocent, save only a bona fide purchaser for value without notice.'d

If, on the other hand, a third party who is not a participator in the confidant's breach of duty receives information which at the time of receipt is in the public domain, that is to say, he gets it from the public domain, in my judgment he would not, as at present advised, come under any duty of confidence. Once the information has got into the public domain it again ceases to be property in which any right can subsist. It is again information available freely to everybody; nobody has a right in it. There is no longer trust property in which the confider can have an interest. That analysis, if right, would provide an answer to the present case. In this case the Guardian and the Observer, if they go out tomorrow and buy Spycatcher, will be buying something which is public knowledge and publicly available. They will acquire that information at a time when it is public information and information in which the Crown no longer can have any property. They would accordingly not be subject to any injunction against them to restrain further republication of what is already public property. e

However, that is simply my view on what is a novel and difficult point of law. Counsel f

- for the Attorney General quite rightly presses me with the fact that the duty of third parties as to confidential information cannot necessarily be properly defined in terms of property interests. He relies particularly on Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 All ER 8 at 11, [1969] 1 QB 349 at 361–362, where Lord Denning MR indicates that the confider's right is not a property right, but a right of a special kind which affects the conscience of the person who receives the information with knowledge that it has originally been communicated in confidence. He also relies on Boardman v Phipps [1967] 3 All ER 721 [1967] 2 AC 46, where there was a dispute between their Lordships whether information could or could not be property at all.

- The submission of counsel for the Attorney General is that there is a triable case along the following lines. He says that if information has been impressed with a duty of confidentiality, and somebody acquires that information knowing that it was so communicated originally, then any person acquiring that information with that knowledge himself comes under a duty not further to disclose it, and that duty exists whether or not the information is otherwise in the public sphere. For myself I have grave doubts whether that is good law, even on the analysis of Lord Denning MR. It would seem to me surprising if a duty of confidence could be imposed for the first time on the third party at a time when the information was no longer confidential. In the present case it would lead to strange results. The businessman who bought Spycatcher at John F Kennedy Airport, read it on the flight back, knowing that it was an unlawful revelation by Mr Wright of his experience in the security service, would, I think counsel had to accept, come under a duty not to tell his wife about it when he got home. Counsel for the Attorney General said, and obviously quite rightly, that nobody would start proceedings for an injunction in such a case: a claim for an injunction would only be made against a widespread republication such as by the press. But I find it a strange state of the law that the gentleman could be under a legal obligation not to tell his wife and be doing an unlawful act if he did it. Likewise, in the much more common case of trade secrets. If a trade secret imparted to an employee was published by the employee quite generally, and somebody else in the same trade knowing that, but in no sense dealing with the confidant, learnt of the trade process which had been imparted in confidence, but had now been made public, presumably, if the submission of counsel for the Attorney General is right, the third party could be restrained from the use of that information, even though he obtained it from an entirely public and separate source, because he knew that it had originally been communicated in confidence.

- I have great reservations whether the law as proposed by the Attorney General is good law. But I do accept what counsel for the Attorney General says, namely that I have been trespassing in novel fields raising difficult points of law. Loyally following the principle of American Cyanamid I must hold that being such a point of law I should not determine it on this application. I must assume, with however much reservation, that there is here an arguable point of law available to the Attorney General that he will get an injunction at trial, notwithstanding the publication of Spycatcher. That throws me on to the ordinary American Cyanamid principles, an arguable case having been shown.

- As in 1986, damages would be an ineffective and inappropriate remedy for the Attorney General. An injunction is the only thing that is any good to him. Likewise (although it does not seem to arise in this case since there is no cross-undertaking in damages) damages would be no compensation to the newspapers if they were restrained from publishing what is by any standards at the moment very hot news indeed.

- So one has to determine where the balance of convenience or, as Sir John Donaldson MR prefers it, the balance of inconvenience lies. The principle is that, where there is confidentiality of information and that is in conflict with a public interest of some sort, then the court should, other things being equal, favour the preservation of confidentiality, unless convinced that the other public interest outweighs it. The process is one which is laid down by Sir John Donaldson MR in the earlier 1986 case, where he says (136 NLJ 799 at 800):

'Where there is confidentiality, the public interest in its maintenance has to be overborne by a countervailing public interest, if publication is not to be restrained. In some cases the weight of the public interest in the maintenance of the confidentiality will be small and the weight of the public interest in publication will be great. But in weighing these countervailing public interests or, perhaps more accurately, those countervailing aspects of a single public interest, both the nature and circumstances of the confidentiality and the nature and circumstances of the proposed publication have to be examined with considerable care. This is what is sometimes referred to as the principle of proportionality—[that] is the restraint or lack of restraint proportionate to the overall assessment of the public interest.'

It is that approach that I adopt in dealing with the case.

Despite the undue length of this judgment, I have not set out all the background facts that exist in this case. I have read a very large amount of material on it, and in exercising my discretion I pay, I hope, full regard to all the circumstances of the case. I have certainly tried to take them into account in reaching my decision. However, there seem to me to be certain factors which are of special importance in deciding what is the right exercise of discretion.

Firstly, in favour of granting an injunction, it seems to me material that the injunction now sought is still an interlocutory injunction pending trial. It is not a final order locking out the press from reporting this matter, if at the trial it is held that the Attorney General is not entitled to an injunction. Moreover, the appeal is pending in the House of Lords against the original injunction.

Secondly, it is right to bear in mind that the allegations made by Mr Wright in Spycatcher are in a number of respects 'old hat'. They have been bandied around, some would think ad nauseam, in Mr Chapman Pincher's book and in subsequent articles. There is nothing very new about them. There is nothing urgent about them, in the sense that they concern recent events. I also bear in mind that it is no fault of the Crown that this information has come into the public domain to the extent it has. The Crown has done everything that it thought itself able to do to stop publication worldwide of these memoirs.

I also take into account what I think flows from the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Independent contempt case (A-G v Newspaper Publishing plc [1987] 3 All ER 276), namely that, if I continue the injunction against the Guardian and the Observer, that will probably be effective to prevent publication by any elements of the press in the United Kingdom, since after the Court of Appeal decision on contempt publication by any other newspaper is likely to be held to be a contempt. There is, therefore, no discriminatory effect in injuncting simply two newspapers out of the whole of the press.

I take further into account that in some respects these proceedings are ancillary to the Australian proceedings. There has been a trial on the merits there, there has been a judgment on the merits, and there is to be an appeal on the merits. There is an injunction or undertaking running still in Australia. In some respects it would be unusual if in ancillary proceedings I were to discharge the injunction pending the determination of the Australian appeal. But I think that is of limited force. The injunction in Australia applies to the person I have called the 'confidant', namely Mr Wright, and somebody who aided and abetted Mr Wright, namely the publisher in Australia. I think that different considerations apply there.

I next take into account a fact which is unpalatable but true, that to permit publication would be to admit that this court was unable to safeguard secrets of great public importance. And let nobody underestimate how important these secrets are. There seems to have been a temptation to treat this case as an unreasonable pursuit by the government of unreasonable ends. That is not a view I share. The revelation of secrets of a security

- agent, it seems to me, is highly undesirable. I therefore think it is most regrettable, if it
- a proves to be the case, that there is no way in which the court can preserve that confidentiality. On the other hand, it seems to me idle to shut one's eyes to the realities of the position. The book has been published. Its contents are known in this country. They are available to whoever wants to buy them. Taking Sir John Donaldson MR's 'ice cube', it is not that either of the parties has melted it. It has been put in a refrigerator, but the American publication is as though somebody had turned off the refrigerator: the
- b ice-cube has melted, without the intervention either of the Crown or of the defendants, the Guardian and the Observer. The reality of the matter is that under American law this confidentiality was not preservable. The other factor is that this court's jurisdiction does not extend beyond these shores and beyond the people who are here. It is the combination of publication abroad and the nature of the confidential information which together have led to the result, which in my judgment is undoubtedly true, that this court cannot
- c now secure what the Crown wish to achieve, namely that the book is not published.

- There remains what counsel for the Attorney General urges is the persisting public interest, namely to prevent general dissemination of the contents of this book through the press within the United Kingdom. By discouraging general dissemination those who are tempted to follow Mr Wright's example in the future and write their memoirs hot from the security service will not find it such a satisfactory or profitable business. I think
- d there is force in that. I think that the ability to restrain the unauthorised use of confidential memoirs by those who do not mind abusing their confidence, so as to discourage others from doing it, is a real point. I do not think it can just be swept aside.

- The United Kingdom is likely to be the best market for anybody writing these memoirs, and to discourage the use of that market by such people would be, I think, a
- e discouragement. But I confess that I find that element of 'pour encourager les autres' a very limited public interest as compared with what was under consideration in 1986. That is the public interest which has to be put into the balance in the weighing operation. It has to be borne in mind that discouragement can also be provided by the course that the government is now pursuing, of claiming an account of profits. There is also evidence before me to suggest that if the contract of employment with members of the security
- f service adopted a rather less broad brush and were limited so as to preclude publication containing material not approved by the security service, that would be a contract which would be enforceable in the United States of America, so that the long-term harm in other cases may not be so great. 'The American route' may not be open for long.

Those are the factors as I see them in favour of granting an injunction.

- On the other side, I see these as the primary factors. Since the full text of Spycatcher is
- g now available in this country to anyone with the money to get it, a large part of the purpose of the Attorney General's proceedings in this case has now been defeated. I echo the words in the contempt proceedings in the Court of Appeal: the purpose has been destroyed. That that has happened is not, as I understand it, the fault of the Guardian or the Observer. They have not assisted the publication by Mr Wright of his book. The matter has been a matter of acute public discussion and concern on the material that is
- h already available. In some respects it is a cause célèbre. It seems to me undesirable in those circumstances of half knowing that the matter should stay in that state of half-light unless there are compelling reasons against full publication. I also think that the freedom of the press, and counsel for the Attorney General accepts this, is a matter of very great public importance in its own right. It is true that it is not absolute. If there is a countervailing public interest, then the freedom of the press cannot prevail. One of the
- j safeguards of our country and our system is to have a press that can search matters out, disclose them, and give rise to informed public discussion. In my judgment, in weighing the harm to the public by the discouragement of future memoirs by future members of the security services one has to bear in mind what to my mind is a very important factor, namely, that one should not restrain publication in the press unless it is unavoidable.

I think that is particularly so in the present case where the Guardian and the Observer allege that what they wish to publish discloses iniquity and unlawful conduct in the public service. Other pressures short of publication, it is said, have not lead to an investigation. They wish to publish. a

I should mention a suggestion which I understood counsel for the Attorney General to make, namely, that although the information might not be restrained if a private individual were going to publish it, it should be restrained if the press were going to publish it because that would do so much more damage. I entirely accept that it would do more damage, but that seems to me the negation of the freedom of the press. If the press is precluded from saying things that other people are not precluded from, that seems to be not a freedom of the press but an additional fetter on it. b

Finally, I have borne in mind, rightly or wrongly, one further factor of the public interest. I think the public interest requires that we have a legal system and courts which command public respect. It is frequently said that the law is an ass. I, of course, do not agree. But there is a limit to what can be achieved by orders of the court. If the courts were to make orders manifestly incapable of achieving their avowed purpose, such as to prevent the dissemination of information which is already disseminated, the law would to my mind indeed be an ass. Counsel for the Guardian likened the Crown's attitude to Canute forbidding the tide to come in, and I confess there have been occasions recently when I have felt like the little Dutch boy being asked to put a finger in the hole in the dyke when in fact the whole embankment has broken down two hundred yards upstream. The checking of small leakages when in fact the whole of the news is out in the form of a book is likely in my judgment to give rise to a degree of lack of respect for the court seeking to achieve the unachievable. c

The truth of the matter is that in the contemporary world of electronics and jumbo jets news anywhere is news everywhere. But whilst the news is international, the jurisdiction of this court is strictly territorial. Once the news is out by publication in the United States and the importation of the book into this country, the law could, I think be justifiably accused of being an ass and brought into disrepute if it closed its eyes to that reality and sought by injunction to prevent the press or anyone else from repeating information which is now freely available to all. It is an old maxim that equity does not act in vain. To my mind that is good law and the court should not make orders which would be ineffective to achieve what they set out to do. d

For those reasons I prefer, and on balance with considerable hesitation, the arguments against granting any further injunction in this matter. I believe the matter to be quite nicely weighted and in no sense obvious. But, doing the best I can with the materials, and in particular the matters I have stressed, I do not think that a sufficient degree of public interest has been shown in the present case. True it is that the presumption is in favour of confidentiality, but the public interest to be weighed in terms of the security service in this case now seems to be so small as compared with the public interest in freedom of the press and the other matters I have mentioned that I do not think that presumption can prevail. e

For those reasons I will discharge the orders against the Guardian and the Observer. It follows that the relief by way of injunction to restrain the contempt of court against the Sunday Times will also fail. f

I would finally like to stress two points. I have been dealing, and dealing only, with the case of the Guardian and the Observer where they, as third parties not involved in the publication of the work itself, have hitherto been restrained from reproducing information now freely available to the general public. I would not like anything I have said to be taken as directly applicable to or indeed as meant to apply to the pending application in Australia to discharge the undertakings given by Mr Wright and the publishers there. In the terminology I have used, Mr Wright was the confidant, the person who undertook directly the duty of confidence which he is proposing to break. g a His publishers are directly involved in that publication. To my mind such a case raises different considerations from those that I have been dealing with.

b Secondly, I would not like anybody to think that this judgment is a charter for other members of the security services who are considering publishing their memoirs. It may well be that anybody who, unlike Mr Wright, is in this country and subject to the jurisdiction of this court, who seeks to join in the business of publishing memoirs of confidential information in breach of his or her duty would be enjoined from breaching that duty and suffer the consequences if they chose to break it. I say again that I do not underestimate the seriousness of what Mr Wright has done in this case. I do not in any sense criticise, even if it were my job, the seriousness with which the government has pursued this case. Anybody else who thinks that they can play fast and loose with the public security of this country should not treat this case as suggesting that they will be free to do so, unless they choose to leave this country for good.

c For those reasons, I will discharge the injunction.

Injunctions against the Guardian and the Observer discharged. Application for continuing injunction against the Sunday Times dismissed.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR.

f The Attorney General has appealed against orders made by Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C at 2 pm on Wednesday, 22 July after a hearing which lasted a little over two days. This court sat 20 minutes later on the same day in order that we might be told what papers to read before the oral argument, which began at 10 am yesterday. The time is now 3 pm on Friday, 24 July. I understand that if any party is sufficiently dissatisfied with our decision to wish to appeal to the House of Lords, their Lordships would probably be prepared to entertain such an appeal on Monday, 27 July, which, coincidentally, is the day on which a related appeal is to be heard in the Court of Appeal of New South Wales.

g I mention this chronology in the possibly vain hope that it may help to dispel the popular myth that the courts are slow to reach decisions in situations of real urgency. This has been such a situation because the Sunday Times wishes to know at the earliest possible moment whether it can resume its serialisation of Spycatcher, and the media generally have a need to have all uncertainty removed concerning what they may or may not publish.

The applications to the Vice-Chancellor

j The Observer and the Guardian newspapers applied to discharge the injunctions granted by Millett J on 11 July 1986, as varied by this court on 25 July 1986. In each case the injunctions had been sought and obtained on behalf of Her Majesty's government suing in the name of the Attorney General. The Sunday Times has appeared to support the Observer and the Guardian, as it is entitled to do, because it is affected by these injunctions.

The injunctions

These injunctions have been in force from 25 July 1986. They are in the following terms: the newspaper is restrained and the editor is restrained from— a

(1) disclosing or publishing or causing or permitting to be disclosed or published to any person any information obtained by Peter Maurice Wright in his capacity as a member of the British Security Service and which they know, or have reasonable grounds to believe to have come or been obtained whether directly or indirectly, from the said Peter Maurice Wright b

(2) attributing in any disclosure or publication made by them to any person any information concerning the British Security Service to the said Peter Maurice Wright whether by name or otherwise

(1) this Order shall not prohibit direct quotation of attributions to Peter Maurice Wright already made by Mr. Chapman Pincher in published works or in a television programme or programmes broadcast by Granada Television c

(2) no breach of this Order shall be constituted by the disclosure or publication of any material disclosed in Open Court in the Supreme Court of New South Wales unless prohibited by the Judge there sitting or which, after the trial there in action no 4382 of 1985 is not prohibited from publication d

[(3)] that no breach of this Order shall be constituted by a fair and accurate report of proceedings in (A) either House of Parliament in the United Kingdom whose publication is permitted by that House; or (B) a court of the United Kingdom sitting in public.

Events since July 1986

It is not necessary to elaborate on the general background to this litigation, as it is well known and was set out in some detail in the judgment of this court given on Friday, 17 July 1987 in the contempt proceedings brought against the Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News (see A-G v Newspaper Publishing plc and ors [1987] 3 All ER 276). However, I should list the matters relied on by the applicant newspapers as justifying the discharge of the July 1986 injunctions. They are: (1) the trial in Australia of the action brought by Her Majesty's government against Mr Wright and his Australian publishers, which received wide publicity in this country; (2) the decision of Powell J that Her Majesty's government was not entitled to a final injunction, although there was no challenge to their right to have publication of Spycatcher prohibited in Australia pending the result of the appeal to be heard by the Court of Appeal of New South Wales this Monday, 27 July 1987; (3) the publication by the Independent on 27 April of a summary of the allegations made in Mr Wright's book, including some quotations from that book; (4) the publication on 27 or 28 April 1987 in the Melbourne Age and the Canberra Times of disclosures of what is said to be contained in Spycatcher; (5) the publication of the first instalment of the serialisation of Spycatcher in the Sunday Times on 12 July 1987; (6) the publication in the United States on 14 July 1987 of an edition of Spycatcher by Viking Penguin Inc of New York. The initial print run was 50,000 copies, but there is to be a further printing; (7) the failure by Her Majesty's government to place import restrictions on this edition of Spycatcher, as a result of which some copies have been brought to this country by travellers and advertisements have appeared inviting British residents to order copies for posting to them in this country; (8) a very recent publication by the Washington Post of a 40,000 word summary of Spycatcher. e

The stage which the primary proceedings have reached

The primary proceedings, to which all other proceedings are in a sense ancillary, although the contempt proceedings do not necessarily stand or fall with them, are the actions by Her Majesty's government against the Observer and the Guardian claiming permanent injunctions substantially in the terms of the interlocutory injunctions with a which this appeal is concerned. No date for trial has yet been fixed and the purpose of the interlocutory injunctions was to limit the damage suffered by all the parties concerned, pending a full and final hearing of the mutually inconsistent claims of the government on the one hand and the Observer and the Guardian on the other. Their purpose, in a word, was damage limitation for the benefit of whomsoever should later be found to have been right when the action had been fully tried. By contrast, the Australian proceedings have been fully tried and the Australian courts, unlike our courts, are in a position to determine the rights of the parties which have appeared before them. This does not, of course, dispense with the need for a full trial here for at least two reasons. The first is that none of the defendant newspapers have been parties to the Australian proceedings. The second is that the Australian courts will be applying Australian law in an Australian context and, in particular, in the context of the public interest from an Australian point of view.

The Vice-Chancellor's decision

The Vice-Chancellor held that there had been a material change of circumstances since July 1986 and that, as a consequence, he had to re-exercise the court's discretion to restrain the Guardian and the Observer from publication. I venture to doubt whether this was the right approach. The government had obtained an injunction in terms approved by this court. The proper question was not whether, if the government had been applying for an injunction in July 1987, it would have succeeded, but whether, in the light of events between July 1986 and July 1987, justice required that the existing injunctions be wholly discharged or varied in any particular.

e The triable issue

Consistently with this approach, the Vice-Chancellor first asked himself whether there was an arguable case that the government might obtain a permanent injunction at the conclusion of the full trial, which has yet to come. The point was fully argued before him and his conclusion was that the relevant issue was whether the confider (the government) had rights of confidentiality against third parties (the Observer and the Guardian) who had not themselves been a party in any way to the revelation of the confidential information to the public by the confidant (Mr Wright). He said that this was something which was not covered by any reported decision of the courts and that, whilst he might doubt whether the confider had such rights, it was certainly arguable that the government has such rights and would obtain an injunction at the trial notwithstanding the publication of Spycatcher.

g This conclusion is accepted for the purposes of this appeal.

The balancing exercise

The Vice-Chancellor rightly concluded that an award of damages to neither party would provide an adequate or appropriate remedy for any wrongs suffered pending the trial of the action. He therefore addressed himself to the question of whether the justice of the case called for the continuation of the injunction. Both parties may have been adopting extreme positions, which they did not wish to weaken. However that may be, it seems to have been the fact that neither they nor the Vice-Chancellor considered the option of modifying the injunction. As the matter was presented to him, and as he appears to have perceived it, it was all or nothing. In this I think he was in error.

j The Vice-Chancellor expressed his reasons for deciding to discharge the injunctions in the following terms. [Sir John Donaldson MR then set out the passage at p 329 j to p 333 c of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment and continued:]

The appellate function

Before turning to the submissions of the parties I remind myself that the appeal is against the exercise of a judicial discretion and it is not sufficient that we may think that, faced with this problem, we would have exercised the discretion differently. Initially our function is one of review only (see Hadmor Productions v Hamilton [1982] 1 All ER 1042 at 1046, [1983] 1 AC 191 at 220). This court, as an appellate court, may not intervene, unless it is satisfied that the judge exercised his discretion on a wrong principle or that, the judge's decision being so plainly wrong, he must have exercised his discretion wrongly (see G v G [1985] 2 All ER 225 at 228–229, [1985] 1 WLR 647 at 652). a

The newspapers' case

There is no cross-appeal and no respondent's notice seeking to uphold the decision under appeal on different or additional grounds. The newspapers' case is thus essentially that which the judge upheld. b

The Attorney General's case

Counsel for the Attorney General advanced three interlocking and cumulative submissions. c

1. Inconsistency. The judge's judgment contained, he said, a fundamental internal inconsistency in that, having held that the government had an arguable case for a permanent injunction at the trial, he failed to provide any available protection for that potential right. Consciously or subconsciously, whilst holding that the government had an arguable case, he was being swayed by his personal doubts whether that case was well founded in law. The Vice-Chancellor said (p 328, ante): d

'In this case the Guardian and the Observer, if they go out tomorrow and buy Spycatcher, will be buying something which is public knowledge and publicly available. They will acquire that information at a time when it is public information and information in which the Crown no longer can have any property. They would accordingly not be subject to any injunction against them to restrain further republication of what is already public property.' e

2. Finality. The effect of discharging the injunction would be to render any injunction granted at a much later date after a full trial an empty gesture without substance or effect, because of the publications which would have occurred meanwhile. f

3. Futility. The Vice-Chancellor, having rightly directed himself that the law would be regarded as an ass and be brought into disrepute if the courts ever closed their eyes to reality and that, in the words of the maxim, 'equity does not act in vain', failed to analyse correctly what could be done by way of effective injunctive relief at the present juncture. g

Conclusion

I have come to the firm conclusion that the Vice-Chancellor erred in his reasoning and that his exercise of discretion was 'wrong' within the meaning of the authorities in circumstances in which it becomes both the right and the duty of an appellate court to substitute its own exercise of discretion for that of the trial judge. h

The starting point is that any information concerning the British security service which was acquired by Mr Wright as a senior officer of that service was impressed with the seal of confidentiality, the confider being Her Majesty's government and the confidant being Mr Wright.

If the matter stopped there, the fact that, in breach of his duty of trust, he published information which purported to be so acquired would not place such information 'in the public domain' in the sense that the seal of confidentiality would be broken and anyone would be free to use it or republish it. (I say 'purported to be so acquired' because there is no evidence of how much, if any, of the text of Spycatcher has any basis of truth. For aught I know it may all be true or it may all represent the embittered imaginings of an elderly man in poor health or there may be some mixture of fact and fiction. Furthermore, where national security is concerned, the confider cannot be expected to i confirm or deny the accuracy of individual passages or to confirm or deny their sensitivity.)

I invited counsel for the Guardian to consider the case of a palace servant who, in breach of his duty of confidentiality, published his memoirs in the United States, and I suggested that there could be no doubt but that, even if he could not under United States law be restrained from further publication, he would be restrained in this jurisdiction both from republishing and from further publishing. Counsel did not dissent, but suggested that the servant would have been employed under a contract making express provision for a lifelong obligation of confidentiality. For my part I do not accept that a palace servant has a greater obligation of confidentiality than that of a senior officer of the security service.

But this is not the straightforward case of palace servant. The newspapers' case is and always has been that part of the matters with which Mr Wright deals in Spycatcher (he says a small part) were already in the public domain by reason of publications to which the government had tacitly agreed. This is not accepted, but for the purposes of the balancing exercise, I have to assume that this might prove to be the case. I shall not, however, assume that it will prove to be the case. The second part of their case is and always has been that Mr Wright has revealed unlawful conduct on the part of the service or some of its officers and that the public interest in the exposure of what is quaintly known as 'iniquity' overrides the public interest in confidentiality, even when the need for confidentiality is so overwhelmingly and obviously necessary in the national interest. Here again I have to remind myself that, whilst I must assume that this might prove to be the case, it might not, and, in any event, mere allegations of iniquity can never override confidentiality. They must be proved and the burden of proof will lie on the newspapers.

Subject to the effect of events subsequent to July 1986, these considerations are those which led to this court affirming the existing injunctions and, on ordinary principles, would require both the Vice-Chancellor and this court to reaffirm them. Only the House of Lords could take a different view.

So I turn to those subsequent events. The newspapers contend that during this 12-month period a mass of material emanating directly or indirectly from Mr Wright has entered the public domain and so lost the seal of confidentiality. To use the words of Lord Greene MR in Saltman Engineering Co Ltd v Campbell Engineering Co Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 413 at 415, it has become 'public property and public knowledge' and so has lost 'the necessary quality of confidence about it'. Or, to use the Vice-Chancellor's phrase (p 327, ante): 'Anything they [the newspapers] would wish to publish in the future would be obtainable from the public domain from Spycatcher itself.'

For my part I accept that to the extent that these publications have been read the information to which they relate has become public knowledge, but not that it has entered the public domain, so losing the seal of confidentiality, because that only occurs when information not only becomes a matter of public knowledge, but also public property. The only post-July 1986 publication which could render confidential information public property is that revealed in the Australian proceedings or in the United Kingdom Parliament. On the hypothesis that the government would otherwise successfully establish its right to confidentiality at the trial, it will be able to require the court to treat all other publications as tainted by the fact that Mr Wright was their source and so incapable of becoming public property. This, of course, applies in particular to the publication of Spycatcher itself, which counsel for the Attorney General described, not inaccurately and in a very happy phrase, as 'just Mr Wright in hard covers'.

For these reasons I do not consider that the government's right to interlocutory protection for its claim to confidentiality is in any material respects dented by the events since July 1986. This does not, however, establish that the Vice-Chancellor reached a wrong decision because, as he so rightly said, equity does nothing in vain. In homely language, the law and the courts do not make empty gestures. So I ask myself: how empty a gesture would it be to maintain this injunction?

This takes me back to the grounds put forward by the government when seeking the injunction in July 1986 and to para 10 of Sir Robert Armstrong's affidavit of 9 September 1985, sworn in the Australian proceedings and exhibited to Mr M L Saunders's affidavit of 27 June 1986. This was in the following terms:

'The publication of any narrative prepared or contributed to by the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] which is based upon information available to him as a senior member of the British Security Service would be likely to cause unquantifiable damage by reason of the disclosures involved. Additionally, it will clearly damage the work of the British Security Service and thereby the national security of the United Kingdom in the following further respects:—(a) the intelligence and security services of friendly foreign countries with which the British Security Service is in liaison would be likely to lose confidence in its ability to protect classified information (b) the British Security Service depends upon the confidence and co-operation of other organisations and persons. That confidence would suffer serious damage should the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] reveal information of the nature described above (c) there would be a risk that other persons who are or have been employed in the British Security Service who have had access to similar information might seek to publish it.'

Quite apart from other publications, the publication of Spycatcher itself will have given every national intelligence agency information, whether true or false, which cannot be retrieved by injunction or otherwise. To grant or maintain an injunction with this object in view would be a totally empty gesture and wholly wrong.

But the claim that publication, or further publication, would damage the work of the British security service and thereby the national security of the United Kingdom requires more careful study. The actual protection of national secrets was, of course, a major ground for the original claim to injunctive protection. That can no longer be achieved, but this secondary ground which is elaborated in paras (a), (b) and (c) is not to be underrated and, even if part of it may have been undermined, it is still necessary to consider whether what remains would justify interlocutory injunctive relief of some sort or whether that would be an empty gesture, rightly to be regarded as the law making an ass of itself.

All three paragraphs are interlinked, but paras (a) and (b) involve the proposition that the co-operation which may be expected from the intelligence and security services of friendly foreign countries will be adversely affected to the extent that they believe that there might be a repetition of Mr Wright's conduct by another officer or officers. It is no doubt with this consideration in mind that Her Majesty's government has relentlessly sought to limit the publication of Wright material, although it cannot achieve the impossible if the laws of foreign countries do not provide the necessary assistance. I make that observation as a statement of fact rather than as a criticism, for foreign countries are entitled to make such laws as they see fit.

But there is another way in which the government can restore the confidence of friendly foreign countries, or at least limit the loss of confidence. This is the aspect to which para (c) is directed and consists of seeking in every possible way to deprive Mr Wright, and all who seek to profit from his disclosures, of any benefit which they may already have derived or which they would derive from further publication. No doubt it is with this in mind that indications have been given of an intention to seek an account and payment to the government of all profits made by Mr Wright from his allegedly unlawful conduct. We are not at present concerned with this aspect, but let no one think that this involves a volte-face or U-turn, a change from a stance of 'Thou shalt not publish' to 'Let us go into partnership'. It is entirely consistent to seek to prevent a dishonest servant or agent from pursuing an unlawful course of conduct and, to the extent that that fails, to seek to deprive him of all benefit.

In the context of injunctive relief, the Vice-Chancellor recognised that the United Kingdom was 'the best market', i.e. the most profitable market, for memoirs such as Spycatcher and that a denial of this market to the maximum extent practicable would 'encourager les autres'. I would not myself have put it that way, because I hope and believe that Mr Wright is almost unique. What I would have said is that the knowledge that Mr Wright's breach of trust would not be rewarded financially would very significantly raise the morale of all the hardworking, honest and trustworthy members of the security service who could not conceive of ever doing what Mr Wright has done. But, whichever way it is put, it seems to me that anything which has this result could make a significant contribution to restoring the confidence of friendly foreign intelligence agencies.

So I look again at the existing injunctions. Clearly they are much too wide for the achievement of this limited purpose. But a revised injunction would be quite another matter. The variation which I have in mind would involve the deletion of substantive paras (1) and (2) and the substitution of a new single paragraph reading:

'In the course of business, publishing or causing or permitting to be published to any person the whole of, or any passage, extract or excerpt from, the text of the book entitled Spycatcher purporting to be written by Peter Maurice Wright and the whole of, any passage, extract or excerpt from, any statement whether written or oral by or purporting to be made by Peter Maurice Wright concerning the British security service or its activities or any other security service or its activities.'

And there would be a new proviso immediately following that, reading:

'This order shall not prevent the publication of a summary in very general terms of the allegations made by Mr Wright.'

The other provisos would remain unaltered, save that I would delete the words 'or which, after the trial there in action no 4382 of 1985 is not prohibited from publication'. If it be held that the law of Australia does not prevent publication by or on behalf of Mr Wright in that commonwealth, the position there will be the same as it appears to be in the United States and it is not clear to me why such a conclusion should be treated as decisive of a quite different issue, namely whether as a matter of English law Mr Wright, or anyone else within the jurisdiction, should be permitted to profit from the exploitation of the United Kingdom market for Wright material. Certainly this should not be an automatic consequence and the newspapers and anyone else affected by the injunction should be free to apply to the court for a modification of the injunction after the Australian proceedings are fully concluded, if they consider the result of those proceedings to be material.

We did, in the course of argument, indicate to the parties that we were minded to make some such injunction as I have indicated, and we asked for their comments. We have taken account of their comments, and in particular a request that I indicate in the course of my judgment, by words if I could not indicate it precisely in the injunction itself, what was the purpose which we were seeking to serve. The answer is this: the purpose of the proviso which I have indicated, namely that this order shall not prevent the publication of a summary in very general terms of the allegations made by Mr Wright, is to enable the media to report on Mr Wright as legitimate news but not to act as his publishers or publicists.

To the extent that the Vice-Chancellor discharged the injunctions rather than modifying them along these lines, I consider that, for the reasons submitted by counsel for the Attorney General and because the Vice-Chancellor treated the application to discharge the injunctions as if it was an application by the Attorney General for new injunctions, his decision was wrong and we are bound ourselves to exercise the discretion vested in the court, which I would do by modifying the injunction in the manner which I have indicated.

If I might conclude with a summary. (1) The task of the court at this stage in the action is to seek to preserve the rights being claimed by Her Majesty's government on the one hand and by the newspapers on the other. (2) The best way to have done this would have been by preventing Mr Wright and everyone else from publishing Spycatcher until, after a speedy trial, his right to make disclosures about the work of the security service had been fully investigated. (3) If Mr Wright was not entitled to make those disclosures, much damage would have been avoided. If Mr Wright was entitled to make them, the delay would have been of no consequence, since his disclosures relate to a period which is already long past. (4) It having proved possible for Spycatcher to be published in the United States, everyone having any interest, whether legitimate or otherwise, in Mr Wright's allegations may be assumed to have bought a copy. There is, therefore, no point in seeking to keep these allegations secret, although in some circumstances the offence which will be given to friendly countries would probably be increased if the allegations were given additional credence by widespread publicity in the United Kingdom. (5) Since it is not unlawful to possess or read a copy of Spycatcher in the United Kingdom or abroad, it would be wrong to impose any injunction which limited this freedom. (6) It is, however, quite another matter to allow Mr Wright and those assisting in the commercial exploitation of his allegations to be allowed to profit thereby at a time when prima facie this involves a gross breach of Mr Wright's obligation of confidentiality. This should therefore be prohibited unless and until it is established to the satisfaction of the court that the making of these allegations does not involve such a breach of duty on the part of Mr Wright because, for example, the confidentiality is overridden by the public interest in the exposure of alleged 'iniquity'.

I very much appreciate that, owing to the time factor, the judgment which I have just delivered could be considerably improved as a matter of presentation. But in substance, this is my view and I would allow the appeal accordingly.

RALPH GIBSON LJ. I agree that these appeals should be allowed to the extent proposed by Sir John Donaldson MR and for the reasons given by him.

Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C, because of the great urgency and pressure of time in which these proceedings have unavoidably been conducted, was required to give judgment immediately after the ending of the arguments in what is a difficult and important case. In a judgment which has drawn the admiration, I believe, of all who have read it, and which has made the task of counsel and of this court so much easier on these appeals, he 'on balance [and] with considerable hesitation' concluded that the arguments against continuing the injunctions were to be preferred to those in favour of that course.

If the choice were between discharging the injunctions entirely and maintaining the injunctions in the form in which they were made, notwithstanding the alterations in the circumstances already described by Sir John Donaldson MR and in the judgment of the Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C, I would, I think, with regret at the impotence of the law as the Vice-Chancellor expressed it but, having had the benefit of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, without the hesitation which he experienced, have upheld his conclusion that the injunctions must be discharged. In my judgment, however, the court is not faced with that stark choice. Events over which our law can have no control have impaired the extent to which our law can protect those rights of the Attorney General which, pending trial of the issues, this court assumes he may prove. Those events have not, in my judgment, impaired in any way the rights which may be established: they are as good against Mr Wright as ever they were, and as good against the Guardian and the Observer who have always known of the obligation of confidence which Mr Wright was under and that, unless special defence or answer could be established, had been gravely breached by him.

In carrying out the balancing exercise to which the Vice-Chancellor set himself, he had to consider the importance of the public interest in the unfettered freedom of the a press against the utility of maintaining this injunction in the new circumstances in service of what the Vice-Chancellor identified as 'the remaining public interest' to prevent general dissemination of the contents of the book through the press within the United Kingdom, so that by discouraging general dissemination those who are tempted to follow Mr Wright's example in the future and write their memoirs hot from the security service will not find it a satisfactory or profitable business. The Vice-Chancellor said that there was force in that and that it was a real point.

b He thought, however, that that was a very limited public interest compared with what was under consideration in 1986. As to the freedom of the press he considered that it was of particular relevance that what the Guardian and the Observer wished to publish is material which, if true, discloses iniquity and unlawful conduct in the public service. He concluded that, on balance and, as I have said, with hesitation, the arguments against granting a further injunction outweighed those in favour of retaining the existing injunction.

c That process of balancing requires to be carried out again, in my judgment, once consideration is given to modification of the injunctions to meet the new circumstances. The book has been published and is available in this country, and I accept that it is not reasonable to try to maintain the injunctions in their original form because so to do causes public inconvenience and impairment of public discussion and information for no sufficient benefit in maintenance of the rights which the Attorney General is seeking to enforce. If the injunction is modified so as to permit the reporting and discussion of the relevant facts, namely the nature of what Wright has alleged, then the interference with the freedom of the press will, in my view, be tolerable until the trial of the action. If the injunction is directed to commercial publication of Wright's book etc, the law will not appear to be trying to prevent a man handing his copy of the book bought abroad to another person in this country. The injunction so modified will not, in my judgment, be futile but, on the contrary, will do what the law sets out to do, namely to protect asserted rights as far as can fairly be achieved until, by trial, they are proved or disproved.

e Moreover, as I think, by making such an order the court will not lose, or deserve to lose, public respect for the legal system. It will go some way, as far as it is now in my view reasonable to go, to fulfill the court's task, which is to protect the rights of a litigant until the trial. The secrets themselves, of course, cannot now be safeguarded. The rights of the Attorney General, which he will seek to prove at the trial, include the right to prevent the further publication of the confidential information which Wright acquired, whether directly by him to his own profit or through others who have acquired what they hope will be publication rights to the confidential information. It would be wrong, in my view, for the court to decline to continue the injunctions if modified to the extent proposed by Sir John Donaldson MR.

f Sir John Donaldson MR has referred to the principles which govern the interference by this court with the exercise of the discretion of the judge. I agree with him that, for the reasons he has given, the Vice-Chancellor, who was not asked to consider the modification of the injunctions, is shown to have gone wrong, in particular in concluding that continuation of the injunctions as modified would be futile.

g I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

RUSSELL LJ. On 31 January 1976 Mr Peter Maurice Wright left the service of the Crown as a senior officer in the British security service. He then owed duties of confidentiality to the Crown not to disclose any information as to his activities or experiences within the service. Those duties have not changed with the passage of years. They remain exactly the same in July 1987 as they did in January 1976.

j These are interlocutory appeals. In the primary actions the pleadings disclose the issues to be tried. They are concerned with breach of duty and confidentiality. The defendants allege, and I endeavour to summarise their contentions in somewhat inelegant language, that the confidence can be broken by third parties, in this case by organs of the press, if publication is in the public interest, if it discloses iniquity or if it is already in the public domain. a

The burden of proving those matters, however, must rest with those who assert them. Prima facie the veil is not to be lifted. Hence, in my judgment, until the trial of the action it was right that there should be a holding operation in the form of the injunctions that were imposed in 1986.

Has there been a change of circumstance of sufficient magnitude and significance to require those injunctions to be discharged or varied? In his judgment, Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C referred to the proceedings in Australia still under appeal, the publication in the Independent which may possibly be in contempt, and likewise the publication in the Sunday Times. He had this to say (p 323, ante): 'Certainly there must be some question whether publications in contempt of court can have any effect on the validity of an existing order.' The Vice-Chancellor went on to consider what he regarded as the difficult issue to be tried, namely the responsibility, or rather the duty of third parties not in collusion with Mr Wright, not to perpetuate his breach of duty by the dissemination of material for which Mr Wright was primarily responsible. b

In my judgment, however, it is manifestly plain from what the Vice-Chancellor had to say that it was the publication of Spycatcher in the United States of America which was at the heart of the application before him. The question has to be posed: has such a publication outside the jurisdiction effectively blunted the law so as to make the injunctions futile? Have the floodgates been opened so that unlimited dissemination of confidential information within the jurisdiction can take place whilst the law stands by helpless and impotent? c

The duty of confidence remains. There may well be (it will ultimately have to be tried at the hearing) a duty on others, in this case the defendants, not to breach the confidence for which Mr Wright was primarily responsible. I respectfully part company with the Vice-Chancellor when he said (p 331, ante): d

'Since the full text of Spycatcher is now available in this country to anyone with the money to get it, a large part of the purpose of the Attorney General's proceedings in this case has now been defeated.' e

The 'purpose' of the Attorney General's proceedings is to restrain the perpetuation, some would say the aggravation, of Mr Wright's breach of duty (and I emphasise those words 'breach of duty') by the dissemination of his book. The 'purpose' of the proceedings cannot be the preservation of secrecy in the British security service: that has been irretrievably lost. Nor can it be, save to a very limited extent, the restoration of confidence amongst other organisations. But, in my judgment, the law and the courts must still continue to strive, and must give all the appearances of continuing to strive, to deter the commercial dissemination of the contents of Spycatcher when every word written in the book is prima facie in breach of duty. In the amended form of injunctions proposed by Sir John Donaldson MR there is built in a measure of protection for the legitimate interests of the press, which it is no part of the function of this court to stultify. f

Whilst wishing to associate myself with the admiration for the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, I too have come to the conclusion that he fell into error for the reasons which have been indicated by Sir John Donaldson MR. I would, therefore, agree with the order that he proposes and agree that this appeal should be allowed. g b LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, for reasons which I shall in due course express in a considered opinion, I would for my part allow the appeals of the newspapers, dismiss the cross-appeals of the Attorney General and discharge the injunctions.

c I understand that the majority of their Lordships have reached a contrary conclusion. I am sure we all appreciate that, especially in view of our disagreement, it is desirable we should make our respective reasons known as soon as possible. Unfortunately, a variety of personal commitments will prevent us from publishing our reasons before September, but I think we can all agree in expressing the hope that they will be made available to the press and public at the earliest practicable date.

d LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, for reasons which I shall give later in writing, I would order that the orders of the Court of Appeal of 25 July 1986 be set aside, save as to costs, and that the orders of Millett J of 11 July 1986 be restored but varied to the extent that para 2 of the proviso be omitted. In the result, I would dismiss the newspapers' appeals and allow the cross-appeals of the Crown.

e LORD TEMPLEMAN. My Lords, for reasons which I shall in due course make clear, I would propose that the orders of the Court of Appeal of 25 July 1986 be set aside and that the orders of Millett J of 11 July 1986 be restored, but varied to the extent that para 2 of the proviso be omitted.

f LORD ACKNER. My Lords, for the reasons which I intend to set out shortly in a written opinion, I too would order that the orders of the Court of Appeal of 25 July 1986 be set aside, save as to costs, and that the orders of Millett J of 11 July 1986 be restored, but varied to the extent that para 2 of the proviso be omitted.

g LORD OLIVER OF AYMERTON. My Lords, for reasons which I shall in due course express in a considered opinion, I would, in agreement with my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge, allow the appeals, dismiss the cross-appeals and restore the order of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C.

g 30 July. The following opinions were delivered.

h LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I write this opinion in wholly exceptional circumstances. On 30 July your Lordships announced in the House your decision by a majority of three to two to maintain in full force the injunctions granted by Millett J and affirmed by the Court of Appeal in 1986 (the Millett injunctions) (see A-G v Observer Ltd (1986) 136 NLJ 799) against publication of what I shall refer to for brevity as Mr Wright's Spycatcher allegations and to extend the scope of the injunctions to cover reports on the proceedings now current in Australia against Mr Wright and his publishers there. Because I am about to leave the country and shall not be back until September I thought it would not be possible to publish the reasons for the decision before September and I so indicated to the House. I had in mind that, in the usual way, each member of the House participating in the decision would wish to have the opportunity, before publication, of reading the considered opinions of the others. I have since been persuaded that the urgency of informing the public of the reasons which underlie the conclusions reached by the majority and the minority alike is such that delay until September would be unacceptable. I understand that your Lordships all share this view. This means, however, that I must accept the disadvantage of expressing my dissent before I have had a chance of reading and at least trying to understand the reasons which your Lordships in the majority are going to give in support of your decision. a

The proceedings arise from an application to discharge the Millett injunctions. I have no doubt that the Millett injunctions were properly granted in the first place. As the law now stands, under a decision of the Court of Appeal¹ in contempt proceedings which for present purposes I assume to be correct, the Millett injunctions operate as a universal ban on any publication within the jurisdiction of anything which would contravene the injunctions. I attach little importance, as relevant changes of circumstance, to the partial disclosures of the Spycatcher allegations which some newspapers have succeeded in making. The watershed, to my mind, came with the publication of Spycatcher in the United States of America. Her Majesty's government did not attempt to stop this, because they knew they would fail. They have also announced that they will not attempt to prevent the importation of Spycatcher into this country. These two vital facts set the scene for the present controversy. b c

I shall excuse myself from giving any extended account of the proceedings in the courts below. I note however that no judge considering the matter so far has thought it appropriate to maintain the Millett injunctions without qualification. Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C favoured their total discharge for the reasons which he gave. The Court of Appeal favoured a variation of the injunctions with the introduction of a new proviso to permit publication of 'a summary in very general terms' of the Spycatcher allegations. Sir John Donaldson MR thought that the existing injunctions were 'clearly much too wide' to achieve the strictly limited purpose which he believed still to be capable of achievement and that was why he added the new proviso. Ralph Gibson LJ said (pp 340-341, ante): d

'If the choice were between discharging the injunctions entirely and maintaining the injunctions in the form in which they were made, notwithstanding the alterations in the circumstances already described by Sir John Donaldson MR and in the judgment of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C, I would, I think, with regret at the impotence of the law as the Vice-Chancellor expressed it but, having had the benefit of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment without the hesitation which he experienced, have upheld his conclusion that the injunctions must be discharged . . . I accept that it is not reasonable to try to maintain the injunctions in their original form because so to do causes public inconvenience and impairment of public discussion and information for no sufficient benefit in maintenance of the rights which the Attorney General is seeking to enforce.' e f

Russell LJ said (p 342, ante): g

'In the amended form of injunctions proposed by Sir John Donaldson MR there is built in a measure of protection for the legitimate interests of the press, which it is no part of the function of this court to stultify.'

Before your Lordships all parties accepted that the compromise solution favoured by the Court of Appeal could not be supported in law and would be unworkable in practice. There was and is no escape by way of any compromise from the need to resolve the issue. The injunctions must either be maintained or discharged. h

I appreciate that the decision of your Lordships' House is in form merely interlocutory. But it was quite rightly accepted by counsel for the Attorney General that the case in favour of maintaining the injunctions cannot be any stronger at the trial than it is today. It must follow from this, in my view, that the real question raised by the newspapers' appeals and the cross-appeal of the Attorney General is whether the Attorney General, on the relevant and undisputed facts, can sustain a claim for permanent injunctions. If no j

a case for permanent injunctions can be made out, it must be absurd to keep the interim injunctions in force. Conversely, although a trial of the action would, at least theoretically, leave the door open for the newspapers to canvass afresh every issue canvassed before your Lordships in these appeals and, of course, to adduce fresh evidence and argument on issues not already canvassed, I fear that, in practice, your Lordships' decision of the present appeals will effectively foreclose the options open to the trial judge.

The basis of the claim for the Millett injunctions was to prevent disclosure of the b Spycatcher allegations in breach of the life-long obligation of confidence which Mr Wright, as a former officer of the security service, owed to Her Majesty's government. So long as any of the Spycatcher allegations remained undisclosed, I should have been wholeheartedly in favour of maintaining the injunctions in the interests of national security for all the reasons so cogently deployed in the affidavit of Sir Robert Armstrong. But it is perfectly obvious and elementary that, once information is freely available to the c general public, it is nonsensical to talk about preventing its 'disclosure'. Whether the Spycatcher allegations are true or false is beside the point. What is to the point is that they are now freely available to the public or, perhaps more accurately, to any member of the public who wants to read them. I deliberately refrain from using expressions such as 'the public domain' which may have technical overtones. The fact is that the intelligence and security services of any country in the world can buy the book Spycatcher and read what d is in it. The fact is that any citizen of this country can buy the book in America and bring it home with him or order the book from America and receive a copy by post. Some enterprising small traders have apparently found it worth their while to import copies of the book and sell them by the roadside. It remains to be seen whether the Attorney General will institute proceedings for contempt of court against any public library which imports copies of Spycatcher and makes it available to borrowers. Counsel for the Attorney e General had no instructions which enabled him to answer the question I asked about that.

If, as I have always thought, the interest of national security in protecting sensitive and classified information is to conceal it from those who might make improper use of it, it is manifestly now too late for the Millett injunctions to serve that interest. If the f confidence of friendly countries in the ability of this country to protect its secrets has been undermined by the publication in the United States of America of Spycatcher, the maintenance of the Millett injunctions can do nothing to restore that confidence. So much, I believe, is obvious and incontrovertible.

I well understand the sense of indignation which all of us must feel that Mr Wright, to use the colloquialism, should have got away with it, worse still that he should make a g profit from his breach of confidence. Perhaps his publishers come under the same condemnation. But the remedy for that wrong lies not in a futile injunction but in an action for an account of profits.

The legal basis for the Attorney General's claim to enjoin the newspapers is that any third party who comes into possession of information knowing that it originated from a h breach of confidence owes the same duty to the original confider as that owed by the original confidant. If this proposition is held to be of universal application, no matter how widely the original confidential information has been disseminated before reaching the third party, it would seem to me to lead to absurd and unacceptable consequences. But I am prepared to assume for present purposes that the Attorney General is still in a position to assert a bare duty binding on the conscience of newspaper editors which is capable of surviving the publication of Spycatcher in America.

j The key question in the case, to my mind, is whether there is any remaining interest of national security which the Millett injunctions are capable of protecting and, if so, whether it is of sufficient weight to justify the massive encroachment on freedom of speech which the continuance of the Millett injunctions in present circumstances necessarily involves.

There is no fresh evidence from Sir Robert Armstrong or anyone else who can speak for the security service about the security implications following the American publication of Spycatcher. Sir Robert's original affidavit was made in the radically different circumstances obtaining before that publication. So, in effect, the hapless counsel for the Attorney General was left to make bricks without straw (which of course he did with his usual skill) in seeking to persuade your Lordships that, despite the free availability of the book Spycatcher itself and despite the citations from it and discussion of its contents which have been and will continue to be available in foreign newspapers freely circulating in this country, a blanket ban on any repetition, citation or discussion of its contents in the British press was necessary in the interests of national security. If I have understood the argument, stripped of rhetorical embellishment, it amounts to this. First, unless enjoined Mr Wright may make yet further disclosures about the security service not already contained in Spycatcher. This may be true, but is entirely beside the point. If the Attorney General were prepared to modify the Millett injunctions so as to exclude from their ambit the Spycatcher allegations, in the same way that anything in Mr Chapman Pincher's book Their Trade is Treachery is excluded, there would be nothing left to argue about. What the newspapers seek is liberty to repeat and discuss the Spycatcher allegations: no more, no less. Second, counsel for the Attorney General takes material from Sir Robert's affidavit out of the context in which it was made and seeks to rely on it for the proposition that the Millett injunctions should be maintained in their full rigour to deter other officers of the intelligence or security services from following Mr Wright's deplorable example. The suggestion must be, I take it, that a future Mr Wright contemplating going into exile and publishing his memoirs in the United States and who would not be deterred by the prospect of having to account to Her Majesty's government for his profits would nevertheless be deterred by the knowledge he would be denied by injunction any more than a limited access for his story to the general reading public in this country. This seems to me a rather fanciful suggestion, but if there is anything in it, now that the original aim of preventing disclosure of secret material can no longer be attained, the deterrent argument can only carry minimal weight.

What of the other side of the coin and the encroachment on freedom of speech? Having no written constitution, we have no equivalent in our law to the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America. Some think that puts freedom of speech on too lofty a pedestal. Perhaps they are right. We have not adopted as part of our law the European Convention on Human Rights (Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmd 8969)) to which this country is a signatory. Many think that we should. I have hitherto not been of that persuasion, in large part because I have had confidence in the capacity of the common law to safeguard the fundamental freedoms essential to a free society including the right to freedom of speech which is specifically safeguarded by art 10 of the convention. My confidence is seriously undermined by your Lordships' decision. All the judges in the courts below in this case have been concerned not to impose any unnecessary fetter on freedom of speech. I suspect that what the Court of Appeal would have liked to achieve, and perhaps set out to achieve by its compromise solution, was to inhibit the Sunday Times from continuing the serialisation of Spycatcher, but to leave the press at large at liberty to discuss and comment on the Spycatcher allegations. If there were a method of achieving these results which could be sustained in law, I can see much to be said for it on the merits. But I can see nothing whatever, either in law or on the merits, to be said for the maintenance of a total ban on discussion in the press of this country of matters of undoubted public interest and concern which the rest of the world now knows all about and can discuss freely. Still less can I approve your Lordships' decision to throw in for good measure a restriction on reporting court proceedings in Australia which the Attorney General had never even asked for.

Freedom of speech is always the first casualty under a totalitarian regime. Such a regime cannot afford to allow the free circulation of information and ideas among its citizens. Censorship is the indispensable tool to regulate what the public may and what a they may not know. The present attempt to insulate the public in this country from information which is freely available elsewhere is a significant step down that very dangerous road. The maintenance of the ban, as more and more copies of the book Spycatcher enter this country and circulate here, will seem more and more ridiculous. If the government are determined to fight to maintain the ban to the end, they will face inevitable condemnation and humiliation by the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. Long before that they will have been condemned at the bar of public opinion b in the free world.

But there is another alternative. The government will surely want to reappraise the whole Spycatcher situation in the light of the views expressed in the courts below and in this House. I dare to hope that they will bring to that reappraisal qualities of vision and of statesmanship sufficient to recognise that their wafer thin victory in this litigation has been gained at a price which no government committed to upholding the values of a c free society can afford to pay.

I add a postscript to record that I have now had the opportunity to read first drafts of the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Templeman and Lord Ackner. I remain in profound disagreement with them.

d LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK. My Lords, the facts and circumstances leading up to these appeals and cross-appeals have been fully set out in the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Templeman and Lord Oliver. I adopt gratefully their accounts of these matters and do not think it necessary for me to give a separate account of them of my own.

e I was a party to the majority decision of this House given on 30 July 1987 that the injunctions in issue should not be discharged but should be continued until trial. My reasons for being a party to that decision can be summarised in nine propositions as follows. (1) The action brought by the Attorney General against the Guardian and the Observer has as its object the protection of an important public interest, namely the maintenance so far as possible of the secrecy of the British security service. (2) The

f injunctions in issue are interlocutory, that is to say temporary injunctions, having effect until the trial of the action only. (3) Before the publication of Spycatcher in America the Attorney General had a strong arguable case for obtaining at trial final injunctions in terms similar to those of the temporary injunctions. (4) While the publication of Spycatcher in America has much weakened that case, it remains an arguable one. (5) The only way in which it can justly be decided whether the Attorney General's case, being still arguable, should succeed or fail is by having the action tried. (6) On the hypothesis

g that the Attorney General's claim, if tried, will succeed, the effect of discharging the temporary injunctions now will be to deprive him, summarily and without a trial, of all opportunity of achieving that success. (7) On the alternative hypothesis that the Attorney General's claim, if tried, will fail, the effect of continuing the temporary injunctions until trial will be only to postpone, not to prevent, the exercise by the Guardian and the h Observer of the rights to publish which it will in that event have been established that they have. (8) Having regard to (6) and (7) above, the discharge of the temporary injunctions now is capable of causing much greater injustice to the Attorney General than the continuation of them until trial is capable of causing to the Guardian and the Observer. (9) Continuation of the injunctions until trial is therefore preferable to their discharge. I have not dealt separately with the injunction against the Sunday Times

j because it is common ground that the fate of that injunction must follow the fate of the injunctions against the Guardian and the Observer. The nine propositions which I have set out in summary form above require amplification and comment.

1. The public interest character of the Attorney General's claim

It has been suggested that the right sought to be enforced by the Attorney General is a private right only, and that, as such, it must necessarily be overridden by the public right of citizens of a democratic country such as the United Kingdom to freedom of expression in the press. In my view this is not correct. The Attorney General is suing, as the representative of the Crown, in order to protect the public interest in the maintenance of the secrecy of the British security service. The public right to freedom cannot, even in a democratic country such as the United Kingdom, be absolute. It is necessarily subject to certain exceptions, of which the protection of national security is one. This is expressly recognised in art 10(2) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmdn 8963), to which the United Kingdom has adhered although its provisions have not been incorporated into our domestic law.

2. The temporary nature of the injunctions in issue

The fact that the injunctions in issue are temporary only is, in my view, of the utmost importance. Continuation of them until trial does not in any way prejudice the decision which has to be made at trial on the validity of the Attorney General's claim to final injunctions. The purpose of such continuation is only to hold the ring until a just decision on the validity of that claim can be made.

3. The arguability of the Attorney General's case before publication of Spycatcher in America

The Attorney General's case is and always has been (i) that Mr Wright, as a former member of the British security service, owed to the Crown a life-long duty of confidence and non-disclosure extending to every aspect of his work in the service, (ii) that the publication by Mr Wright of Spycatcher would be a plain breach of that duty, (iii) that the Guardian and the Observer, having obtained access to the matters contained in Spycatcher with knowledge of Mr Wright's breach of duty in disclosing them, came under the same duty of confidence and non-disclosure as he was, (iv) that publication by the Guardian and the Observer of the matters contained in Spycatcher, whether true or false, would be a breach of their duty, (v) that publication by them of the matters contained in Spycatcher would do great harm to the British security service, (vi) that damages would not be an adequate or appropriate remedy for the breach of duty so committed, and (vii) that injunctions restraining the Guardian and the Observer from publishing the matters disclosed by Mr Wright in Spycatcher or elsewhere were therefore necessary in order to prevent the great harm to the British security service which would otherwise be done.

It is evident that Millett J, who granted the temporary injunctions originally, and the Court of Appeal, which upheld them with minor modifications (see A-G v Observer Ltd 136 NLJ 799), had no doubt that the Attorney General had a strong arguable case for obtaining at trial final injunctions in terms similar to those of the temporary injunctions. Although a further appeal by the Guardian and the Observer to this House against the decision of Millett J, as affirmed by the Court of Appeal, is still pending, its prosecution appears to have been overtaken by events. In any case, it seems to me that the view taken by Millett J and the Court of Appeal with regard to the strong arguability of the Attorney General's case at that stage is not really open to challenge.

4. The arguability of the Attorney General's case following the publication of Spycatcher in America

This is to my mind the key issue. Since the temporary injunctions were first granted, Spycatcher has been published in America, has been widely sold there and is likely to be even more widely sold there in the future. Under American law the British government could not have hoped to prevent such publication and sale, and so did not attempt to do so. A substantial number of copies of Spycatcher as published in America have found a their way into the United Kingdom and have been available for reading to those having access to them. More copies are likely to find their way here and to be similarly available for reading in the future. The British government, although it has power in theory to prohibit the importation of copies of the book, accepts that it cannot in practice effectively exercise that power. It has therefore not attempted, nor does it intend to attempt, to impose any such prohibition.

b The three newspapers rely on these supervening events as constituting decisive grounds for discharging the temporary injunctions now. They put their case in two ways. First, they say that once the matters contained in Spycatcher have, by whatever means, become public knowledge in the United Kingdom, any duty of non-disclosure under which they may previously have been lapses and ceases to be binding on them. Second, they say that, in any case, in these new circumstances, continuation of the temporary injunctions any longer would be futile: all the damage to the British security service capable of resulting c from Mr Wright's breach of duty has already been done and there is no further damage which continuation of the injunctions can prevent.

In relation to both arguments it is, I think, putting the case too high to say that the matters contained in Spycatcher have become public knowledge in the United Kingdom. A limited section of the public, who feel a strong motivation to acquire knowledge of the matters concerned, can no doubt obtain access to a copy of the book published in d America and not prohibited from being imported here. But this does not mean that the matters concerned are already within the knowledge of the public as a whole. If they were, it is difficult to see why the newspapers should be so bent on publishing them, and so incensed at being restrained even temporarily from doing so.

The first argument raises a question of law, on which there is inconclusive guidance in existing authorities. It was further apparent that counsel had not come prepared to deal e with that question of law as fully as would be necessary for your Lordships to reach a final conclusion on it. If the argument is correct in relation to the newspapers, it appears that it must also be correct in relation to Mr Wright himself, with the consequence that his duty of non-disclosure has also lapsed and ceased to be binding on him, and he could return to the United Kingdom and publish his memoirs there without legal restraint. I f am not willing, on what is only an interlocutory appeal, and assisted only by incomplete argument, to reach such a startling, and indeed anarchic, conclusion.

The second argument seems to me to raise what is, in substance, a question of fact rather than of law. That is whether the publication of Spycatcher in America and its importation on a limited scale into the United Kingdom has exhausted the damage to the British security service which Mr Wright's breach of duty is capable of causing, so g that there is no further damage left to be done which continuation of the temporary injunctions could help to prevent.

h "The publication of any narrative prepared or contributed to by the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] which was based upon information available to him as a senior member of the British Security Service would be likely to cause unquantifiable damage by reason of the disclosure involved. Additionally, it will clearly damage the work of the British Security Service and thereby the national security of the United Kingdom in the following further respects:—(a) the intelligence and security services of friendly foreign countries with which the British Security Service is in liaison would be likely to lose confidence in its ability to protect classified i information (b) the British Security Service depends upon the confidence and co-operation of other organisations and persons. That confidence would suffer serious damage should the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] reveal information of the nature described above (c) there would be a risk that other persons who are or have been employed in the British Security Service who have had access to similar information might seek to publish it.' a

There is no doubt that the major part of the damage which Sir Robert Armstrong said would be caused by the publication of Spycatcher has, in the events which have now occurred, already been done, and that nothing which the courts can do, by way of injunctions or otherwise, can undo it. It remains for consideration, however, whether the risk referred to in para 10(c) of Sir Robert Armstrong's affidavit, namely future repetitions by other members of the British secret service of Mr Wright's breach of duty, is so serious that the courts should do all that they can, including granting at trial final injunctions in terms similar to those of the temporary injunctions, in order not to eliminate this risk (for I do not see how it can be eliminated) but to minimise it as much as possible. b

The Vice-Chancellor discussed this consideration in his judgment. He said (p 331, ante): c

'There remains what counsel for the Attorney General urges is the persisting public interest, namely to prevent general dissemination of the contents of this book through the press within the United Kingdom. By discouraging general dissemination those who are tempted to follow Mr Wright's example in the future and write their memoirs hot from the security service will not find it such a satisfactory or profitable business. I think there is force in that. I think that the ability to restrain the unauthorised use of confidential memoirs by those who do not mind abusing their confidence, so as to discourage others from doing it, is a real point. I do not think it can just be swept aside. The United Kingdom is likely to be the best market for anybody writing these memoirs, and to discourage the use of that market by such people would be, I think, a discouragement.' d e

I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that this consideration is a real one which cannot be swept aside. It involves questions of the effect in the future on the morale and discipline of members of the British security service of the courts allowing the disclosure of confidential matters in breach of duty abroad to lead inevitably to general dissemination of such matters to the public as a whole by the press in the United Kingdom. Once it is accepted that the risk concerned is a real one and not such as to be swept aside, it follows, I think, that although the Attorney General's case for obtaining final injunctions at trial which he had earlier had been much weakened, it remains nevertheless an arguable case. The Vice-Chancellor so held and I agree with him. The damage to the British security service which has already been done cannot be undone. But it may be that the courts can still take useful steps to reduce materially the risk of similar damage being done again in the future. f g

5. The only way to decide justly whether the Attorney General's case should succeed or fail is by having the action tried

The Vice-Chancellor considered that the need to discourage repetitions of Mr Wright's breach of duty in the future did not justify the continuation of restrictions on the public right of freedom of expression in the press. As I indicated earlier, however, the public right to freedom of expression in the press is not the only public interest involved. Protection of the secrecy of the British security service is also a public interest and is also involved. Want of secrecy in the past has cost lives; that cannot now be remedied. Want of secrecy in the future may cost more lives; the risk of that can possibly be reduced. So there are two public interests involved; they have to be weighed against each other and a balance struck between them. h i

In order to enable a court to carry out properly this exercise of weighing and balancing, it is in my view essential that it should have adduced before it the best possible evidence on these crucial questions: in what way, for what reasons and to what extent, having a regard to the publication of Spycatcher in America and its so far limited importation into the United Kingdom, general dissemination of its contents to the public by the press here would increase the risk of other members of the British security service acting in the same manner as Mr Wright in the future. These are not matters with regard to which a court can take judicial notice or rely on its own instincts. They are matters for oral evidence from persons such as Sir Robert Armstrong, or others with comparable expertise. That evidence will, of course, like any other oral evidence given at a trial, be subject to challenge by cross-examination. It is for these reasons that I consider that the only way in which it can be justly decided whether the Attorney General's claim for final injunctions should succeed or fail is by having the action tried.

b 6. The effect of discharging the temporary injunctions now

c If the temporary injunctions are discharged now, so that the newspapers are left free, subject to any questions of copyright, to disseminate generally the disclosures made by Mr Wright in Spycatcher, there will be no point in the Attorney General proceeding to trial. All possible damage to the British security service will indeed then have been done. His arguable case will have been completely destroyed, by summary process at an interlocutory stage and without his ever having had the opportunity of having it fairly tried on appropriate evidence.

d 7. The effect of continuing the temporary injunctions until trial

e If the temporary injunctions are continued until trial, and the Attorney General's claim to final injunctions then fails, the newspapers will be free to publish Mr Wright's disclosures as they please. They will certainly have been delayed in exercising rights, which will, in that event, have been vindicated. Mr Wright's disclosures, however, relate not to recent events but to events many years in the past. That being so, a further delay in the exercise of the newspapers' rights will in no way be equivalent to a complete denial of those which the Attorney General may have.

f 8, 9. The potential injustice of the two available courses to either party and the choice between them

For the reasons which I have given the choice lies between one course which may result in permanent and irrevocable damage to the cause of the Attorney General and another course which can only result in temporary and in no way irrevocable damage to the cause of the newspapers. In that situation it seems to me clear that the second of the two courses should, in the overall interests of justice, be preferred to the first.

g It was urged on your Lordships that Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C's decision, being a discretionary one, should not be interfered with by an appellate tribunal unless it was shown that he had erred in some way. With great respect to him I think that he did err in that he did not sufficiently regard the radical difference which I have stressed above between the kinds of injustice capable of being caused to the Attorney General if the temporary injunctions are discharged now and to the newspapers if they are continued until trial.

h Once a decision is taken in principle to continue the temporary injunctions until trial, it is essential that any loopholes in their present formulation, which might enable the purpose of that decision to be circumvented, should be eliminated. It was on that ground that I agreed with the alteration of proviso (2) to the injunctions proposed by my noble and learned friends Lord Templeman and Lord Ackner.

j I would end my opinion with certain firm disclaimers. My decision in this case is not based on my thinking that, when the action comes to be tried, the Attorney General's claim is in any way sure of succeeding. It may succeed or it may fail. The decision on that will be for the trial judge and, in the first place at any rate, for him alone. Nor did I reach my decision in this case because I do not strongly support, subject to well-recognised exceptions, the general principle of freedom of expression in the press. I do. I reached my decision solely on the ground that the Attorney General has an arguable case for the protection of an important public interest, and that it would be unjust, by discharging the temporary injunctions now, to deprive him irrevocably of the opportunity of having that case fairly adjudicated on at a proper trial. a

For obvious reasons that trial should take place as soon as possible: it has already been delayed much too long.

LORD TEMPLEMAN. My Lords, on 30 July 1987 your Lordships by a majority decided to continue injunctions restraining the appellant newspapers from disclosing or publishing any information obtained by Peter Maurice Wright in his capacity as a member of the British security service. The principle affirmed by that decision was that the law will prevent the mass circulation in this country of confidential information which prejudices the public interest in the maintenance of an efficient and effective secret security service. Three defences were put forward by the appellant newspapers: first, that Mr Wright intended his treachery to be helpful to the British public, second, that damage to the security service arising from Mr Wright's treachery had already been fully inflicted and, third, that the public interest in receiving information entitled the press to publish treachery at home provided it had been published abroad. A majority of your Lordships rejected these defences. b c

The Secretary to the Cabinet, Sir Robert Armstrong, in an affidavit sworn in these proceedings, deposed as follows: d

'... the main function of the British Security Service is the defence of the realm as a whole, from external and internal dangers arising from attempts at espionage and sabotage, or from actions from persons and organisations whether directed from within or without the United Kingdom, which may be judged to be subversive of the State.' e

Mr Wright was employed by the British security service. On 1 September 1955 he signed a declaration that he understood the effect of s 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911, which was set out in the declaration and renders liable to prosecution any person in possession of information— f

'which he has obtained or to which he has had access owing to his position as a person who holds or who has held office under His Majesty ... [and who] communicates the ... information to any person, other than a person to whom he is authorised to communicate it, or a person to whom it is in the interests of the State his duty to communicate it ...'

When Mr Wright left the security service he signed a further declaration, dated 30 January 1976, acknowledging, inter alia, that the provisions of the Official Secrets Acts applied to him after his appointment had ceased, that he was fully aware that serious consequences might follow any breach of the provisions of those Acts and that he understood— g

'that I am liable to be prosecuted if either in the United Kingdom or abroad I communicate, either orally or in writing, including publication in a speech, lecture, radio or television broadcast, or in the Press or in book form or otherwise, to any unauthorised person any information acquired by me as a result of my appointment (save such as has already officially been made public) unless I have previously obtained the official sanction in writing of the Department by which I was appointed.' h i

In addition to the obligations of secrecy expressly acknowledged by Mr Wright, he was also under an obligation arising out of his employment by the security service and enforceable in equity not to divulge any information which he obtained in the course of his employment. The obligation arises because of—a 'the broad principle of equity that he who has received information in confidence shall not take unfair advantage of it. He must not make use of it to the prejudice of him who gave it . . .'

b The same obligation attaches to the press and anyone else who receives confidential information knowing that it is confidential. It is unlawful to make further disclosure.

The Cabinet Secretary further deposed that the work of Mr Wright for the security service—

c 'involved him in frequent and close liaison with the intelligence and security services of friendly foreign countries and the exchange of information with those services. It was, and continues to be, essential to the effectiveness of all such liaison and exchanges that they are conducted upon a basis of mutual trust and confidence.'

The Cabinet Secretary also said that the effective functioning of the British security service requires that its affairs be kept secret. The Attorney General, who represents the public and who has brought these proceedings in their interest, could not, in the view of the Cabinet Secretary—

d 'particularise the damage that would be caused by specific disclosures of fact by [Mr Wright] without, himself, making further disclosures of material which is confidential, and undermining the efficacy of the duty of confidentiality which is also sought to be in force.'

f ' . . . it is likely that any disclosures of facts relating to [the security service] by [Mr Wright] would not only be a breach of his contract and of his duty of confidence owed to the Service but would be likely to endanger the effective discharge by the Service of its current and future responsibilities and, as a consequence, be of value to a foreign power and highly detrimental to the public interest of the United Kingdom as well as causing harm to individual officers, former officers, their families and other persons who might be identified by or as a consequence of such disclosures. The dangers . . . could arise notwithstanding that the information disclosed was unclassified and is on its face, and in isolation, apparently innocuous. Such information may take on a wider significance if put together with other information in possession of other persons and thereby, for example, enable them to check the veracity of their sources of information. Furthermore information which appears to be innocuous at a particular date or to a particular officer may at a later date become significant.'

h It follows that Mr Wright could not publish his memoirs as an employee of the security service without committing flagrant breaches of the duty of secrecy and confidentiality which he owed to the public in the national interest. No publisher or newspaper in this country may lawfully publish Mr Wright's memoirs or disclose information obtained by Mr Wright in the course of his service concerning any aspect of the work of the security service. Mr Wright, apart from making money out of his memoirs, protests that his memoirs will be helpful to the British public. The press and others consider that his memoirs will be helpful in achieving the objects of an inquiry into the working of the security service, an amendment of the Official Secrets Acts and the enactment of freedom of information legislation. But these objects are unlikely to be attained so long as the British press is prepared to publish confidential information relating to the British security service without investigation or corroboration and in disregard of orders of the court designed to preserve the security service from harm.

Mr Wright could not, of course, hope to be allowed to publish his memoirs in England. He accordingly entered into arrangements with an Australian company in New South Wales, Heinemann Publishers Australia Pty Ltd, which is a subsidiary of the English Heinemann Publishers. In September 1985 the Crown began proceedings in New South Wales to restrain such publication. Interim relief obtained in New South Wales apparently did not prevent Mr Wright and the Australian Heinemanns from publishing outside Australia. Seizing on this loophole the Australian Heinemann company granted the American rights in Mr Wright's memoirs to Viking Penguin Inc. This is an American subsidiary of the English Pearson Group. In the United States of America an injunction might have been obtained against Mr Wright if he had been within the jurisdiction but under the law of the United States one could not be obtained against Viking Penguin Inc or anyone else in the United States. Mr Wright's memoirs were written by him or written for him either in Australia or in the United States and were given the name Spycatcher. On 22 and 23 June 1986 respectively the Observer and the Guardian published in their newspapers in this country, an outline of Mr Wright's allegations. The Observer stated that it:

'... has obtained details of what is disclosed in the manuscript written by retired senior MI5 officer, Peter Wright, who lives in Tasmania.'

The Observer subsequently explained that it had not seen the manuscript or extracts from it.

The publication of the Observer and the Guardian articles was unlawful and on 11 July 1986 Millett J granted injunctions (the Millett injunctions) against the Observer and the Guardian restraining them from disclosing or publishing any information obtained by Mr Wright in his capacity as a member of the British security service and which they know or have reasonable grounds to believe to have come or been obtained directly or indirectly from Mr Wright. The order had two provisos. The first proviso allowed the newspapers to reproduce attributions to Mr Wright already made by Mr Chapman Pincher's published works or in a television programme or programmes broadcast by Granada Television. The second proviso allowed disclosure of any material disclosed in open court in the Supreme Court of New South Wales unless prohibited by the judge there sitting or which, after the trial there in action no 4382 of 1985, is not prohibited from publication. Millett J delivered a lucid and convincing judgment explaining his reasons for coming to the conclusion that it would be against the public interest for newspapers in this country to publish information derived from Mr Wright. On 25 July 1986 the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from the judgment of Millett J subject to certain minor modifications.

Between 27 April and 14 July 1987 the following events took place. (1) On 27 April 1987 the Independent stated that a copy of the manuscript of Spycatcher had been 'passed unsolicited' to the Independent. The newspaper quoted extracts from the book but added that 'The Independent has destroyed all copies of the manuscript in its possession'. On the same day the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News followed suit and published information which could only have been derived from Mr Wright in the final analysis. The Attorney General applied to commit the three newspapers for contempt since they were clearly acting in breach of the object of the Millett injunctions. (2) Shortly after 27 April 1987 the Guardian and the Observer applied to the court to discharge the Millett injunctions on the grounds of changed circumstances including the articles in the Independent and the other two London evening papers on 27 April. (3) On 28 April 1987 Australian newspapers published articles about Spycatcher. (4) On 3 May 1987 the Washington Post announced that it had 'obtained' a manuscript copy of Spycatcher and published extracts and comments. (5) On 12 July 1987 the Sunday Times published 'major extracts from the book "Spycatcher" by Peter Wright the former MI5 officer. Its serialisation has been timed to coincide with the publication of the book in the United States'. (6) On 15 July 1987 the Court of Appeal, which heard argument before and after 12 July, declared that the Independent, the London Daily News and the London Evening Standard—

a 'could indeed have been in contempt of court. So could the Sunday Times and any other newspaper which published information attributed to Mr Wright. We say "could be" in contempt of court and not "were" in contempt of court because none has as yet had an opportunity of putting forward a defence.'

b (See A-G v Newspaper Publishing plc [1987] 3 All ER 276 at 290.)

Contempt proceedings had been or were then instituted against the Sunday Times. All the newspaper articles were bound to put pressure on the court to allow publication of Spycatcher in this country regardless of any damage to the security service and despite the reasoned judgment of Millett J that the disclosure of any relevant information derived from Mr Wright would be contrary to the public interest and ought to be restrained. On 22 July 1987 the Vice-Chancellor discharged the orders made by Millett J but this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal on 24 July 1987, hence the appeal to this House.

c My Lords, this appeal involves a conflict between the right of the public to be protected by the security service and the right of the public to be supplied with full information by the press. This appeal therefore involves consideration of the European Convention on Human Rights (Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmd 8969)) to which the British government adheres. Article 10 of the convention is in these terms:

d '1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers . . .

e 2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.'

f In Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245 the European Court of Human Rights decided by a majority of 11 to 9 that there had been a violation of the convention by reason of the judgment of this House which restrained the Sunday Times from publishing—

g 'Any article which prejudices the issues of negligence, breach of contract or breach of duty or deals with the evidence relating to any of the said issues arising in any actions pending or imminent against Distillers . . . in respect of the development, distribution or use of the drug Thalidomide.'

h The European Court pointed out that this House applying domestic law had balanced the public interest in freedom of expression and the public interest in the due administration of justice. But the European Court—

i 'is faced not with the choice between two conflicting principles but with a principle of freedom of expression which is subject to a number of exceptions which must be narrowly interpreted . . . It is not sufficient that the interference involved belongs to that class of exceptions listed in Article 10 which has been invoked; neither is it sufficient that the interference was imposed because its subject-matter fell within a particular category or was caught by a legal rule formulated in general or absolute terms; the Court has to be satisfied that the interference was necessary having regard to the facts and circumstances prevailing in the specific case before it.'

The question is therefore whether the interference with freedom of expression constituted by the Millett injunctions was, on 30 July 1987 when they were continued by this House, necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, for protecting the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary having regard to the facts and circumstances prevailing on 30 July 1987 and in the light of the events which had happened. The continuance of the Millett injunctions appears to me to be necessary for all these purposes.

My Lords, in my opinion a democracy is entitled to take the view that a public servant who is employed in the security service must be restrained from making any disclosures concerning the security service and that similar restraints must be imposed on anybody who receives those disclosures knowing that they are confidential.

There are safeguards. No member of the secret service is immune from criminal prosecution or civil suit in respect of his actions. Instructions from superior officers are no defence. In addition, anyone, whether public servant, newspaper editor or journalist, who is aware that a crime has been committed or is dissatisfied with the activities of the secret service is free to report to the police in relation to crime and in other matters is free to report to the Prime Minister, who is charged with the responsibility of the security services, and to the Security Commission, which advises the Prime Minister. The security services are not above the law. In the present case there is not the slightest evidence that these safeguards have failed. Furthermore, there is nothing to prevent the press investigating all the allegations made by Mr Wright and reporting the results of their investigations to the public. It is only unlawful for the press to publish information unlawfully disclosed by Mr Wright and which may or may not be true.

In the terms of the convention there are three reasons why in the present case restraints are necessary to prevent the press publishing information disclosed by Mr Wright.

Any person who joins the security service accepts that he cannot defend himself or the security service against false accusations and cannot give any explanation for his actions or for the activities of the security service, without himself thereby endangering the secrecy of the security service, which is of paramount importance. Any person who joins the security service knows that no official defence or explanation can be given. He accepts that accusations may be made and circulated abroad and that rumours may reach individuals in this country. But he relies on the Attorney General, acting in the public interest, to seek to prevent the mass circulation of accusations and attributions and insinuations in this country and to prevent so far as possible the revelation of security service activities. And he relies on the courts acting within their jurisdiction to prevent mass circulation of secret and confidential information in this country if the courts consider that such protection is necessary. The hundreds of pages of Spycatcher which embellish but cannot improve the general allegations already known to have been made by Mr Wright may include accusations, purported conversations, and unfair criticisms which no individual member of the secret service can wish to be made the subject of sensational newspaper headlines or delivered up to the newspaper reading public. So long as there are in this country only odd copies of Spycatcher, members of the security service are substantially free from harassment. But once mass circulation takes place in newspapers, and particularly once the Sunday Times publishes Spycatcher in serial form, then members of the security service will be liable to be harassed with accusations to which they cannot respond. The publication in this country of Spycatcher will thus cause grievous harm to individuals and deal a blow to the morale of the security service. The British public will lose confidence in the security service. Our friends will be dismayed and our enemies will rejoice at the failure of the British to protect the security service from calumny reported in the British press. Whatever may happen abroad it must be harmful to the security service and contrary to the public interest for Mr Wright to be a allowed to attack the security service in this country by revealing or pretending to reveal information which he is forbidden to reveal by law and loyalty. There is a great difference between the power of the press operating through mass circulation and the power of Mr Wright confined to the export to this country of individual copies of Spycatcher.

b I reject the argument that the law will appear ridiculous if it imposes a restriction on mass circulation when any individual member of the public may obtain a copy of Spycatcher from abroad. The court cannot exceed its territorial jurisdiction but the court can prevent the harm which will result from mass circulation within its own jurisdiction and can prevent Mr Wright and British newspapers from profiting from the unlawful conduct of Mr Wright. It is said that the same result could be achieved by an order on Mr Wright and the newspapers to account to the Attorney General for any profits they will make from Spycatcher. The public interest does not lie in making profits but in preventing profits being made in this country from treachery to this country.

c In my opinion, therefore, the injunctions are necessary in terms of the convention because harm will be caused to the security service if the press insist on disclosing to their readers not the general nature of Mr Wright's uncorroborated allegations but the mass circumstantial hearsay contained in Spycatcher relating to the security service and its activities.

d The second reason which makes it necessary to continue restrictions on the press lies in the fact that if the injunctions are discharged in the present case an immutable precedent will have been created. If the injunctions are discharged it must follow that any disgruntled public servant or holder of secret or confidential information relating to the security service can achieve mass circulation in this country of damaging truths and falsehoods by the device of prior publication anywhere else abroad. Nothing will ever again be confidential save the identity of a source whom a newspaper wishes to conceal.

e If the Millett injunctions were discharged, Mr Wright could write to the Washington Post making a serious new allegation or bolstering up old allegations citing names and actions and purporting to give chapter and verse. Once the Washington Post had entertained an American audience with these revelations, then the products of Mr Wright's recollections and imaginations could be plastered across the British press. I f reject the allegation that the press are being gagged or censored or submitted to Soviet discipline. The Millett injunctions were not imposed by the government: the injunctions were imposed and are being continued by independent and impartial judges because they consider that despite the importance of the right of freedom of expression it is necessary in the national interest to prevent the security service being harmed now and in the future. The imposition of restraints on the press in the exercise of a judicial discretion in conformity with the convention is an expression and not a negation of democracy in action.

g There is a third and final reason why the restraints imposed in the present case satisfy the tests of the convention. All the newspapers reports between 27 April and 14 July 1987 were contrary to the object and purpose of the Millett injunctions. Those reports originated with Mr Wright and his publishers abroad and were intended to bring pressure on the English courts to allow Spycatcher to be published here. The Millett injunctions cannot now be discharged without surrendering to the press an untrammelled, arbitrary and irresponsible power to evade an order of the court designed for the safety of the realm to protect the confidentiality of information obtained by a member of the secret service.

j Finally, I must refer to one proviso to the Millett injunctions which was deleted by the order of your Lordships' House on 30 July. The proviso was in these terms:

'(2) no breach of this Order shall be constituted by the disclosure or publication of any material disclosed in Open Court in the Supreme Court of New South Wales unless prohibited by the Judge there sitting or which, after the trial in action no 4382 of 1985 is not prohibited from publication.'

When Millett J made that proviso in the interests of the Guardian and the Observer it would not have occurred to him that other newspapers would subsequently publish extracts from Spycatcher. It is very likely that in the course of the proceedings in New South Wales long extracts from Spycatcher have been read in open court. The Sunday Times has demonstrated that it is prepared to go to any lengths to publish extracts from Spycatcher. The order of this House prohibiting, inter alia, the publication of extracts from Spycatcher in this country was made on Thursday, 30 July. It was quite possible that if the proviso had not been deleted then on Sunday, 2 August the Sunday Times would have published long extracts from Spycatcher explaining that these had been read in open court in New South Wales. Indeed, when deletion of the proviso was discussed, counsel for the Sunday Times very properly and prudently asked whether, if the proviso were deleted, the Sunday Times would be forbidden from publishing extracts from Spycatcher which had been read out in open court, and he was informed that such was the object and intent of the order proposed and made by this House.

At the conclusion of the hearing of this appeal I was satisfied that it was the duty of this House in its judicial capacity to stand firm in order to prevent harm to the security service, to preserve the right and duty of the court to uphold within the jurisdiction the secrecy of the security service when necessary and to ensure that the object and intent of orders made by the court are not flouted.

Since writing this speech I have read in draft the speeches to be delivered by my colleagues. I agree with the observations of Lord Brandon and Lord Ackner. I agree with Lord Oliver that this is a uniquely difficult case but for the reasons I have set out I am unable to agree with the conclusions reached by my noble and learned friends Lord Bridge and Lord Oliver.

LORD ACKNER. My Lords, at the conclusion of his able address on behalf of the Sunday Times, counsel said: 'This case cries out for a sense of proportion.' It became sadly apparent immediately after the announcement of the decision of your Lordships' House on 30 July that this most sensible crie de coeur went totally unheeded by the entire media. This despite the fact that it was clearly announced that the reasons for the decision would be given, but not immediately, because some of your Lordships have long-standing commitments overseas.

The first step towards a balanced appreciation of the problem which your Lordships are asked to solve is to set out those facts and propositions which either are not in dispute or are indisputable, so that there may be built on common ground a firm foundation on which valid contentions and arguments can be constructed. I hope that but a tithe of the publicity given to the ill-informed criticisms of the majority decision of your Lordships' House is now accorded to the basis and the reasons given for that decision. If so, I believe that it will then be readily appreciated by the public that the temporary, and I stress 'temporary', remedy given to safeguard the efficiency of our national security service was, after paying all proper regard to safeguarding freedom of speech, rightly preferred to satisfying immediately the desire of the newspaper appellants to increase their circulation by publishing on a massive scale material emanating from Mr Wright in flagrant breach of his obligations as a former senior officer in the British security service.

First I shall state under appropriate headings that which for all practical purposes is not in dispute. I apologise for the frequent emphasis but emphasis sometimes helps to clear up misunderstandings. Significantly, the most important of the factors to which I will refer are to be found recorded with characteristic clarity in the judgment of Sir Nicolas Browne-Wilkinson V-C given on 15 July 1987. For it is on this very judgment that the appellant newspapers place such a total and uncritical reliance.

1. Mr Wright's employment and his fundamental obligation owed to the Crown not to disclose confidential information

a Mr Wright was employed for many years in a senior capacity by the British security service. During the course of his employment he had access to highly classified information. That employment imposed an absolutely crucial obligation on Mr Wright to keep that information confidential and not to publish it in any manner without the authority of the Crown. This is beyond dispute. The proceedings brought by the Crown in Australia, to which I will make but brief reference hereafter, were based on breaches of this duty of confidentiality. That such a duty of confidentiality existed has been b admitted at all times by all concerned (see the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, p 320, ante).

2. Mr Wright's breach of duty

c Mr Wright retired on 31 January 1976. After his retirement he publicly announced that he had submitted a memorandum to the chairman of a select committee of the House of Commons alleging penetration of the security service by foreign agents and calling for an inquiry. Being dissatisfied that no inquiry was held he decided, so he alleges, to disclose the relevant material in his memoirs, together with allegations of unlawful conduct on the part of members of the security service over the years. It was accepted by the Vice-Chancellor, and at no stage has the contrary been suggested to your Lordships, that Mr Wright has committed a most serious breach of his duty of d confidentiality (see the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, p 319, ante). It has, therefore, at all times been conceded that if Mr Wright, instead of emigrating to Australia, had sought to publish his book in this country both he and his publishers would immediately have been restrained by injunctions. Furthermore, Mr Wright would, prima facie, have committed serious breaches of the Official Secrets Acts 1911 to 1939 and the reasonable assumption is that he would have been prosecuted.

e 3. The Australian proceedings

f The British courts do not have jurisdiction beyond their shores. Every sovereign nation jealously guards its own jurisdiction. The inability of the English courts to supply a remedy by granting an injunction or other relief against Mr Wright is not a weakness for which the courts can be blamed. Accordingly, when Mr Wright emigrated to Australia and sought to publish his book, all that the Crown could do was to seek an injunction in the courts of Australia, in particular in the courts of New South Wales. As the Vice-Chancellor pointed out, it was no fault of the Crown that Mr Wright's book came into the public domain (I would prefer the phrase 'received the publicity') in Australia to the extent it has (see p 330, ante). The Vice-Chancellor accepted that the Crown had done everything that it thought itself able to do to stop publication worldwide g of the memoirs (see p 330, ante). Indeed, at the conclusion of his judgment the Vice-Chancellor said (p 333, ante):

'I do not in any sense criticise, even if it were my job, the seriousness with which the government has pursued this case.'

h 4. The arguable point of law

i The Vice-Chancellor, having considered at some length the authorities, concluded that there was an arguable point of law available to the Attorney General, 'a novel and difficult point of law' as he described it, to justify a claim for a permanent injunction at trial, notwithstanding the publication of Spycatcher in America. The Attorney General had submitted to the Vice-Chancellor that where information has been impressed with a duty of confidentiality, and somebody acquires such information knowing that it was so communicated originally, then the person acquiring that information with that knowledge himself comes under a duty not to disclose it further. That duty exists whether or not the information is otherwise in the public sphere. This view had the clear support of the Court of Appeal in A-G v Observer Ltd (1986) 136 NLJ 799, including in particular that of Nourse LJ with his special knowledge of the courts' equitable jurisdiction (see [1896] CA Transcript 696). Significantly, the Law Commission in their report Breach of Confidence in 1981 (Law Com no 110) para 4.11, in stating their understanding of the existing law, said:

'The third party is liable to be restrained from disclosing or using information which he knows or, it would seem, he ought to know was subject to an obligation of confidence.'

It is, of course, incontrovertible that the entire media, including in particular the appellant newspapers, well know that Mr Wright's information, which they are so anxious to publish, is confidential information and that his publication of it has been a flagrant breach of his obligation of confidentiality. Counsel for the Observer, to whose excellent address I would wish to pay tribute, without in any way conceding that the Attorney General would ultimately succeed in establishing a good cause of action, accepted that the Attorney General had a good arguable point of law in his favour and indeed this had been accepted in the Court of Appeal. I understood and still understand all your Lordships are prepared to accept the Vice-Chancellor's conclusion on this point. It would, in my opinion, be quite wrong to seek finally to decide the validity of this point on a 48-hour-notice emergency interlocutory appeal to your Lordships' House, where it was never contemplated that the contrary would be argued and where we have not had the benefit of the opinions of the Court of Appeal.

5. The remedy available to the Crown

It has throughout these proceedings been accepted, and the Vice-Chancellor so stated in terms, that an award of damages would be an ineffective and inappropriate remedy for the Attorney General. An injunction is the only thing that is any good to him (see p 329, ante). This is so crystal clear that the proposition requires no further exposition. However, as I will shortly seek to show, this agreed fact is of such fundamental importance and the public has been subjected to such confused reporting that I feel obliged to stress it. If the mass publication which is now sought is permitted before the trial of the action in which the validity of the Attorney General's case is to be put to the test, then there would be no point or purpose in such a trial. The Attorney General would have lost his remedy before the court was able to hear his case.

6. The Crown's claim is for an interlocutory injunction

While it is accepted that the refusal now to grant to the Crown an injunction pending trial will render it totally futile for the Crown thereafter to seek to establish that it has a claim in law for a permanent injunction, the grant to the Crown of an injunction pending the trial will not render futile the newspapers' continued claim to publish. This was accepted by the Vice-Chancellor, who said (p 330, ante):

'... it is right to bear in mind that the allegations made by Mr Wright in Spycatcher are in a number of respects "old hat". They have been bandied around, some would think ad nauseam, in Mr Chapman Pincher's book and in subsequent articles. There is nothing very new about them. There is nothing urgent about them, in the sense that they concern recent events.'

Whether the Crown has valid cause of action raises essentially a question of law, which can be (and indeed could have been) determined by a speedy trial at first instance, and then in the appellate courts, if the initial decision is not accepted. If the Crown fails to establish a good cause of action, the time thus spent will add little to the existing staleness which by now characterises Mr Wright's assertions. The right of the press to publish and the public to know, on that hypothesis, will not have been totally frustrated, but only delayed. The cause of free speech will not have suffered. It will, on this assumption, have triumphed.

7. The public interest factor

- a* This case involves an entirely new and highly significant factor which is of the greatest relevance to the exercise of the court's discretion in considering whether to grant or refuse an injunction pending trial. Both Millett J, in granting the original injunction, and the Vice-Chancellor, in discharging it, proceeded on the same principle, which I understand your Lordships accept, that when there is a conflict between the public interest of preserving confidentiality and some other public interest, then the court
- b* should favour the preservation of confidentiality, unless that other public interest outweighs it. But in this case there is more than the public interest of preserving confidentiality. Here, unlike the not infrequent case where a company wishes to prevent, to its financial detriment, the publication of its trade secrets, there is the following additional public interest factor accepted by the Vice-Chancellor and stated in these words (p 331, ante):

- c* 'There remains what counsel for the Attorney General urges is the persisting public interest, namely to prevent general dissemination of the contents of this book through the press within the United Kingdom. By discouraging general dissemination those who are tempted to follow Mr Wright's example in the future and write their memoirs hot from the security service will not find it such a satisfactory or profitable business.'

The Vice-Chancellor then gave his assessment of the significance of this public interest. He said (p 331, ante):

- e* 'I think there is force in that. I think that the ability to restrain the unauthorised use of confidential memoirs by those who do not mind abusing their confidence, so as to discourage others from doing it, is a real point. I do not think it can be just swept aside.' (My emphasis.)

The Vice-Chancellor then accepted that the United Kingdom is likely to be the best market for anybody writing these memoirs and to discourage the use of that market would be a discouragement indeed.

- f* Again, I must emphasise, that the existence of this public interest factor, as accepted by the Vice-Chancellor and which I shall further particularise, is not challenged by the newspapers and its existence is, I understand, fully accepted by all your Lordships.

8. The basis of the Vice-Chancellor's decision

- g* The Vice-Chancellor accepted in terms that to permit publication would be to admit that our courts were unable to safeguard secrets of great public importance. He added (pp 330–331, ante):

- h* 'And let nobody underestimate how important these secrets are. There seems to have been a temptation to treat this case as an unreasonable pursuit by the government of unreasonable ends. That is not a view I share. The revelation of secrets of a security agent, it seems to me, is highly undesirable. I, therefore, think it is most regrettable, if it proves to be the case, that there is no way in which the court can preserve that confidentiality.'

- j* This, no doubt, accounted for the Vice-Chancellor reaching his decision with 'considerable hesitation', adding that he believed 'the matter to be quite nicely weighted and in no sense obvious' (see p 332, ante).

The basis of the Vice-Chancellor's reluctant decision can be simply stated. He accepted, and the contrary has not been argued before us, that Millett J's order granting the original injunction in July 1986 later upheld by the Court of Appeal was correct, but he considered that there had been a material change in the circumstances and that this change rendered it futile to continue the injunction. In his opinion to continue the restraint on publication would serve no useful purpose and make the law look ridiculous. In a sentence, as a result of the publication of the book in America, and the accepted impracticability of preventing the importation of the book into this country, Mr Wright had 'got away with it' altogether, with the result that the courts are now impotent even to limit the damage which he has done. a

Having set out in some detail what is or must be treated as common ground, I can, on the conventional approach to this appeal, state my reasons quite shortly, since, as I understand it, all your Lordships accept: (1) that the Attorney General has an arguable case for a permanent injunction; (2) that damages are a worthless remedy for the Crown and, if the interlocutory injunction is not continued, the Crown loses here, now and forever the prospect of achieving a permanent injunction, which it might well obtain if a trial were to take place; (3) that by contrast to (2) above, the continuance of the interlocutory injunction is not, as the Vice-Chancellor accepted, 'a final order locking out the press' (see p 330, ante). If successful in the action, the press will then be able to publish the material which has no present urgency; (4) that there is, as described by the Vice-Chancellor, a real public interest concerned with the efficient functioning of the security service and that interest requires protection. b

It must then follow that it would be a denial of justice to refuse to allow the injunction to be continued until the action is heard. To refuse to continue the interlocutory injunction would bring about the very result that the Vice-Chancellor said should be avoided, namely the 'sweeping aside' of the public interest factor without any trial. The Attorney General would thus have been prematurely and permanently denied any protection from the courts. It would be established without trial and for all time, that by the simple expedient of going abroad, arranging for publication in the press in a country, such as the United States, where there is no remedy by way of injunction, the courts in this country then become incapable of exercising their well-established jurisdiction. Your Lordships would have established a 'charter for traitors' to publish on the most massive scale in England whatever they have managed to publish abroad. d

Accordingly, with every respect to the Vice-Chancellor, his conclusion, after carrying out the so-called 'balancing operation', cannot be justified. Counsel for the Attorney General was fully entitled to submit that there was a fatal inconsistency in the manner in which he weighed the scales. f

That is the short and simple answer to these appeals. However, it is so short and so simple that it has been suppressed by, and submerged in, the press hysteria which has greeted the announcement of your Lordships' orders. Although the press have transcripts of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, the very foundation on which these appeals were based, there has been virtually no reference to it. The press do not wish the public to exercise a sense of proportion. The case has therefore to be presented as open and shut, admitting of no possible argument, and of only one decision: that favourable to the press. This one-sided reporting is an abuse of power and a depressing reflection of falling standards and values. g

I do not share the Vice-Chancellor's 'considerable hesitation' nor do I consider the case 'nicely weighted'. If the Vice-Chancellor had appreciated that the public interest factor, which he accepted had force, was a 'real point' and 'cannot be swept aside', went much further than he realised, I do not believe he would have reached his reluctant decision. The so-called 'deterrent effect', of preventing mass publication, is by no means as limited as he describes. Firstly, what of Mr Wright, if your Lordships refused to continue these injunctions pending trial? Counsel for the Sunday Times, with characteristic frankness, suggested that if Mr Wright, whom he aptly described as an 'information thief', now attempted to publish his book here, no injunction would lie against him or his English publishers since, so he submitted, it could after the publication in America serve no useful purpose. But 'the appetite grows with what it feeds on'. Mr Wright's appetite may not be the exception. For all your Lordships know, Mr Wright may have produced to h

- date only Spycatcher Mk I, and there may be further instalments still to come. Secondly,
- a quite apart from deterring Mr Wright and other members of the security service, who may in the future suffer from the same lack of loyalty, what of the loyal members of the service whom they leave behind? Are they, or their families, to be totally unprotected by the Crown and left, in so far as they still survive the attack, to the highly expensive (there is no legal aid available) and uncertain remedy of a libel action, which the media not only can but may positively welcome defending? What material, if any, can they legitimately
- b use in their own defence, without further undermining the efficiency of the very service to which they wish to remain loyal?

- The function of the British security service is the defence of the realm from dangers arising from acts of or attempts at espionage, sabotage or subversion. It is axiomatic that the efficiency of that service is crucial. If your Lordships were to permit, without there being any trial of this important matter, the widest possible publication of the contents
- c of this book within your jurisdiction, where the best market is to be found, the prejudicial effect on the morale of the service is bound to be considerable. But there is yet a further and important additional prejudicial consequence. It would be utterly unrealistic not to accept that this would cause yet further loss of confidence of friendly countries in the efficiency of our service. All this is fully supported by the affidavits of Sir Robert Armstrong and is indeed obvious. To quote Millett J in his judgment last year:

- d 'It is difficult to believe that a security service whose senior members were free to write their memoirs would be taken seriously by other secret services or that security services of friendly countries would willingly co-operate or share sensitive information with such a service.'

- e And I would add 'and the more so if the courts of the disloyal member stand idly by, wringing their hands, and doing nothing within their own jurisdiction to stop mass circulation, even pending trial'.

- My Lords, English justice will have come to a pretty pass if our liability to control what happens beyond our shores is to result in total incapacity to control what happens within our very own jurisdiction. Some 60 years ago, Sankey LJ in a lecture entitled
- f 'Principle and Practice of the law today' said (see (1928) 165 LT Jo 241 and 242):

'Amid the shifting sands and cross-currents of public life the law is like a great rock on which men may set their feet and be safe.'

For the word 'rock' the appellants would have your Lordships now read 'jellyfish'!

- g If the publication of this book in America is to have, for all practical purposes, the effect of nullifying the jurisdiction of the English courts to enforce compliance with the duty of confidence both by interlocutory and by permanent injunction, then, as counsel for the Attorney General ruefully observed, English law would have surrendered to the American Constitution. There the courts, by virtue of the First Amendment, are, I understand, powerless to control the press. Fortunately, the press in this country is, as yet, not above the law, although like some other powerful organisations they would like
- h that to be so, that is until they require the law's protection.

- My noble and learned friend Lord Bridge, in the course of argument, asked the question, which he considered to be crucial, 'Is there any irreparable harm that Mr Wright has not done yet?' I would answer that question with an emphatic Yes. The appellants' arguments proceed on the basis of an obvious fallacy. They submit that, as a result of the publication of the book in America, the existing injunctions can no longer
- i serve any useful purpose. It is, of course, abundantly clear that the injunctions are no longer effective to safeguard any national secrets that the book might contain. They are indeed 'out of the bag', but from that it does not follow that the function of the injunctions is spent. The recent crescendo of protestations in the press proves that there is all the difference in the world between tolerating the importation of casual copies, as opposed to the mass circulation of the material contained in the book, which the newspapers and the media are so bent on achieving.

There remain three other points with which I should deal. These are as follows.

(1) The European Convention on Human Rights

Counsel for the Sunday Times laid great emphasis on the provisions of art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights (Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmd 8969)), dealing with the freedom of expression. Article 10(2) provides qualifications and exceptions to which the exercise of free expression may be made subject. They include such conditions—

‘as are prescribed by Law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of National Security . . . for the protection of the . . . rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence . . .’

Given that it is accepted that the Crown has an arguable case for a permanent injunction, that damages are a useless remedy, that there exists a significant public interest factor and that your Lordships are concerned only with a pre-trial restraint on publication, I see no prospect of the convention availing the appellants. Indeed, I adopt all my learned and noble friend Lord Templeman has said in his closely reasoned judgment as to the relevance and applicability of art 10, and I fully support the conclusion at which he, unlike my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge, arrives.

(2) The financial remedy

The suggestion has been made that the only true remedy in a situation such as Mr Wright's is, to quote a phrase used in the judgment of the American case of Snepp v US (1980) 444 US 507 at 515, that Mr Wright (and I assume also his publishers) should be required ‘to disgorge the benefits of his faithlessness’. Translated into more conventional forensic language, I understand this to mean that there should be an action for an account of the profits which he and his publishers have made, payment thereof to the Crown, together with exemplary damages on some undefined basis. There are at least three answers to the suggestion that this would be an adequate remedy. Firstly, your Lordships know not whether such a remedy can be obtained in Australia or Canada or elsewhere where this book may be published, with the possible exception of America. Secondly, the practical problems of enforceability may indeed be very great, particularly in cases where the author has spent his profits and the publishers have disposed of them in some way or another. However, most important of all, profit may not have been the motivation for the publication. An ex-employee of the service may be embittered or unbalanced, may publish his memoirs out of spite, to embarrass his superiors; to mount some eccentric campaign or publish for any number of other reasons. With all respect to the ingenuity behind the argument of a financial remedy, I must confess that it left me quite unimpressed.

(3) The removal of the proviso in Millett J's order relative to material disclosed in the Australian courts

This proviso read as follows:

‘(2) no breach of this Order shall be constituted by the disclosure of publication of any material disclosed in Open Court in the Supreme Court of New South Wales unless prohibited by the Judge there sitting or which, after the trial there in action no 4382 of 1985 is not prohibited by publication.’

When the matter came before the Court of Appeal last month as a result of the Vice-Chancellor discharging the injunctions, the Court of Appeal, of its own motion, deleted a the second half of that proviso, that is to say the words 'or which after the trial there in action no 4382 of 1985 is not prohibited from publication'.

Sir John Donaldson MR, in giving his judgment, said (p 339, ante):

b 'If it be held that the law of Australia does not prevent publication by or on behalf of Mr Wright in that commonwealth, the position there will be the same as it appears to be in the United States and it is not clear to me why such a conclusion should be treated as decisive of a quite different issue, namely whether as a matter of English law Mr Wright, or anyone else within the jurisdiction, should be permitted to profit from the exploitation of the United Kingdom market for Wright material. Certainly this should not be an automatic consequence and the newspapers and anyone else affected by the injunction should be free to apply to the court for a modification of the injunction after the Australian proceedings are concluded, if they consider the result of those proceedings to be material.'

c I entirely agree with those observations. Counsel for the Attorney General initially in the course of the hearing of these appeals did not seek to support that part of the order of the Court of Appeal. However, when it was pointed out to him that, if your Lordships were minded to approve the continuation of the injunctions pending trial, such orders could be automatically frustrated if the Crown failed before the Court of Appeal of New South Wales, and failed to obtain any prohibition on publication in Australia pending appeal to the High Court, counsel then sought to support its deletion. Counsel for the Observer and counsel for the Sunday Times fairly conceded the logic of Sir John Donaldson MR and I need spend no further time on that part of the proviso.

d However, when your Lordships were considering the orders which should be made in the event of the appeals being dismissed, it occurred to the majority of your Lordships that the first half of the proviso should also be deleted. As my noble and learned friend Lord Templeman has demonstrated by his detailed references to the dates of the relevant events, there has been an orchestrated and sustained attempt to achieve a situation from which the courts would be powerless to exercise their undoubted jurisdiction to prevent or even limit these serious breaches of confidentiality and the resultant prejudice to the efficiency of the British security service.

f It has required no imagination to anticipate the resentment which the newspapers, and, indeed, the entire media, would feel and vociferously express if we ultimately imposed a restraint on publication, albeit a temporary restraint. Moreover, it is a fact of life, however regrettable, that there are elements in the press as a whole which lack not only responsibility but integrity. A very recent civil action has provided a glaring example. It would have been absurd and naive of your Lordships not to have appreciated that every attempt would inevitably have been made to frustrate your Lordships' orders. The 'antic disposition' of the press and the media following the announcement of the orders establishes this fully. The first part of the proviso supplied a potential loophole which might somehow, by hook or by crook, have been used by such elements to nullify the temporary damage limitation operation which the majority of us thought essential.

g This risk fully justified our taking this most unusual course in this wholly unique situation.

Conclusion

j (1) Your Lordships indisputably have the power to continue these temporary restraining orders. (2) The public interest in maintaining the efficiency of the national security service, on which the safety of this realm is dependent, requires your Lordships to exercise that jurisdiction. (3) To abdicate that responsibility in the face of pressure from the press and media would be a serious defeat both for the independence of the judiciary and for the rule of law.

LORD OLIVER OF AYMERTON. My Lords, prior to his finally leaving the service of the Crown in 1976 Mr Peter Wright occupied a number of senior positions in the counter-espionage branch of the British security service. His appointment to those positions involved, beyond argument, an obligation to preserve the secrecy and confidentiality of information coming to his knowledge in the course of his duties. For motives which have not been explored and which are, in any event, immaterial, Mr Wright, having retired and taken up residence in Australia, set about writing and arranging for the publication of his memoirs. He has written a book in which he deploys a great deal of information about the operation of the service to which he formerly belonged. It may be that some or all of it is speculative or imaginary. I do not know. But we must, for present purposes, accept his own assessment of it and the book purports to be his truthful recollection of events in which he participated in the course of his duties or which came to his knowledge by virtue of his confidential position. There could hardly be a clearer or more flagrant breach of Mr Wright's obligation of confidentiality.

In September 1985 Her Majesty's Attorney General caused proceedings to be instituted in the Supreme Court of New South Wales against both Mr Wright and the company, Heinemann Publishers Australia Pty Ltd, which was proposing to publish his manuscript, claiming an injunction against the disclosure and publication of confidential material. Those proceedings, which culminated in a trial at which the Attorney General's claim was dismissed, received considerable publicity both in Australia and in the United Kingdom. An appeal against the decision of the trial judge is currently being heard and undertakings by the defendants not to publish the memoirs in Australia have been given to preserve the position pending the hearing of the appeal.

In June 1986 the Observer and the Guardian newspapers published an outline of some allegations contained in the memoirs which, so it was said, were going to be canvassed in the Australian proceedings. On 27 June the Attorney General commenced proceedings against both newspapers and obtained ex parte injunctions against further publication of information derived from Mr Wright in his capacity as a member of the security service or information in or excerpts from his as yet unpublished memoirs. Applications to vary or discharge those injunctions were heard by Millett J on 11 July, when the injunctions were continued until trial or further order in a modified form. The newspapers appealed to the Court of Appeal, which, on 25 July affirmed the order of Millett J with the addition of a proviso preserving the right of the defendants to publish fair and accurate reports of proceedings in Parliament or in a court in the United Kingdom sitting in public.

Millet J's order was, so far as material, in the following terms: it restrained the defendants until judgment in the action or further order in the mean time from—

'(1) disclosing or publishing or causing or permitting to be disclosed or published to any person any information obtained by Peter Maurice Wright in his capacity as a member of the British Security Service and which they know, or have reasonable grounds to believe to have come or have been obtained whether directly or indirectly from the said Peter Maurice Wright

(2) attributing in any disclosure or publication made by them to any person any information concerning the British Security Service to the said Peter Maurice Wright whether by name or otherwise

(1) this Order shall not prohibit direct quotation of attributions to Peter Maurice Wright already made by Mr. Chapman Pincher in published works or in a television programme or programmes broadcast by Granada Television

(2) no breach of this Order shall be constituted by the disclosure or publication of any material disclosed in Open Court in the Supreme Court of New South Wales unless prohibited by the Judge there sitting or which, after the trial there in action no 4582 of 1985 is not prohibited from publication.'

The order reserved liberty to apply to vary or discharge on 24 hours' notice.

- a* The issues and the circumstances in which they arose were fully analysed by Millett J in the course of a careful and admirable judgment. At that time, although many of the allegations which, it was understood, Mr Wright was making had been publicly ventilated before in the press, on television and in books published by others (in one of which Mr Wright was said to have collaborated), the full part played or said to have been played by him had not been publicly proclaimed. It was known that he had been a member of the
- b* security service and it was known that he was, regrettably, seeking to publish his memoirs in breach of his duty. What was not publicly known was the extent to which Mr Wright was proposing to flesh out the skeleton of what was already public knowledge or to corroborate previously canvassed allegations from his own personal experience and knowledge. As Millett J expressed it: 'The objection is not to the allegations themselves, but to Mr Wright's input. The concern is not with what Mr Wright says, but with the fact that it is a former senior officer of the security service who says it.' What was new
- c* about Mr Wright was, first, that here was a former member of the security service seeking to publish his memoirs without prior authority and, second, that the insight which that publication would give into the working of the service would, because of his position, carry a spurious stamp of authenticity. Although it was said that Mr Wright had had access to classified information of the highest sensitivity it was not suggested
- d* that such information was disclosed by the proposed book. But, as was pointed out by Sir Robert Armstrong in his second affidavit sworn in the Australian action, even unclassified and, on its face, innocuous information may take on a wider significance when combined with other information in the possession of those whose interests are inimical to those of this country. The damage likely to flow from the publication of the memoirs was summarised by Sir Robert in para 10 of his first affidavit sworn in those proceedings as
- e* follows:

'The publication of any narrative prepared or contributed to by the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] which is based upon information available to him as a senior member of the British Security Service would be likely to cause unquantifiable damage by reason of the disclosures involved. Additionally, it will clearly damage the work of the British Security Service and thereby the national security of the United Kingdom in the following further respects—(a) the intelligence and security services of friendly foreign countries with which the British Security Service is in liaison would be likely to lose confidence in its ability to protect classified information (b) the British Security Service depends upon the confidence and co-operation of other organisations and persons. That confidence would suffer serious damage should the Second Defendant [Mr Wright] reveal information of the nature described above (c) there would be a risk that other persons who are or have been employed in the British Security Service who have had access to similar information might seek to publish it.'

- h* It was substantially on this evidence that Millett J relied in reaching the conclusion that he ought to continue the ex parte injunction granted against the defendants, albeit in a somewhat modified form. It was a conclusion which he reached after a most careful balancing of the interests both of the plaintiff and of the public in preserving confidentiality and those of the defendants in the free dissemination of information and comment on matters which were, quite clearly, of grave public concern. One
- j* consideration which clearly weighed heavily in the Attorney General's favour was, to quote the judge's words, that—

'The refusal of injunctive relief would permit indirect publication and effectively and permanently deprive the Attorney General of his rights in advance of trial.'

At the same time, Millett J was careful to ensure that the injunction should not go beyond the strict requirements of the interests which they were designed to safeguard; in particular he added the proviso as regards publication in Australia which has formed the subject matter of debate before your Lordships. He did so in these terms: a

‘I should also add a proviso so that the defendants may be at liberty to publish matters disclosed in open court in the proceedings in Australia, or which after the trial there are not prohibited from publication. This is not because I consider that the court should simply follow what is decided in Australia, but because I see no reason why these defendants should be discriminated against by being denied the right to publish information which, in the circumstances, every other newspaper in the world will be free to publish, including English newspapers and foreign newspapers circulating in England. [Counsel for the Attorney General] submitted that this was a future matter which could properly be dealt with under the liberty to apply. I disagree. In the newspaper world time is of the essence, and, should the Crown’s attempts to safeguard what it conceives to be the legitimate interests of the security service fail, the court should not uselessly put the defendants at a disadvantage when compared with their competitors.’ b

My Lords, in common with all your Lordships, I entertain no doubt whatever that Millett J’s order, in the circumstances which existed at that time, was entirely correct. But it is, in the light of the arguments ventilated before your Lordships on this appeal, essential to bear in mind the circumstances in which it was made, the purpose for which it was made and the limitations which the judge thought it right to impose on its operation. Mr Wright’s allegations had not then been published in any part of the world and their publication was inhibited pending trial in the only country in which publication was then threatened. The damage apprehended by the Attorney General was, therefore, capable of being contained, at least temporarily, so long as general publication could be prevented. d

A little over a year has passed since those injunctions were granted. During that time, the action in Australia has been tried and has received wide and perfectly proper publicity both in this country and elsewhere. Such of the allegations of Mr Wright as have emerged in the course of proceedings in open court in New South Wales and the fact that at least some of the material dealt with in the memoirs has already been permitted to be published without objection or hindrance and the reason why that has occurred have been, again quite properly, the subject matter of public interest and debate. In April 1987 an English newspaper, the Independent, which was not directly inhibited by any order of the court, published a summary of the allegations made by Mr Wright including a number of what purported at any rate to be the verbatim quotations from the manuscript text of the proposed book (by that time referred to by the name Spycatcher, under which it has subsequently been published.) Parts of the Independent report were, on the same day, published by the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News and were referred to in television and radio news bulletins. Almost immediately afterwards further disclosure of the material in Spycatcher was displayed in articles in the Melbourne Age and the Canberra Times in Australia. On 3 May 1987 the Washington Post, which enjoys no doubt a very limited circulation in the United Kingdom but which is obtainable at some newsagents in London and, I imagine, in other major cities and airports, published a major article regarding the contents of Spycatcher. f

In the light of the fact that many, if not all, of Mr Wright’s allegations had, for good or ill, achieved a notoriety far beyond anything that existed at the date of the original injunctions against the appellants, they moved the court for an order to vary or discharge the injunctions and that came before the Vice-Chancellor on 7 May 1987. In the mean time, however, the Attorney General had moved to commit the editor of the Independent and to sequester that newspaper’s assets for contempt of court in publishing the j a summary of the contents of Spycatcher in its article on 27 April. Accordingly, the hearing of the appellants' application to discharge was stood over until after the hearing of the contempt motion. Judgment on that motion was given by the Vice-Chancellor on 2 June, when he dismissed the motion. The Attorney General immediately appealed to the Court of Appeal and the appellants' restored application for discharge was further stood over until after the hearing of that appeal. In the mean time three events occurred. First, on 14 May an American publisher, Viking Penguin Inc, a subsidiary of an English company, announced that it was proposing to publish Spycatcher in the United States. It is and was clear that any proceedings by the Attorney General to prevent publication in the courts of the United States were foredoomed to failure as a matter of law and the English parent company was resistant to suggestions that it should seek to prevent its United States subsidiary from proceeding with the publication. Second, on 12 July, the Sunday Times, which was, like the Independent, not then directly enjoined from publication, published the first of what were intended to be several instalments of the serialisation of extensive extracts from the book itself. That publication was timed to coincide with the third event, that is to say the first publication of the book in the United States, which took place on 14 July. On that day, with extensive publicity, the book was put on sale in major bookshops throughout the United States, including, perhaps not surprisingly, bookstalls at John F Kennedy Airport. The evidence is that it has moved into the bestseller class and is being reprinted. It is now notorious that not wholly insubstantial quantities have been and are being imported into the United Kingdom and are on sale here, though not, I think, through the normal book distribution network. It has been announced that the government has decided not to take steps to prevent such imports, on the ground that to do so would be unworkable and ineffective. The books can thus be freely obtained here or can be ordered by telephone from the United States by any member of the public sufficiently interested to do so.

e On 15 July the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal against the Vice-Chancellor's dismissal of the contempt motion against the Independent, holding (in reasons given two days later) that, without deciding that the publication complained of actually constituted a contempt, it was capable of doing so if the necessary intent could be proved (see A-G v Newspaper Publishing plc [1987] 3 All ER 276). On 16 July the Vice-Chancellor granted an injunction restraining the Sunday Times from publishing the remaining instalments of its threatened serialisation.

f It was against this background that the substantive hearing of the newspapers' application for the discharge of the original injunctions against them took place on 15 July. In a long and careful extempore judgment, the Vice-Chancellor, having reviewed the facts and the authorities, concluded that there had been a most material change of circumstances since the grant of the original injunctions but that he ought still to assume that there remained an arguable case in favour of the grant of permanent injunctions at trial. Accordingly, he approached the case as one to which the ordinary American Cyanamid principles applied (see American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd [1975] 1 All ER 504, [1975] AC 396). Having most carefully balanced the factors for and against continuing the injunctions he reached the conclusion that the balance lay in favour of the appellants and accordingly ordered that the injunctions be discharged. From that decision the Attorney General appealed to the Court of Appeal, which, on 24 July, reversed the Vice-Chancellor but substituted for the original injunctions new injunctions prohibiting the publication of any extract from Spycatcher or of any statement by Mr Wright concerning the British or any other security service but with a proviso that the order should not prevent 'the publication of a summary in very general terms of the allegations made by Mr Wright'. This was something for which neither side had asked and neither side has sought to support it before your Lordships. It is, if I may say so with respect to the Court of Appeal, manifestly unsatisfactory. What the Attorney General seeks to restrain are not the ipsissima verba of Mr Wright, as if these were actions for infringement of copyright, but the substance of the allegations which he has made in breach of his duty of confidence and against which the substituted injunctions provide substantially no protection. What the appellants wish to be free to do is to publicise and comment on those allegations and a liberty to do so only in 'very general terms' would be calculated to leave any newspaper editor in a state of bewilderment with no certain guide as to what are 'general terms' and how general is 'very general'. It is clear that the Court of Appeal, faced with the stark choice of all or nothing, a choice which has been reiterated before your Lordships, conceived this formula as a via media and that it regarded the Vice-Chancellor as having erred in perceiving that all or nothing was the only choice with which he was faced. Ralph Gibson LJ indeed indicated that, faced with that choice, he would have upheld the conclusion that the injunctions must be discharged. I mention this because it seems to me to dispose of any suggestion that, in reaching the conclusion that he did, the Vice-Chancellor was so plainly wrong that an appellate court is at liberty without more to substitute its own discretion. There must be borne in mind always the limited function of an appellate tribunal in an appeal against the exercise of a judicial discretion and I remind myself of the cautionary words of Lord Diplock in Hadmor Productions Ltd v Hamilton [1982] 1 All ER 1042 at 1046, [1983] 1 AC 191 at 220:

'An interlocutory injunction is a discretionary relief and the discretion whether or not to grant it is vested in the High Court judge by whom the application for it is heard. On an appeal from the judge's grant or refusal of an interlocutory injunction the function of an appellate court, whether it be the Court of Appeal or your Lordships' House, is not to exercise an independent discretion of its own. It must defer to the judge's exercise of his discretion and must not interfere with it merely on the ground that the members of the appellate court would have exercised the discretion differently. The function of the appellate court is initially one of review only. It may set aside the judge's exercise of his discretion on the ground that it was based on a misunderstanding of the law or of the evidence before him or on an inference that particular facts existed or did not exist, which, although it was one that might legitimately have been drawn on the evidence that was before the judge, can be demonstrated to be wrong by further evidence that has become available by the time of the appeal, or on the ground that there has been a change of circumstances after the judge made his order that would have justified his acceding to an application to vary it. Since reasons given by judges for granting or refusing interlocutory injunctions may sometimes be sketchy, there may also be occasional cases where even though no erroneous assumption of law or fact can be identified the judge's decision to grant or refuse the injunction is so aberrant that it must be set aside on the ground that no reasonable judge regardful of his duty to act judicially could have reached it. It is only if and after the appellate court has reached the conclusion that the judge's exercise of his discretion must be set aside for one or other of these reasons that it becomes entitled to exercise an original discretion of its own.'

It was said in the Court of Appeal that the Vice-Chancellor had erred in principle in two respects. First it was said that he approached the case on the footing that he had to consider not whether the altered circumstances warranted the discharge of the injunctions but whether, in the altered circumstances, injunctions should be granted de novo. For my part, I think this is a distinction without a difference. Essentially the questions posed are the same and I can see no error in the Vice-Chancellor's approach. Then it was said that he erred in principle in not perceiving and considering the via media which the court propounded. Neither side seeks now to suggest that he was in error in that respect. What is now said is that he erred in not seeing an inconsistency between his assumption that the Attorney General still had an arguable case for an injunction at trial and an order discharging the existing injunction which would, in effect, decide the issue by rendering futile the further prosecution of the claim. But that is a choice which sometimes the court is compelled to make. The mere fact of an arguable case (and it is clear that the

a Vice-Chancellor considered it less than strongly arguable) does not automatically entitle the plaintiff to an injunction pending trial, particularly in a case where it is common ground that damages would not be an adequate or appropriate compensation for an injunction subsequently vacated. It was a matter which the Vice-Chancellor had clearly in mind and which he took into consideration in the careful balancing exercise in which he engaged. The majority of your Lordships take the view that he got the balance wrong

b but, for my part, I detect no error in his approach and I would be content to decide this appeal on the simple ground that the conclusion at which he arrived was a proper exercise of the discretion with which he, as the judge of first instance, was invested and one with which an appellate court ought not to interfere. But this is an unique case: unique, as I very much hope, in its facts and unique in its importance. It is right, therefore, that I should state the reasons which have led me to agree with the Vice-Chancellor, more

c particularly because the majority of your Lordships consider not only that his decision was wrong in principle but, indeed, that the injunctions should be strengthened even beyond the terms in which they were originally granted by Millett J and beyond the terms for which the Attorney General has asked. At the outset, there has to be borne in mind a factor which is, in my judgment, of critical importance. The appellants before

d your Lordships are the Observer and the Guardian newspapers. The Sunday Times, which is affected by the injunctions as a result of contempt proceedings, has appeared and argued in support of their appeals. It may (I do not know) be in some special position as a result of the purchase, in circumstances of which we know nothing, of some rights in Mr Wright's or his publishers' copyright in the book. But the injunctions, whilst they no doubt, as matters stand, affect other newspapers and other organs of the news media, e are injunctions against the appellants and it is with their position that your Lordships are primarily concerned. It must therefore be kept clearly in mind that the appellants have done and are proposing to do nothing which is not normally involved in the proper conduct of their legitimate business of collecting, disseminating and commenting on news which they regard as of interest to their reading public. It so happens that, most regrettably, a former servant of the Crown has chosen to publicise that which was

f confided to him under an obligation of secrecy but the appellants have not themselves been party to the revelation of the confidential information to the public. I quote from the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor (p 327, ante):

'So, in the present case, it is not suggested, nor could it be, that the Guardian and the Observer have in any sense been involved in any activity with Mr Wright leading to the publication of his book. Anything they would wish to publish in the g future would be obtainable from the public domain from Spycatcher itself. They have not aided and abetted Mr Wright in his breach of duty. That seems to me to be a new case not covered by authority.'

I echo that, for I have not been able to find, nor have your Lordships been referred to, any previously reported decision which could be said to be even remotely parallel to the h instant case.

My Lords, a visitor to this jurisdiction (carrying, perhaps, copies of Spycatcher and the Washington Post in his hand) might, I think pardonably, be surprised at the situation with which he is confronted on his arrival in the land which many regard as the cradle of democratic liberty. Outside these shores he and every other member of the public can read newspaper reports of and comments on Mr Wright's memoirs. He can listen to j them, perhaps listen to them ad nauseam, on radio and television. Those reports and comments can be acquired and read throughout Europe. They can be acquired and read from newspapers published from Trondheim to Taranto and from newspapers freely imported from the United States, Canada, the Antipodes and the Irish Republic. They can even, or could at the date of the hearing before your Lordships, be published and broadcast as close to home as Scotland, Northern Ireland and the Channel Islands. It is a no doubt regrettable but inescapable fact of life that Mr Wright's allegations are available to the news media for public ventilation everywhere except in England. Even in Australia, where the principal action is proceeding, the only parties enjoined from publication, so far as I am aware, are Mr Wright and his publishers. Yet the Guardian and the Observer newspapers, and effectively the entire English press and other news media, remain prohibited from reproducing or commenting on matter contained in a book which can be and is being obtained freely by members of the public here and which can on occasions be seen being read, with what attention or enjoyment I know not, by travellers on the London Underground. a

This is a situation which, I venture to think, none of your Lordships regards as anything but extremely regrettable. Where I differ from the majority of your Lordships is in the assessment of whether the continuation of the injunctions, perfectly rational and explicable in their origins, can now any longer be justified and whether, constitutionally and in the public interest in a free society, they ought to be permitted to continue even temporarily pending a full trial, possibly a year or more hence, of the issues raised on the pleadings in this case. In saying this I do not underestimate the obvious importance of the public interest in protecting the security service. What I question is both the effectiveness and the appropriateness, in the circumstances as they now exist, of seeking to do so by continuing against these appellants a fetter on disclosure of information which, for good or ill, is now freely obtainable and disclosable by other members of the public. c

In substance, the arguments in favour of the continuation of interlocutory injunctive relief, notwithstanding the existing and almost certainly increasing availability of the information on which comment is restrained, are threefold. First, it is said that the continuation of the injunctions will serve the purpose of sustaining the morale of the security service. I put it that way although it has been negatively expressed by counsel for the Attorney General in his able and persuasive argument. As he has put it, the discharge of the injunction will be damaging to morale, and it will be so in two ways. First, and this arises rather from argument than from any evidence which has been filed in the proceedings, it may be disconcerting to existing members of the service if they feel that they may, in the future, figure in the memoirs of some fellow member without effective interference by the court. Equally, existing members of the service who may be disgruntled or avaricious may be encouraged to write their memoirs if Mr Wright is seen to 'get away with it' by gaining even wider currency for his allegations than exists already. Second, it is said that although the information publication of which is sought to be restrained has become public, publicised, notorious and available virtually everywhere in the world outside England, and although it is available here to anyone sufficiently interested to seek it by buying or borrowing a copy of Spycatcher that situation has been brought about by the machinations of the wrongdoers whom it is sought to restrain in the Australian action. An English court, it is submitted, ought to be reluctant to permit its orders to be set at naught by the very people whose wrongful action gave rise to the action in which the orders were made. Third, it is argued, the injunctions sought by the Attorney General are interlocutory only. None of the information the publication of which it is sought to restrain can be said to be of vital immediate moment. All of it relates to events which occurred, if they did occur, 12 or more years ago. What real harm, it is argued, when the public has been deprived of this information for 12 years, can there be in holding up further distribution of it for a further year or two years until the action has been brought to trial and it can be determined definitively whether the Attorney General is or is not entitled to an injunction to restrain its dissemination for all time? The Vice-Chancellor having accepted, so it is argued, that the Attorney General has still an arguable case for an injunction at trial, to determine the present application against him would, in effect, be to render a trial otiose, for even total victory would be e
f
h

a certain to be barren. On the other hand, to continue the restraint against the appellants, even if they are totally in the right, would merely be to postpone for a period the publication of what is pretty stale news anyway.

b My Lords, this case is, as I have said, an unique case. For my part, I have found it also uniquely difficult because of the cogency of the arguments on both sides and of the very finely balanced considerations which, partly as a matter of convenience and partly as a matter of policy, require to be taken into account. There was a point during the argument when the skill of the advocacy of counsel for the Attorney General almost persuaded me to take the same view as the majority of your Lordships. Further reflection impelled me to an opposite conclusion, but I mention it lest, in the predictable clamour aroused when your Lordship's decision was announced, it should be thought that the solution of the very difficult problems posed came easily or obviously to any member of your Lordships' House. In the end I have been persuaded to a conclusion opposed to that of the majority of your Lordships but, like the Vice-Chancellor whose decision I would uphold, with a degree of hesitation.

c Taking the arguments which have been deployed in turn, that which seeks to justify the continuation of the injunctions on what I may call the Admiral Byng principle, 'pour encourager les autres', I find less than persuasive as a matter of fact, but more importantly, it involves, I believe, a misuse of the injunctive remedy against these appellants. The morale effect within the service is, as I see it, the only aspect of the damage to the service envisaged in the evidence before Millett J which can still have any relevance. In so far as the publication of Mr Wright's memoirs involves disclosure of material of interest to an inimical foreign power or decreases the confidence of other friendly security services in the secrecy of the United Kingdom's security service, that damage must already have been irrevocably done whether or not the appellants are permitted to give further currency to the memoirs or to comment on them. The only remaining question is how far the continuation of the injunctions serves to maintain the efficiency of the service. So far as an injunction against the English press, whether permanent or temporary, might act as a deterrent to other members of the service, it seems to me that its frailty is demonstrable and has already been demonstrated by the obvious ease with which publication may be brought about in other parts of the world. It is accepted that it cannot be restrained in the United States and that route remains open whether or not publication is permitted here. It is at least questionable how far, if publication took place within the Common Market, importation could be effectively restricted in the absence of compelling reasons of national security. Moreover, the deterrent effect of proceedings for an account of profits remains and the determination with which the present claim has been and is being pursued against Mr Wright should be ample demonstration that the path of the would-be publisher of confidences would not be easy. As to the insecurity which may be felt by existing members of the service, the fact is that, whether or not the news media here can be restrained from publishing allegations by their fellow members, the free availability of the book in this country demonstrates the continued existence of that risk. The suggestion is that the fears of members of the service will be allayed by the knowledge that the readiest market for news of this sort and the section of the world public most likely to be interested will be cut off from publication. I could see the force of this if the information had indeed been effectively cut off, but when one considers the degree of publicity that has already occurred, and occurred without any impropriety on the part of the appellants, the contention loses much, if not all, of its impact. When allegations, however unfair and possibly untrue, have already been made the subject matter of extensive public discussion and are freely current worldwide in book form and in foreign newspapers circulating both here and abroad, further restraint on public discussion can, I should have thought, provide little reassurance. But, even allowing that there remains any substance in this argument, I question whether the imposition of an injunction on A simply in order to punish B and to provide an example to C is a correct or permissible use of an injunctive remedy. The injunction was originally imposed in order to preserve the confidentiality of the then unpublished allegations. That confidentiality has now, without fault on the part of the appellants, been irrevocably destroyed and, no doubt, destroyed as a result of a calculated policy adopted by Mr Wright and those associated with him. I am as reluctant as any of your Lordships to acknowledge that the intention of the court has been effectively flouted by a public dissemination which the courts in this jurisdiction are powerless to prevent. But, once that has occurred and the proscribed material is available for public ventilation and discussion by everybody except those subject to the existing restraint, I question whether it can be right to continue that restraint against parties in no way concerned with flouting the court's orders and to interfere with their legitimate business of publishing and commenting on matters already in the public domain for the purpose, not of preventing that which can no longer be prevented, but of punishing Mr Wright and providing an example to others. I can well see, and this equally applies to the second argument to which I have referred, that the denial to Mr Wright of the audience that he most desires to reach may provide a cogent reason why the Attorney General may wish to maintain the injunctions, but I am not persuaded that, as against these appellants, it constitutes a proper justification for them. It does so only if, in seeking further to publish what is already public, they can properly be said to be threatening some invasion of private law right of the Crown.

It is the third argument on behalf of the Attorney General which has given me the greatest concern, for although it results in a situation which cannot, as I think, do anything but engender disrespect for the law, it has an appealing logic given the major premise on which it is based, that is to say that there remains an arguable case for the grant of permanent injunctions against these appellants at the trial. In the events which have happened I question that premise, although the appellants have, I sense somewhat reluctantly, presented their arguments on that footing. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor contains a penetrating analysis of the applicable principles of law and of the process of reasoning which led him to the conclusion that the appellants, in acquiring information from the book which is now on public sale, albeit in limited numbers, could not properly be restrained from republication of facts or allegations which are already public property. No useful purpose would be served in repeating that analysis and I am content to accept and adopt it. I accept, of course, that it is no necessary impediment to the claim of a plaintiff in an action for breach of confidence that the information the publication of which is complained of is capable of being discovered or assembled from sources available to the public. I accept too, for present purposes, that, even where the very information sought to be used has previously been made public, there may be circumstances in which the recipient, by contract or conduct, comes under a fiduciary obligation to refrain from unauthorised republication. Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 321, [1982] QB 1 was such a case, although it has not been without its critics (see the Law Commission's report 'Breach of Confidence' (Law Com (no 110) (1981) para 6.67). That case is, however, in my judgment, clearly distinguishable from the instant case, for there the defendants were the original recipient of the information (who was, arguably, himself bound by contract to keep the information confidential and certainly had accepted the obligation to do so as one of the terms on which he was afforded facilities by the plaintiffs) and a television company which was directly involved in assisting him, with knowledge of the circumstances, in breaching his obligation. In so far as the majority judgments suggest that, apart from direct obligation or complicity in the breach of a direct obligation, information in the public domain can be the subject matter of a claim for breach of confidence, I would, for my part, prefer the powerful dissenting judgment of Lord Denning MR. Again, I accept that the confidant who has himself made public the information confided to him cannot rely on the publicity which he himself has generated so as to destroy the confidentiality. That equally must apply to anyone who knowingly aids and abets him in his unauthorised disclosure. But, as was pointed out by the Vice-Chancellor, the salient feature of the instant case and one which distinguishes all previous authorities, is that the persons against whom relief is sought are persons who have come on the information sought to be protected without having been involved in any way in its wrongful publication. The justification for the imposition of a restraint on republication by such a person must, in my judgment, rest on the premise that, once he knows that the information was confidential and has been disclosed in breach of confidence, it would be unconscionable for him to make use of it. Once, however, that information has been so widely disseminated that it can properly be said to be in the public domain then it ceases to be any longer confidential information. There cannot be an injunction against use or republication by the general public and it cannot, in my judgment, any longer be said to be unconscionable for a person untainted with complicity in its original publication to make use of that which is available to be made use of by everyone else, save possibly the original confidant and those who have aided and abetted him. So far as they are concerned, I do not for my part accept that continued availability of injunctive relief against them stands or falls with the continuation of the injunctions against these appellants. Schering Chemicals Ltd v Falkman Ltd indicates quite otherwise. The Vice-Chancellor was led to assume that there still remained an arguable case because the point of law involved was a difficult and novel one. So it is, but, as was pointed out in the course of the argument, the case of the Attorney General is unlikely to improve between now and the trial and your Lordships have, as it seems to me, all the material required to determine the point. I fully appreciate the point which is forcefully made in the speeches of the majority of your Lordships that the question should not now be determined without a further argument for which the trial would provide an occasion, but, for my part, I find it difficult to see how, once the information has achieved such a degree of public availability and notoriety that any member of the public may legitimately possess himself of it, read it, discuss it and pass it on to others, it can be right to regard it as otherwise than in the public domain. If that is right then I find it even more difficult to see how it could be successfully argued that the appellants should be permanently enjoined from 'disclosing to any person' (including presumably their own employees) information which has been and is being freely disclosed by members of the public to one another by selling or lending a book which is in free and open circulation.

All other considerations apart, I find difficulty in seeing how a permanent injunction at trial would be other than brutum fulmen. In the action the appellants raise the defences of public interest and iniquity, issues which, I should have thought, cannot possibly be tried without an investigation of the very allegations which it is sought to restrain. Are we to be presented with the unedifying spectacle of a court trying the action or a substantial part of it in camera, not for the purpose of preserving secrets of the state or anything of that nature, but simply in order to prevent the public from learning and commenting on allegations which are contained in a book which any member of the public is at liberty to go out and buy in the market place? If the injunction sought at trial is not to be rendered otiose in the very process of obtaining it, that would seem to be a necessary consequence, but it involves making a serious and entirely novel intrusion on the principle that legal proceedings should be conducted in public and it cannot, I should have thought, do otherwise than bring the law into disrespect.

It is said that there is a public interest in ensuring that confidentiality of information should be preserved and that, even though it may be available generally, the appellants, in contradistinction to others not concerned in the business of disseminating news, ought to be restrained because of the width of their potential circulation. But that, as the Vice-Chancellor remarked, is the negation of freedom of the press. He said (p 332, ante): 'If the press is precluded from saying things that other people are not precluded from, that seems to be not a freedom of the press but an additional fetter on it.' We do not have a

First Amendment but, as Blackstone observed, the liberty of the press is essential to the nature of a free state. The price that we pay is that that liberty may be and sometimes is a harnessed to the carriage of liars or charlatans, but that cannot be avoided if the liberty is to be preserved. No one contends that the liberty is absolute, and there are occasions b when it must yield to national emergency, to considerations of national security and, on occasion, to private law rights of confidentiality where they are not overborne by some countervailing public interest. I do not for a moment dispute that there are occasions when the strength of the public interest in the preservation of confidentiality outweighs b even the importance of the free exercise of the essential privileges which lie at the roots of our society. But, if those privileges are to be overborne, then they must be overborne to some purpose. The argument is not perhaps much assisted by homely metaphors about empty stables or escaping cats, but I cannot help but feel that your Lordships are being asked in the light of what has now occurred to beat the air and to interfere with an essential freedom for the preservation of a confidentiality that has already been lost c beyond recall. It was recognised by Millett J when the injunctions were granted by him that indirect publication elsewhere would largely stultify the Attorney General's claim. The same recognition of reality is to be found in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the contempt motion against the Independent. That indeed, was the raison d'être of the injunctions. It is a matter for regret that that has now in fact occurred, but the reality has d to be faced. Once information has travelled into the public domain by whatever means and is the subject matter of public discussion in the press and other public media abroad, I emphasise again without fault on the part of the appellants, I find it unacceptable that publication and discussion in the press in this country should be further restrained. In practical terms I cannot see how the appellants can, at the trial, properly be restrained by permanent injunction for making use of information of which every other newspaper e and the news media generally throughout the western hemisphere are free to make use. Ideas, however unpopular or unpalatable, once released and however released into the open air of free discussion and circulation, cannot for ever be effectively proscribed as if they were a virulent disease. *Facilis est descensus Averno*¹ and to attempt, even temporarily, to create a sort of judicial cordon sanitaire against the infection from abroad of public comment and discussion is not only, as I believe, certain to be ineffective but f involves taking the first steps on a very perilous path.

I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge, and I share the concern which he there expresses. However regrettable it may be, I do not think that any arguable case for a permanent injunction at the trial now remains and I would accordingly allow the appeal and restore the order of the Vice-Chancellor. g

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR

8 JULY 1987

Costs – Security for costs – Appeal – Application for security for costs of appeal – Late application – Lateness of application itself a ground for refusing application.

Notes

For orders for security for costs of appeals, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 698, and for cases on the subject, see 37(3) Digest (Reissue) 205–209, 4090–4117.

Appeal

The plaintiffs in an action appealed against a decision of Mr Registrar Adams refusing, solely on the grounds of its lateness, their application on 2 July 1987 for security for costs in the sum of £19,960 in an appeal by the defendants against a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division in 1986 awarding the plaintiffs a sum of the order of $US2.6m against the first defendants, a foreign corporation. The defendants' appeal had been set down on 8 May 1986 and added to the list of forthcoming appeals on 16 June and to the warned list on 28 August; on 22 December a hearing date had been fixed for 22 July 1987. The appeal was heard and judgment was given in chambers. The case is reported by permission of Sir John Donaldson MR.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR outlined the facts of the case and continued: We therefore have the position that this appeal has been on the stocks for 14 months or thereabouts and it is only now, within 14 days of the hearing, that an application is made for security for costs. I appreciate that in the trial divisions it is possible to make applications for security at a comparatively late stage. The Registrar of Civil Appeals held, and I think he held rightly, that the same principles do not apply in relation to appeals. Every citizen is entitled to have his day or days in court in having his dispute resolved. When it comes to the appellate process the position is different. The duty of the Court of Appeal is in a sense a supervisory duty. It has to ensure that the trials are conducted correctly and that the result is in accordance with law. But it is a jurisdiction which has to be exercised with the maximum possible expedition, as otherwise successful plaintiffs, like the applicants in this case, might well be deprived of the fruits of their judgments. Therefore this court has always taken the line that there must be strict compliance with timetables laid down, in stark contrast to the attitude taken by the trial courts. Again, in deciding whether to strike out appeals on account of delay this court has not had regard to whether the respondent has been prejudiced. It has simply said that the timetables laid down are to be strictly complied with in the interests of all who resort to the Court of Appeal.

What is said here by counsel for the applicants is that there would be no prejudice to the respondents if security were granted at this stage. Quite apart from the answer that this is not a matter of prejudice but a question of strict compliance with timetables and that it is well known that the proper time to apply for security is at an early stage, there must be prejudice. An appellant has to decide whether he is going to appeal. At that stage he is entitled to know whether an application is going to be made requiring him not only to pay his own costs of the appeal but to give security for the other side's costs. An appellant is entitled to know what his position is. He already knows whether he has to get leave to appeal. He is entitled to know at an early stage whether he is going to have to give security for the other side's costs. Quite apart from that, within 14 days of the hearing of the appeal, the appellant is deeply involved in preparation. He has already either paid or secured his solicitors' costs, or at any rate his solicitors were very ill-advised if he has not been required to do so. He is suddenly told, 'Abandon all this or put up security for costs,' an entirely uncovenanted and probably unexpected piece of expenditure. I think that is very real prejudice and, indeed, potential injustice. a

Of course counsel's great point is that if, as he alleges, the appellants are effectively judgment-proof as a foreign company, he says without assets (although I have no evidence about that one way or the other), they can have what amounts to a free appeal in terms of liability for the respondents' costs, because the only asset which can meet those costs is the sum of $US830,000 which is already the subject matter of the judge's order that it be paid to the respondents. b

I see the force of that, but I think it is outweighed by the other considerations that I have mentioned and also the consideration which I might describe as proportionality. c One cannot blink the fact that what is at stake here is $2.6m. The real grievance of the respondents, as I suspect it to be, is that, even if the appeal fails, they will not get their $2.6m. The most they can expect to get is the £830,000 which is in court. The prejudice to them is that the shortfall may be increased by £20,000 of costs. Proportionately that is a quite tiny sum, although I agree that £20,000 is £20,000, and it is another £20,000. d

For those reasons, which are substantially the same reasons as appealed to the Registrar of Civil Appeals and turn on the fact that time is of the essence in the Court of Appeal in all respects, whether we are talking about applications by appellants or respondents, I feel that this application has to be dismissed.

Application dismissed.

a Stephens v Anglian Water Authority

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SLADE, STEPHEN BROWN LJ AND SIR JOHN MEGAW

9, 13, 17 JULY 1987

b Water and watercourses – Underground water – Abstraction – Negligence – Abstraction causing subsidence of neighbouring land – Whether landowner having unrestricted right to abstract underground water from his land – Whether landowner owing duty of care not to cause subsidence of neighbouring land by abstraction of water.

c The defendants were a water authority which abstracted water percolating under land in close proximity to the plaintiff's land in such volume that the plaintiff's land subsided, causing damage to her house. The plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendants, alleging that they had been negligent in carrying out the water extraction despite warnings that it was likely to result in the collapse of neighbouring land. The claim was framed in negligence alone and not in nuisance and the statement of claim did not allege that the plaintiff was entitled to an easement, either of support or otherwise, or that there had been a derogation from any grant. The registrar struck out the claim as disclosing no cause of action and on appeal his order was affirmed by the judge. The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending that the defendants owed her a duty to exercise reasonable care in abstracting water from neighbouring land.

e Held – A landowner was entitled to exercise his right to abstract subterranean water flowing in undefined channels under his land regardless of the consequences, whether physical or pecuniary, to his neighbours and regardless of his motive or intention or whether he anticipated damage. Accordingly, the defendants owed the plaintiff no duty of care in the course of abstracting the water from their land and the plaintiff could not maintain an action in negligence against them for the consequential damage to her land caused by their water extraction. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 380 e to p 384 c to f, post).

Application for leave to appeal and appeal

The plaintiff, Jennifer Elizabeth Stephens, applied for leave to appeal and, having been granted leave, appealed against the judgment of Farquharson J dated 14 March 1986 dismissing her appeal against the decision of Mr District Registrar Barker dated 27 June 1985 ordering that her claim against the defendant, the Anglian Water Authority, for damages for negligence be struck out on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

J Melville Williams QC and Philip Sapsford for the plaintiff.
Mark Raeside for the defendants.

At the conclusion of argument the court announced that it would grant leave to appeal but dismiss the appeal for reasons to be given later.

17 July. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

SLADE LJ. On 14 March 1986 Farquharson J dismissed an appeal by the plaintiff in an action, Jennifer Elizabeth Stephens, from a decision of Mr District Registrar Barker given on 27 June 1985. By that decision the district registrar, on the application of the defendants, Anglian Water Authority, had struck out the plaintiff's claim pursuant to RSC Ord 18 and under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, on the grounds that it disclosed no cause of action. The judge refused the plaintiff leave to appeal to this court. She then applied to us for leave to appeal. Her application was listed on the basis that, if leave was given, the hearing of the subsequent appeal would immediately follow. With the consent of counsel on both sides, we heard the argument of the plaintiff's counsel on both the application for leave to appeal and (de bene esse) on the substantive appeal itself together. At the conclusion of his argument we acceded to the plaintiff's application for leave to appeal to this court (which the defendants' counsel did not oppose) but dismissed her appeal. We intimated that we would give our reasons at a later date, and this we now do.

The action in substance raises a short but not unimportant question of law, which can be sufficiently stated as follows: can a person whose land has subsided as a result of the abstraction by his neighbour of water percolating under the neighbour's land in any circumstances maintain an action in negligence against the neighbour for consequential damage?

The writ in the proceedings was issued on 6 December 1984 and was indorsed with a statement of claim. No evidence was filed on the defendants' subsequent application to strike out this pleading. Whether or not this accords with reality, we therefore have to assume for present purposes the truth of all the facts asserted in the statement of claim.

The material parts of the pleading are as follows:

'1. In January 1979 the Plaintiff was and remains the Owner of freehold property situate at 1 Great Yard, Saxthorpe, Norfolk where she then and now continues to reside. 2. The Defendants were and are statutory water undertakers in respect [of] inter alia the County of Norfolk. 3. In or about January 1979 the Defendants from land near Great Yard aforesaid, such nearby land belonging to the Defendants or in the alternative upon which they carried out extraction work with the permission of the owner, extracted such volume of water that part of Great Yard collapsed. 4. The point at which the said water extraction took place lies in close proximity to Great Yard aforesaid. 5. As a result of the collapse caused by the said action of the Defendants the value of 1 Great Yard aforesaid has depreciated considerably. 6. The matters complained of were caused by the negligence of the defendants, their servants and agents acting in the course of their employment.

PARTICULARS OF NEGLIGENCE

- a (a) Carrying out such water extraction despite warnings of the likely consequences. (b) Failing to ascertain whether such water extraction would cause damage to Great Yard aforesaid or at all. (c) Failing to ascertain whether there was any preferential underground connection between the point of such water extraction and Great Yard aforesaid. (d) Failing to allow any or any sufficient margin for the effect of such water extraction upon the land and strata lying below Great Yard aforesaid.'

b The pleading finally contains an allegation that, by reason of the matters complained of, the plaintiff had suffered loss and damage. It gives particulars of such loss and claims damages and interest.

- We pause to make certain observations on this pleading. First, with due respect to the pleader, we do not think that the drafting of the particulars of negligence is entirely satisfactory. For present purposes, however, we propose to read para 6(a) of the pleading (favourably to the plaintiff) in the sense: 'Carrying out such water extraction despite warnings that it was likely to result in the collapse of all or part of Great Yard.' Second, the following features of the facts alleged (of which we must assume the truth) should be stressed: (1) no allegation is made of water flowing in a defined channel either above ground or underground; (2) no allegation is made of the abstraction of any mineral other than water; (3) it is not alleged that the plaintiff is entitled to any easement, either of support or otherwise; (4) no allegation is made of any derogation from any grant; (5) the claim is framed in negligence alone and not in nuisance.

- The issue of law now before this court (together with an issue arising from a parallel claim in nuisance) fell to be considered by Plowman J, on facts which were in material respects indistinguishable from those of the present case, in Langbrook Properties Ltd v Surrey CC [1969] 3 All ER 1424, [1970] 1 WLR 161. After a careful examination of a long line of authorities Plowman J summarised his conclusions as to the legal position thus ([1969] 3 All ER 1424 at 1439-1440, [1970] 1 WLR 161 at 178):

- 'The authorities cited on behalf of the defendants in my judgment establish that a man may abstract the water under his land which percolates in undefined channels to whatever extent he pleases, notwithstanding that this may result in the abstraction of water percolating under the land of his neighbour and, thereby, cause him injury. In such circumstances the principle of sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedus does not operate and the damage is damnum sine injuria. Is there then any room for the law of nuisance or negligence to operate? In my judgment there is not.'

- At the end of his judgment Plowman J recognised that, on the facts which he was required to assume, this might be thought to be an unsatisfactory result, observing ([1969] 3 All ER 1424 at 1440, [1970] 1 WLR 161 at 178-179):

'If indeed the defendants could have avoided damaging the plaintiffs' property by the exercise of reasonable care, it may be asked why they should not be liable for their failure to do so.'

- h However, he said:

'But so far, at any rate, as a court of first instance is concerned, it must, I think, be taken as settled that the restrictions which the law imposes on a landowner's freedom of action for the benefit of his neighbours are not such as to give the plaintiffs a cause of action in this case.'

- j In a well-sustained argument, counsel for the plaintiff attempted to persuade us that Plowman J's decision in the Langbrook Properties case, in so far as it related to the claim in negligence, was wrong. For that purpose he took us through a number of the leading authorities referred to in that decision and the later decision of Pennycuik V-C in Lotus Ltd v British Soda Co Ltd [1971] 1 All ER 265, [1972] Ch 123.

From the authorities cited to us we derive, inter alia, the following conclusions as to the present state of the law. (1) At common law the owner of land has, as an incident of his ownership, the right to have the surface of his land supported by subjacent strata of minerals on or under his neighbour's land. Accordingly, he has a cause of action against his neighbour if the subjacent support is removed (see Lotus Ltd v British Soda Co Ltd [1971] 1 All ER 265 at 268, [1972] Ch 123 at 128). (2) The last stated principle has been applied (a) by the Court of Appeal, so as to uphold the cause of action of a landowner against his neighbour, who withdrew support consisting of a bed of wet sand or running silt (see Jordeson v Sutton Southcoates and Drypool Gas Co [1899] 2 Ch 217) and (b) by Pennycuik V-C, so as to uphold the cause of action of a landowner against his neighbour, who withdrew support by causing a solid support (rock salt) to liquefy and then removing the resulting liquid (wild brine) (see Lotus Ltd v British Soda Co Ltd). (3) However, the owner of land does not have, as an incident of his ownership at common law, the equivalent right to have the surface of his land supported by water (see Popplewell v Hodgkinson (1869) LR 4 Exch 248, [1861-73] All ER Rep 996). (4) At common law the owner of land has no right at all in respect of subterranean water running in undefined channels, except to sink wells and so obtain a supply of water, although a neighbour by exercising the same right may deprive him of his supply (see Chasemore v Richards (1859) 7 HL Cas 349, [1843-60] All ER Rep 77). As Lord Chelmsford said in that case (7 HL Cas 349 at 374, [1843-60] All ER Rep 77 at 81-82):

‘... the principles which apply to flowing water in streams or rivers, the right to the flow of which in its natural state is incident to the property through which it passes, are wholly inapplicable to water percolating through underground strata, which has no certain course, no defined limits, but which oozes through the soil in every direction in which the rain penetrates.’

(6) In Chasemore v Richards 7 HL Cas 349 at 388, [1843-60] All ER Rep 77 at 87 Lord Wensleydale expressed the view that the landowner's right to abstract water, referred to in (5) above, was a qualified right, saying:

‘... he ought to exercise his right in a reasonable manner, with as little injury to his neighbour's rights as may be.’

However, the rest of their Lordships did not share that view. In the subsequent case of Bradford Corp v Pickles [1895] AC 587, [1895-9] All ER Rep 984 the House of Lords, following Chasemore v Richards, again held that the owner of land containing underground water which percolates by undefined channels and flows to the land of a neighbour has the right to divert or appropriate the percolating water within his own land so as to deprive his neighbour of it, and that his motive and intentions in exercising this right are ‘absolutely irrelevant’ (see [1895] AC 587 at 594, [1895-9] All ER Rep 984 at 988 per Lord Halsbury LC).

Plowman J in the Langbrook Properties case [1969] 3 All ER 1424 at 1440, [1970] 1 WLR 161 at 178 gave two reasons for concluding that there was no room for the law of nuisance or negligence to operate on the facts of that case:

‘In the first place, if there were, it seems to me highly probable that the courts would already have said so, and yet I have not been referred to any case in which that was done. In Chasemore v Richards the opportunity was there, since the water authority concerned was found to have had reasonable means of knowing the natural and probable consequences of their excavations, but there was no suggestion in the House of Lords that this was a relevant matter. Moreover, since it is not actionable to cause damage by the abstraction of underground water, even where this is done maliciously, it would seem illogical that it should be actionable if it were done carelessly. Where there is no duty not to injure for the sake of inflicting injury, there cannot, in my judgment, be a duty to take care not to inflict the same injury.’

a Counsel for the plaintiff accepted that, if the plaintiff is to show an arguable cause of action in negligence on the facts of the present case, she has to show that it is arguable that the defendants owed her a duty of care. He recognised the force of at least the second of Plowman J's two reasons and candidly accepted that the decision of the House of Lords in Bradford Corp v Pickles, in particular, presented formidable obstacles in the way of his contention that the defendants in the present case owed the plaintiff a duty of care in the course of abstracting water from the neighbouring land. He also, properly, drew our
b attention to a recent dictum of high authority in Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER 294 at 326, [1970] AC 1004 at 1060, where Lord Diplock, in the course of listing a number of examples of acts or omission which give rise to no liability under the English law of tort, even though the probability of damage may be anticipated, observed:

c '... one may damage one's neighbour's land by intercepting the flow of percolating water to it even though the interception is of no advantage to oneself ...'

Nevertheless, counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the legal obstacles facing his client are not insuperable. He pointed out that, in none of the cases to which we have referred except the Langbrook Properties case, does a claim in negligence appear to have
d been pleaded or specifically considered by the court; and, indeed, the recital of the facts in Popplewell v Hodkinson (1869) LR 4 Exch 248 at 249, [1861-73] All ER Rep 996 at 997 specifically stated that the defendant had not been guilty of any negligence. He pointed out that all the decisions on which Plowman J relied were given long before the modern law of negligence had been developed in cases such as Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd and subsequent decisions of the House of Lords. He submitted that the dividing line
e drawn between water and other substances in decisions such as Popplewell v Hodkinson, the Jordeson case and Lotus Ltd v British Soda Co Ltd is artificial and illogical.

Apart from the older authorities referred to by Plowman J, counsel for the plaintiff submitted that there is no good reason why the modern law of negligence should not impose a duty of care, owed to his neighbour, on a person who abstracts water flowing in undefined channels beneath his land and can readily foresee that in so doing he will or
f may cause his neighbour's land, or buildings situated on that land, to subside (and a fortiori if there is an intention to injure).

While not accepting all the submissions made on behalf of the plaintiff as to the present state of the law, we have some sympathy with them. It would appear from the passages at the end of Plowman J's judgment in the Langbrook Properties case which we have cited that he may have felt some doubt whether the relevant law as it stands is g wholly satisfactory. We have given the plaintiff leave to appeal because we consider that her claim raised issues which deserved ventilation in this court.

Nevertheless, counsel for the plaintiff recognised that the plaintiff could hope to persuade us to allow this appeal and permit her action to proceed only if he could distinguish the decision in Bradford Corp v Pickles from this present case. This he sought to do on two grounds.

h The first was that in that case, as he submitted, the House of Lords was directing its attention to the rights of the plaintiff, not to the duties and obligations of the defendant. Lord Halsbury LC said ([1895] AC 587 at 592, [1895-9] All ER Rep 984 at 986):

i '... it is necessary for the plaintiffs to establish that they have a right to the flow of water, and that the defendant has no right to do what he is doing.'

In the present case, counsel for the plaintiff stressed, the plaintiff is claiming not an unqualified right to the support of her land by water, but only a right not to have that support withdrawn by the negligent activities of her neighbours. The relevance of negligence, he pointed out, was not specifically considered in Bradford Corp v Pickles.

However, the House of Lords in that case did specifically refer to the rights of the defendant and in so doing, in our judgment, by necessary implication negatived the existence of any relevant duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff. Thus Lord Watson said ([1895] AC 587 at 595, [1895-9] All ER Rep 984 at 989): a

‘... it is clear that, apart from any privilege which may have been conferred upon them by statute, the respondent, as in a question with the appellants, has a legal right to divert or impound the water percolating beneath the surface of his land, so as to prevent its reaching Trooper Farm ...’ b

Similarly, Lord Ashbourne said ([1895] AC 587 at 598, [1895-9] All ER Rep 984 at 991): ‘Putting aside the statutes, the defendant’s rights cannot be seriously contested.’ If a landowner has the right to abstract water from beneath his land, whatever be his motive or intention (even with the intention of causing his neighbour injury), it cannot, in our judgment, be said that he owes a duty to his neighbour to take care in doing it. c

Second, counsel for the plaintiff sought to distinguish Bradford Corp v Pickles on the grounds that in that case the damage caused to the plaintiff was simply the loss of its water supply, while, on the assumed facts in the present case, the abstraction of the water has caused subsidence. Without disrespect to this argument, we can only say that this appears to us a distinction without any essential difference. It seems to us an inevitable logical consequence of the reasoning of their Lordships in Bradford Corp v Pickles that the claim in that case would have no less failed if the defendant’s activities had resulted in subsidence of buildings or even personal injury. As the law stands, the right of the landowner to abstract subterranean water flowing in undefined channels beneath his land established by Chasemore v Richards and Bradford Corp v Pickles appears to us, in the light of those authorities, to be exercisable regardless of the consequences, whether physical or pecuniary, to his neighbours. Whether or not this state of the law is satisfactory is not for us to say. d

In the light of the authorities binding this court, we regard the answer to the question of law stated at the beginning of this judgment as being in the negative and consider that the plaintiff’s claim that the defendants owed her a duty of care is unarguable. If there is no duty of care, the defendants cannot have committed the tort of negligence in doing what they did. e

For these reasons, we have dismissed this appeal. f

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

MAY, CROOM-JOHNSON LJ AND SIR DENYS BUCKLEY

2, 3 FEBRUARY, 27 MARCH 1987

Agent – Mercantile agent – Possession of goods – Consent of seller – Seller – Sale of goods – Sale by person in possession of goods with consent of seller – Stolen goods – Seller's possession deriving from thief – Whether 'seller' having to be owner if good title to pass – Whether good title can be derived from unlawful possession of a thief – Whether seller able to give good title – Factors Act 1889, s 9.

The plaintiffs were the insurers of a car which was stolen and, after two resales, was purchased by a car dealer, A Ltd, which sold it to another car dealer, M Ltd, which in turn sold it to the defendant who purchased in good faith and without notice of the original owner's rights in the car. Having paid the original owner for her loss the plaintiffs claimed possession of the car from the defendant under their subrogated title. When the defendant refused to return the car the plaintiffs brought proceedings in the county court in which they were awarded damages equivalent to the value of the car. The defendant appealed, contending that he had derived a good title from M Ltd under s 9^a of the Factors Act 1889, which provided that where 'a person, having bought . . . goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods' the delivery or transfer by that person of the goods under a sale to a person receiving them in good faith 'shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods . . . with the consent of the owner'. The defendant submitted that 'the seller' in s 9 referred to the person currently in possession and not to the true owner, that accordingly, M Ltd had bought and obtained possession of the car with the consent of the seller, A Ltd, and that therefore the transfer from M Ltd to the defendant had the same effect as if M Ltd were a mercantile agent in possession of the car with the consent of the original owner. The plaintiffs contended that s 9 did not affect the operation of the principle that a person could not give what he did not already have and that since M Ltd's title derived from a thief it could not pass on a good title to the defendant.

Held (Sir Denys Buckley dissenting) – Although the 'seller' in s 9 of the 1889 Act did not have to be the 'owner' he had at least to be a person who had the general property in the goods before a person buying from him could acquire a good title under s 9. Accordingly, a good title could not be passed under s 9 where the seller's own possession was derived from the unlawful possession of a thief, and the defect in title derived from a thief passed down the chain of any further purported sales. It followed that the defendant had never acquired a good title to the car and the appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 393 a b, p 395 g, p 396 b to g, p 398 d e, p 399 c and p 400 d, post).

Appeal

The defendant, Robert William Jones, appealed from the decision of his Honour Judge ap Robert sitting in the Bridgend County Court on 30 January 1986 whereby he awarded the plaintiffs, National Employers Mutual General Insurance Association Ltd, damages of £2,650, being the value of a motor car to which the plaintiffs had title and which was in the possession of the appellant. The facts are set out in the judgment of May LJ.

John Leighton Williams QC and Roger Garfield for the defendant.
Malcolm Pill QC and John Jenkins for the plaintiffs.

27 March. The following judgments were delivered.

MAY LJ. This is a defendant's appeal against a judgment of his Honour Judge ap Robert of 30 January 1986 awarding the plaintiffs £2,650 by way of damages, together with interest of £824 and costs. The defendant now seeks to have that judgment set aside and judgment entered in the action for him against the plaintiffs.

All the facts in this case were agreed. A Miss Hopkin was the owner of a Ford Fiesta motor car which was stolen from her on 3 February 1983. On 23 September 1983 the thieves were convicted. Prior to this, however, they had sold the car to a person called

- a Lacey on a date and at a price unknown. Lacey then sold on to one Roderick Thomas, again on a date and at a price unknown. On 6 February 1983 Thomas in his turn sold the car to Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd for £2,100. On 14 March 1983 Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd sold the car to Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd for £2,350. On March 1983 Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd sold the car to the defendant for £2,650. It was accepted that the defendant was completely honest when he bought the car. The plaintiffs were Miss Hopkin's insurers, who, having bought out their insured's interest after the theft for
- b £2,750, thereby acquired rights to the car. They asked for the car back by letter of 6 January 1984 but the defendant refused to return it. The plaintiffs accordingly began these proceedings in the Bridgend County Court on 27 September 1984, in which they succeeded, as I have indicated, in recovering damages representing the value of the car from the defendant. The short point which was argued below and before us is the extent to which, if at all, the operation of the maxim nemo dat quod non habet has been affected
- c by the provisions of s 9 of the Factors Act 1889 (which is still in force) and what is now s 25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, which is in very much the same terms.

As the relevant provisions of the two statutes are for present purposes identical, I quote those in the earlier statute for convenience. Section 1(1) of the 1889 Act provides:

- d 'The expression "mercantile agent" shall mean a mercantile agent having in the customary course of his business as such agent authority either to sell goods, or to consign goods for the purpose of sale, or to buy goods, or to raise money on the security of goods.'

Section 2(1) provides:

- e 'Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make
- f the same.'

Sections 8 and 9 of the Act are as follows:

- g '8. Where a person, having sold goods, continues, or is, in possession of the goods or of the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, or under any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same.
- h '9. Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer, by that person or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, or under any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods
- i or documents of title with the consent of the owner . . .'

The judge held that the operation of the maxim was not affected by, in particular, s 9 of the 1889 Act and that in effect one had to construe the section as if the word 'owner' has the same meaning as 'seller'. The argument in brief on behalf of the defendant, which was the argument advanced before the judge below, was that one should look at the actual words of s 9 and interpret them literally. If one did so on the facts of the instant case, it followed, it was contended, that the defendant acquired a good title to the car when he bought it from Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd, as indeed may some or all of the earlier sub-purchasers to it, other than the purchaser from the thieves themselves. a

The argument advanced on behalf of the defendant was direct and uncomplicated. Counsel submitted that there was no reason why one should not give s 9 of the 1889 Act its literal and clear meaning. If one did so and, for instance, in relation to the sale by Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd to Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd, substituted the names of the appropriate parties for their descriptions in the relevant words of s 9, it would read: b

‘Where Mid-Glamorgan, having bought or agreed to buy goods [the car], obtains with the consent of Autochoice possession of the car, the delivery or transfer, by Mid-Glamorgan, of the car, under any sale, to the defendant receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of Autochoice in respect of the car, shall have the same effect as if Mid-Glamorgan were a mercantile agent in possession of the car with the consent of Miss Hopkin.’ c

Then, the argument continued, by virtue of s 2 of the 1889 Act, the delivery or transfer of the car by Mid-Glamorgan to the defendant under the sale agreed between them was as valid as if the former had been expressly authorised by Miss Hopkin, as the owner of the car, to make the sale. Thus at least on the facts of this case, the defendant acquired a good title to the car and Miss Hopkin’s insurers ought not to have succeeded against the defendant in the court below. d

Counsel supported this argument by a number of collateral submissions. First, he contended that, other things being equal, the court should always adopt a literal approach to the construction of statutes. The court’s task was to see what Parliament had said, giving words their ordinary and natural meaning, and then to give effect to this in respect of the facts of a given case. It was only when the words of a statute in their ordinary meaning were unclear, or gave rise to an ambiguity, that the court in construing them should depart from the literal approach. e

Second, unless there was any clear reason to the contrary, a court should give the same meaning to the same word where it is used in different places in a statute. Thus ‘the owner’ of goods in s 2 clearly referred to the true owner, to the person having the general property in the goods. Unless there was any reason to the contrary, therefore, which counsel submitted there was not, the court should give the same meaning to the same words in s 9. On this basis any argument that one should read the word ‘owner’ in s 9 as equivalent to ‘seller’, or perhaps to ‘original seller’, could not be correct. Further, where in the same section of an Act the draftsman had used specific and different words, the clear inference was that Parliament had intended them to mean different things. Thus where in s 9 the draftsman had specifically referred to the seller and to the original seller, and thereafter to the owner, it again could not be right to equate one with the other. The care with which the section was drafted was demonstrated by the use of the phrase ‘the original seller’ at one point; this was used to make it quite clear that the reference was back to the seller referred to in the seventeenth word of the section and to avoid any possible confusion. f

Third, if the original seller in a s 9 situation already has the proprietary title to the relevant goods, then s 9 is not needed to pass that title to the ultimate buyer. g

In further support of his argument, counsel traced the legislative history of the relevant provisions. Section 2 of the 1889 Act had its general origin in s 1 of the Act 4 Geo 4 c 83 (factors (1823)). That enacted that, where goods were entrusted by their owner to an agent for the purpose of sale, then if that agent shipped the goods in his own name he should be deemed to be the true owner to any consignee of the goods who took them in good faith and without notice of any adverse interest in them. h

This basic principle was amended and extended in 1825 (6 Geo 4 c 94), 1842 (5 & 6 Vict c 39) and in 1877 (40 & 41 Vict c 39) and ultimately by the Factors Act 1889 itself, where it was given effect by s 2. Throughout, in order that an agent in possession of goods could pass a good title under this particular legislation, he had to have been entrusted with the goods, with the consent of their owner, as a mercantile agent and those taking from that agent must have done so in good faith and without notice of any other interest.

The extension of a similar principle to transactions by sellers permitted to remain in possession of the goods sold or buyers allowed to have possession of the goods bought, now embodied in ss 8 and 9 of the 1889 Act and ss 24 and 25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, was first brought about by ss 3 and 4 of the 1877 Act. Under those two sections the criterion to be complied with to enable an ultimate bona fide transferee without notice to obtain a good title was that after a sale the respective vendor or vendee should retain or obtain, as the case might be, the possession of the goods. Given that possession, then a subsequent delivery or transfer of the goods to such a transferee passed a good title. On the facts of the instant case, it was submitted, clearly Mid-Glamorgan had the necessary possession of the car, with the consent of Autochoice, and thus the sale by the latter to the defendant passed a good title to the latter.

So far as I am aware there are no English cases which are directly in point on this argument contended for on behalf of the defendant that the simple and literal construction of s 9 of the 1889 Act or s 25 of the 1979 Act is to be preferred. There are, however, one New Zealand and one Canadian decision at first instance against such a construction, to which I shall refer later.

In support of his argument, nevertheless, counsel for the defendant referred us to a number of decisions which have a substantial bearing on the points in issue in this appeal. The earliest to which I think I need refer is Folkes v King [1923] 1 KB 282, [1922] All ER Rep 658. In that case the owner of a motor car delivered it to a mercantile agent for sale on certain conditions. Dishonestly and in breach of those conditions the agent sold it to a purchaser who bought it in good faith and without notice of the agent's fraud. It was held by this court that the purchaser acquired a good title by virtue of s 2 of the 1889 Act. It was also held that the agent had not been guilty of the old larceny by a trick, since he was authorised by the erstwhile owner to pass the property in the car to a purchaser. Yet further, Bankes and Scrutton LJ expressed the view that as the owner had in fact consented to the mercantile agent having possession of the car, it was immaterial whether the latter had committed larceny by a trick. Folkes v King was, of course, a case decided on s 2 and not s 9 of the 1889 Act, but counsel was able to make the general observation, so far as it went, that even though goods may have been stolen title to them may pass where possession is or is deemed to be with the consent of the owner.

Next, in Pearson v Rose & Young Ltd [1950] 2 All ER 1027, [1951] 1 KB 275, another motor car case, it was held that title did not pass to the ultimate transferee because a mercantile agent could not sell a car 'in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent' unless he sold the registration book with the car. However, on the facts of that case, at the time of the purported sale to the transferee of both car and registration book the dishonest agent's possession of the latter was not 'with the consent of the owner'. Nevertheless, although obiter, the opening passage of the judgment of Denning LJ in that case ([1950] 2 All ER 1027 at 1031, [1951] 1 KB 275 at 286) is of interest in the context of the present appeal:

'In the early days of the common law the governing principle of our law of property was that no person could give a better title than he himself had got, but the needs of commerce have led to a progressive modification of this principle so as to protect innocent purchasers. We have had cases in this court recently about sales in market overt and sales by a sheriff, and now we have the present case about sale by a mercantile agent. The cases show how difficult it is to strike the right balance between the claims of true owners and the claims of innocent purchasers. The way that Parliament has done it in the case of mercantile agents is this. Parliament has protected the true owner by making it clear that he does not lose his right to goods when they are taken from him without his consent, as, for instance, when they have been stolen from his house by a burglar who has handed them over to a mercantile agent. In that case the true owner can claim them back from any person into whose hands they come, even from an innocent purchaser who has bought from a mercantile agent. Parliament has not protected the true owner if he has himself consented to a mercantile agent having possession of them, because, by leaving them in the agent's possession, he has clothed the agent with apparent authority to sell them, and he should not, therefore, be allowed to claim them back from an innocent purchaser.'

A case where the facts were very close to that of the instant one was Du Jardin v Beadman Bros Ltd [1952] 2 All ER 160, [1952] 2 QB 712. The essential ones for present purposes were that a rogue agreed to buy a motor car from the defendants. He gave a cheque in payment and left another car with the defendants as security. They allowed him to take the first car and its registration book away with him. Subsequently the rogue surreptitiously took back the second car he had given as security. Three days later he sold the first car to the plaintiff, who received it in good faith and without notice of any defect in the rogue's title. However, his cheque was worthless and after he had been convicted of fraud that first car was returned to the defendants. The plaintiff then sued them for its return. The defendants denied that the car had at any material time belonged to the plaintiff. Having stated these facts, Sellers J said ([1952] 2 All ER 160 at 161, [1952] 2 QB 712 at 715):

'In these circumstances, notwithstanding the fraudulent conduct of Greenaway throughout, unless authority requires me to hold otherwise, I would find that Greenaway, having agreed to buy the Standard car, obtained possession of it with the consent of the defendants and that he sold and delivered it to the plaintiff, who received it in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the defendants in respect of the car. If these findings are correct, the plaintiff obtained a good title under s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889.'

The judge then considered whether he was in law entitled to hold that the rogue's possession of the car had indeed been with the consent of the defendants, having regard to the fact that this had been brought about by the rogue's larceny by a trick. Having referred to the earlier authorities the judge held that he was so entitled, saying that he saw no reason to interpret 'consent' in the 1889 Act in an artificial way in order to bring it into harmony with the criminal law, which, in so far as larceny by a trick was concerned, was itself based on artificiality. The judge finally held, therefore, that the plaintiff had established a good title to the motor car which he claimed and made an order for its return to him.

As will appear, however, I think that the crucial distinction between Du Jardin v Beadman Bros Ltd and the one presently under appeal is that whereas in the former the root title to the motor car had been a good one in the defendants, nevertheless the relevant string of transactions in the present case began with a party with no title at all, namely the thieves who stole the Ford Fiesta from Miss Hopkin.

A similar point can be made in relation to the decision in Pacific Motor Auctions Pty Ltd v Motor Credits (Hire Finance) Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 105, [1965] AC 867. That was an appeal to the Privy Council from the High Court of Australia concerning s 28(1) of the New South Wales Sale of Goods Act 1923, which was in the same terms as s 8 of the 1889 Act and what is now s 24 of the 1979 Act. The opinion of the Privy Council, delivered by Lord Pearce, contained this paragraph ([1965] 2 All ER 105 at 110, [1965] AC 867 at 882):

a 'The English statutory provision [the Factors Act Amendment Act 1877, s 3] which was the origin of s. 28(1) was introduced in 1877 with the object of mitigating the asperity of the common law towards an innocent party purchasing goods from a person who has all the trappings of ownership but in truth has no proper title to the goods. Nemo dat quod non habet.'

b Later passages in the opinion delivered in this case stress the necessity to give the words of the relevant section their natural and ordinary meaning. For instance Lord Pearce said of the section under consideration in that case ([1965] 2 All ER 105 at 112, [1965] AC 867 at 886):

c 'One may, perhaps, say in loose terms that a person having sold goods continues in possession as long as he is holding because of, and only because of, the sale; but what justification is there for imposing such an elaborate and artificial construction on the natural meaning of the words? The object of the section is to protect an innocent purchaser who is deceived by the vendor's physical possession of goods or documents and who is inevitably unaware of legal rights which fetter the apparent power to dispose. Where a vendor retains uninterrupted physical possession of the goods, why should an unknown arrangement, which substitutes a bailment for ownership, disentitle the innocent purchaser to protection from a danger which is just as great as that from which the section is admittedly intended to protect him?'

d In this part of this judgment I turn finally to Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams [1964] 2 All ER 135, [1964] 1 WLR 1028 tried at first instance by Davies LJ. In that case the plaintiffs sold a car to a rogue for which he paid by cheque. This was dishonoured. The plaintiffs then took all possible steps to trace the rogue and told the hire-purchase information bureau that they claimed that the car still belonged to them. By so doing they took all sufficient steps to avoid their contract of sale with the rogue in accordance with the principles laid down in Car and Universal Finance Co Ltd v Caldwell [1964] 1 All ER 290, [1965] 1 QB 525. A little later the rogue sold the car in Warren Street for cash and his purchaser resold it to the defendant, who took the car in good faith and without notice of any defect in his vendor's title to the car. The plaintiffs demanded it, but the defendant refused to return it. The judge dismissed the plaintiffs' claim and said ([1964] 2 All ER 135 at 139, [1964] 1 WLR 1028 at 1033):

e 'On the facts of this case, Andrew [the rogue], having bought the car, obtained possession of it with the consent of the plaintiffs. It is well established that consent in such circumstances obtained by fraud, is, nevertheless, consent (Pearson v. Rose and Young, Ltd. ([1950] 2 All ER 1027 at 1032-1033, [1951] 1 KB 275 at 288-289), per DENNING, L.J.; Du Jardin v. Beadman Brothers, Ltd. ([1952] 2 All ER 160, [1952] 2 QB 712)). From the decision in Car and Universal Finance Co., Ltd. v. Caldwell ([1964] 1 All ER 290, [1965] 1 QB 525), it must be taken that the plaintiffs withdrew their consent; but this makes no difference (s. 2 (2) of the Factors Act, 1889, and see per COLLINS, L.J., in Cahn v. Pockett's Bristol Channel Steam Packet Co. ([1899] 1 QB 643 at 658)). It follows, therefore, that the sale by Andrew to Biss was covered by s. 9 and s. 2 of the Factors Act, 1889. It had the same effect as though Andrew were a mercantile agent in possession of the car with the consent of the plaintiffs; that is to say, that, if the sale was in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, it was effective to transfer title provided that Biss acted in good faith without notice of any rights of the plaintiffs in respect of the car and without notice that Andrew had no authority to sell.'

j He then raised the question whether the sale by the rogue could be said to have been in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, but held that it should be so described on the evidence before him that in Warren Street and its neighbourhood there was a well-established street market for cash dealing in used cars.

The whole decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams [1964] 3 All ER 532, [1965] 1 QB 560. That court was principally concerned with the difficult question of construction about the effect of the words in s 2 of the 1889 Act 'made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent' and in a case under s 9 of a buyer obtaining possession and then making a disposition. However, this need not trouble us in the present appeal since both Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd and Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd were recognised dealers and each sold the Ford Fiesta in the course of their business as such.

However, in the course of his judgment Sellers LJ gave voice to this caution ([1964] 3 All ER 532 at 536, [1965] 1 QB 560 at 574):

'Before one takes too favourable a view for the buyer and too harsh a view against the true owner of the goods where s. 9 can be invoked, one must remember that it is taking away the right which would have existed at common law, and for myself I should not be prepared to enlarge it more than the words clearly permitted and required. It seems to me that all that s. 9 can be said clearly to do is to place the seller on this second sale, the sub-sale to the buyer, in the position of a mercantile agent when he has in fact in his possession the goods of somebody else and does no more than clothe him with that fictitious or notional position in this transaction.'

On this material the contention of counsel for the defendant in our present case can be summarised in this way. Apart from the New Zealand and Alberta decisions at first instance (to which I myself have not as yet referred, but will do hereafter) there is no case directly deciding that the literal construction of s 9 of the 1889 Act is wrong. Prima facie such a construction should be the preferred one. At least on their own facts such a clear construction was the one adopted in Du Jardin v Beadman Bros Ltd and Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams, in each of which the decision of the trial judge was upheld in this court. It has been applied in cases where the title passed by the original vendor has been no more than a voidable one, and indeed when on the facts that title has been avoided before the rogue passed the goods on. To adopt such a construction does 'mitigate the asperity of the common law' in this type of case. Although in the early development of the Factors Acts the important consideration was that the goods subsequently sold had been entrusted to an agent by the true owner, their later development stressed the importance of the possession of the goods through which the ultimate title was derived. Such an approach had received the approval of the Privy Council in Pacific Motor Auctions Pty Ltd v Motor Credits (Hire Finance) Ltd and it took care of the mischief against which the material statutory provisions were directed, namely the protection of innocent purchasers. On policy grounds there was no reason not to adopt the construction contended for: as between the two innocent parties, the original true owner and the ultimate innocent purchaser, it let the loss lie where it had fallen; it made for certainty; it avoided unnecessary litigation; the interests of the public were well protected by the requirement that to be protected the purchaser should have acquired the goods for value and without notice.

The judge in the court below rejected the argument based on the literal construction of s 9 of the 1889 Act and s 25 of the 1979 Act. In his opinion common sense dictated that 'dominion cannot arise or begin with the possession of a thief. The draftsman intended that in these two sections the words "owner" and "seller" should have the same meaning'. With respect to the judge, however, unless I am forced to this somewhat artificial construction of the two sections, I would prefer not to adopt it.

There has been some academic interest on this point. Some commentators have favoured the literal construction contended for by the defendant herein. Others have argued for various constructions, which respectfully I have found artificial, in order to avoid the result that an ultimate purchaser of goods can obtain a good title through a thief, and not merely one guilty of larceny by a trick (see 27 MLR 472, 35 MLR 268, 37 MLR 213, 38 MLR 77, 83).

However, as Professor Atiyah has written in his treatise Sale of Goods (7th edn, 1985) p 302, if the conclusion contended for by the defendant is correct it is a startling one—

‘which at first sight seems so contrary to everything one knows about the law that it cannot be right. If this indeed is the law, there can be little doubt that a large number of cases have been wrongly decided, and many innocent buyers of motor vehicles have been wrongfully deprived of their vehicles, because it has never seemed to have occurred to anybody that a buyer from a thief has a greater power to pass “title” than the thief himself has.’

As Professor Atiyah also says, however, the argument in favour of a literal construction and the consequent result is not easy to refute. In the instant appeal, counsel for the plaintiffs sought to do so by submitting that s 9 of the 1889 Act and s 25 of the 1979 Act had to be construed as applying solely to the one transaction to which one is seeking to apply them. The ‘owner’ in the two sections means merely the owner of the title which is the subject matter of the particular transaction which one is considering. In support he quoted and adopted a passage from Goode Commercial Law (1986) pp 413–414:

‘One other problem remains. Though the consent to possession necessary to attract section 9 is the consent of the seller, the delivery or transfer is given the same effect as if the person making it were a mercantile agent in possession with the consent of the owner. From this it has been deduced that section 9 can operate even if the original seller lacked title. Such an interpretation would produce the result, absurd in policy terms, that whilst a thief could not pass title in the stolen goods to his purchaser, yet that purchaser could pass title on a resale. This conclusion has rightly been rejected by courts in Kenya, Canada and New Zealand, though they have been hard put to it to escape from the language of the section. One can see how, as a matter of drafting, the problem has arisen. The draftsman, whose compression of language has caused difficulty elsewhere, evidently felt that rather than spell out the effect of section 9 in extenso he could achieve the same result more elegantly by incorporating by reference the effect of section 2. But this section, dealing with a different problem, refers to the consent of the owner, so that the concluding words of section 9 necessarily had to refer to the consent of the owner, for a reference to the consent of the seller would have been meaningless when translated back into section 2. There is no wholly satisfactory method of reading the language of section 9; but the most satisfactory explanation is that advanced by Professor Battersby and Mr Preston [see (1975) 38 MLR 77], that “owner” is to be read as meaning “the relevant owner”, that is, the owner of the title which is the subject of the transaction, i.e. the title vested in S. If this is the best title, then that is what passes on the buyer’s disposition. If it is merely a possessory title, then the innocent third party acquires a mere possessory title; good against anyone except the true owner. In producing this last result, section 9 is admittedly otiose, for the third party would anyway acquire a possessory title under the general law. An alternative approach, which does somewhat more violence to the language of the section but produces much the same result, is to read “seller” as meaning “seller who is the owner”. This has the effect that only an indefeasible title could pass under section 9; but if S had a mere possessory title, this would still pass to the sub-purchaser at common law.’ (Professor Goode’s emphasis.)

Counsel for the plaintiffs contended that at common law the principle embodied in the maxim nemo dat quod non habet was a fundamental one, that it would be surprising to find it disapplied merely by the somewhat ambiguous words of s 9 of the 1889 Act, that an indication of the invalidity of this particular construction of the relevant sections is the fact that for over 100 years no one is reported to have advanced it before this case, or if they have then in no case has it succeeded.

In so far as the mischief referred to by counsel for the defendant as justifying his literal approach to the relevant sections is concerned, counsel for the plaintiffs echoed arguendo the comment by Lord Donovan towards the end of his reservation to the 12th Report of the Law Reform Committee on the Transfer of Title to Chattels in 1966 (Cmnd 2958) to the effect that only a small proportion of stolen property is ever recovered, and that it does not seem that the successful disposal of such property is particularly difficult or that the innocent purchasers of it are being dispossessed on a scale which calls for their protection. a

Counsel then referred us to the two Commonwealth decisions which I have mentioned. In Elwin v O'Regan and Maxwell [1971] NZLR 1124 Beattie J had before him in the Supreme Court in Wellington, first, a claim by the ultimate purchaser of a motor car against the agent of a finance company which had purported to repossess the car. The allegation was that a person who had originally taken the car on hire purchase from the finance company had sold it without their consent, and that after a number of subsequent sales it had been bought by the plaintiff in good faith and without notice of any defect in the title of his seller. The plaintiff relied on the same argument as that raised by the defendant in this appeal, based on a literal reading of s 27(2) of the New Zealand Sale of Goods Act 1908, which was in the same terms as s 9 of the English Factors Act 1889 or s 25 of our Sale of Goods Act 1979. b

Before Beattie J counsel submitted that the deliberate wording of the section had always been regarded as putting the point beyond doubt and that it could not be assumed that the use of the word 'owner' at the end of the section was a slip. However, the judge then quoted from an earlier edition of Professor Atiyah's book (3rd edn, 1966, p 163), in which a similar passage to that which I have quoted appeared, and then said (at 1131): c

'I am inclined to think that what Atiyah has said seems to accord with commonsense and what has apparently been the practice adhered to in the past. By use of the word "seller" it seems to me that the section clearly envisages a contract of sale.' d

The judge then referred to Butterworth v Kingsway Motors Ltd [1954] 2 All ER 694, [1954] 1 WLR 1286 and quoted a passage from the judgment of Pearson J in that case in which the latter clearly thought that the maxim nemo dat applied in similar circumstances to those in Elwin v O'Regan and Maxwell, at least until the original purported seller who had been in breach of her hire-purchase agreement perfected her title by paying the finance company the outstanding sum due. e

'It seems to me that these comments of Pearson J lend some weight to the interpretation of the section by Atiyah and I cannot accept, for example, that stolen goods finding a haven with a third or fourth purchaser would give title, yet on the argument for the plaintiff it appears they would. I say this against an argument before me that it is one thing for the "owner" of a chattel to maintain title against the purchaser for value without notice who had purchased direct from a fraudulent "seller" who had no title, but it is quite a different thing for the owner to assert title against a purchaser for value without notice who has purchased, in turn, from a purchaser for value without notice. Counsel contended that, viewed in this light, the policy of the section seems to indicate that when there is a chain of transactions as here, there must be a point at which the "owner's" title is extinguished at which moment the most recent purchaser in the chain acquires an unassailable title. While I can appreciate the hardship that is demonstrated by finding against his argument and the difficulty that later purchasers in the chain are confronted with concerning making of fruitful inquiries, regrettably it seems to me the principle of "nemo dat quod non habet" is applicable.' g

In Brandon v Leckie (1972) 29 DLR (3d) 633 in the Alberta Supreme Court Moore J in his turn had before him for trial two actions in which two plaintiffs sought to recover h a caravans which had been stolen from them, but which were later sold through a mercantile agent to the defendants who were each bona fide purchasers for value without notice of any defect in their sellers' titles. Section 27(2) of the Alberta Sale of Goods Act 1970 is in the same terms as s 25 of the English 1979 Act and the defendants relied on its literal construction in the same way as does the defendant before us.

In his judgment on this point, Moore J also referred to Professor Atiyah's comments (3rd edn, 1966, pp 163–164) which I have quoted and then later in his judgment said (at b 637):

'Section 27(2) of the Sale of Goods Act makes no reference to the rights of the true and lawful owner or for that matter to the rights of anyone other than the seller. Section 3(1) of the Factors Act states that the sale is "as valid" as if the mercantile agent were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same. It does not remove any right accruing in the true owner, either by statement or by implication. It therefore follows that the section applies on the face only to rights between a buyer and a seller and not against the true owner. It simply does not seem logical that the legislature of this province, in its wisdom, would enact legislation, the effect of which would be to preclude a true owner, who has done no wrongful act, from attempting to regain and in fact regaining a chattel stolen from him. Never at any time from the moment of the original theft of each motor home has title passed from the original owners. As counsel for the plaintiff argued—nemo dat quod non habet. Nobody can give good title to what he does not possess . . . George Young [the rogue in the case] never had title to give to Calgary Automotive and consequently neither Leckie nor Borgal [the defendants] could receive good title from Calgary Automotive. The rule nemo dat quod non habet must prevail in the absence of overriding statutory provisions. One can paraphrase sections of statutes with magnificent results. However, in the instant case George Young had nothing to sell—thus the end of the paraphrasing. There is no need to distinguish "seller" and "owner" other than to say that Young never fell into either category as he could never sell something he did not have the right to sell and obviously he was never the owner of either motor home. Nor is there any need to comment on the fact that Calgary Automotive was admitted to be a mercantile agent at the outset of the trial. Calgary Automotive could not in any way, shape or form pass on good title.'

For my part, I agree with Professor Atiyah's comment that the defendant's argument in the instant appeal is at first sight, and indeed on further consideration, so contrary to everything one knows or had been taught about the law that it cannot be right. On the other hand, I would prefer not to have to adopt any artificial construction of either s 25 of the 1979 Act or the other statutory provisions with which we are concerned in this appeal. Although the drafting of the sections is not entirely clear, if the draftsman in 1889 used the word 'owner' in s 9 of the Act of that year in error for the word 'seller', I find it surprising that he repeated the error in 1893 and still more surprising that he repeated it again in 1979.

Ever mindful of Lord Halsbury LC's warning in Leader v Duffey (1888) 13 App Cas 294, to which Sir Denys Buckley refers, nevertheless in my respectful opinion the resolution of the problem lies in large measure in adopting the approaches of Beattie J in Elwin v O'Regan and Maxwell and of Moore J in Brandon v Leckie and concentrating more on the earlier part of s 25 than on the latter, to which alone the argument for the defendant herein has in truth been addressed.

By s 2(1) of the 1979 Act:

'A contract of sale of goods is a contract by which the seller transfers or agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a money consideration, called the price.'

By s 2(4) that Act provides:

'Where under a contract of sale the property in the goods is transferred from the seller to the buyer the contract is called a sale.' a

By s 61(1) of the Act 'property' in goods means the general property in goods, and not merely a special property. Thus, the essence of sale is the transfer of the ownership or general property in goods from a seller to a buyer for a price. By the same subsection a 'buyer' means a person who buys or agrees to buy goods and a 'seller' is similarly defined b mutatis mutandis. Thus in my opinion the opening words of s 25, those which lay down the condition precedent for the consequences provided for by the later words of the section, only contemplate a transaction in which the general property in the relevant goods has been acquired or it has been agreed should be acquired. A transaction whereby a thief purports to sell goods to A, in which he purports to but cannot pass the general property in the goods to A because it is not vested in him, is not one which can bring s 25 into operation at all. c

Similarly where A, ex hypothesi having no property in the goods, purports to sell them on to B, who receives them in good faith and without notice of the absence in A of any property in them, the transaction is not a 'sale' within the definition in the 1979 Act, nor can A or B respectively properly be described as 'seller' or 'buyer'. Thus the condition precedent to the subsequent operation of the later part of s 25 has not been satisfied. d

The same result, or non-result, follows on any purported further sales from B to C or C to D and so on. If the original transferor is a thief from the true owner, then he has never acquired property in the goods and no purported 'sale' by him or by anyone to whom he may have purported to 'sell' the goods can attract the consequences of s 9 of the 1889 Act or s 25 of the 1979 Act.

Where, however, a rogue buys a motor car from its true owner and sells it on, whether before or more particularly after the true owner has rescinded the contract between him and the rogue, there is at least for a time a 'sale' in law and thus scope for the subsequent operation of the second half of s 25 on later transactions involving the car between innocent parties. e

If this is the correct approach to the construction of s 25, then there is no need to construe the word 'owner' in the section in any other sense than its literal, ordinary meaning. However, there is only scope for s 25 to operate at all where the general property in the goods passed at some stage, at least temporarily to a transferee from him. f

In my opinion, therefore, the judge in this case reached the correct conclusion, although by a somewhat different route from the one I have followed. I would therefore dismiss this appeal. g

CROOM-JOHNSON LJ. The agreed facts are that Miss Hopkin was the owner of a Ford car number DVH635V which was stolen on 3 February 1983. On 23 September 1983 the thieves were convicted. The thieves sold it to a person called Lacey. Lacey then sold it to Roderick Thomas. On 6 February 1983 Mr Thomas sold to Autochoice (Bridgend) Ltd for £2,100. On 14 March 1983 Autochoice sold it to Mid-Glamorgan Motors Ltd for £2,350. On 18 March 1983 Mid-Glamorgan sold it to the defendant for £2,650. It is agreed that the defendant is completely honest. The plaintiffs bought Miss Hopkin's interest for £2,750 and acquired her rights to the car. They wrote to the defendant asking for the car back. He did not return it, and was sued to judgment for £2,650 plus interest. The defendant now appeals. h

The plaintiffs say that once the car was stolen no subsequent purchaser acquired any title to the car because nemo dat quod non habet. They rely on the Sale of Goods Act 1979, s 21(1): j

'Subject to this Act, where goods are sold by a person who is not their owner, and who does not sell them under the authority or with the consent of the owner, the

a buyer acquires no better title to the goods than the seller had, unless the owner of the goods is by his conduct precluded from denying the seller's authority to sell.'

No question arises of any estoppel against the plaintiffs or Miss Hopkins. Section 21(2) provides:

b 'Nothing in this Act affects—(a) the provisions of the Factors Acts or any enactment enabling the apparent owner of goods to dispose of them as if he were the true owner . . .'

The defendant relies, as he did before the judge, on s 9 of the Factors Act 1889, which was included (with one immaterial omission) in the Sale of Goods Act 1893 as s 25(2). It has now been re-enacted as s 25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979. Since its interpretation requires consideration of other provisions of the 1889 Act, it is convenient to quote s 9, which is still in force. It deals with the position of a buyer who obtains possession:

c 'Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer, by that person or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof . . .
d to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner . . .'

'Mercantile agent' is defined in s 1(1) of the 1889 Act:

e 'The expression "mercantile agent" shall mean a mercantile agent having in the customary course of his business as such agent authority either to sell goods, or to consign goods for the purpose of sale, or to buy goods, or to raise money on the security of goods.'

The powers of such a mercantile agent are set out in s 2(1):

f 'Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same.'

By s 1(2) a person shall be deemed to be in possession of goods or of the documents of title where the goods or documents are in his actual custody or subject to his control.

The defendant's submission is that s 9 of the 1889 Act gives him a good title to the car which defeats that of Miss Hopkin and therefore that of the plaintiffs. This is because if
h one gives the words of the section their ordinary and natural meaning it means that Mid-Glamorgan bought the car from the seller Autochoice, that they obtained possession of it with the consent of Autochoice and delivered it to the defendant. The result is that the delivery to him had the same effect as if Mid-Glamorgan were a mercantile agent in possession of the car with the consent of the owner. 'Owner' it is said means 'true owner' whoever that may be, in this case Miss Hopkin. It is submitted that this process of i reasoning applies to everyone in the chain after the purchaser from the thief. It is submitted that Lacey, who bought from the thief, would not get a good title himself but would be able to give one to Thomas, who in turn gave one to Autochoice, and so on down the line.

Before the judge the plaintiffs argued that in s 9 'owner' and 'seller' are to be equated, an argument which the judge accepted. As a matter of construction that has great difficulties, because the statute could hardly be using, within one section, two different words to describe the same person. Before this court the argument was put in a different way, on the basis that 'owner' is not referring to the 'true owner' (Miss Hopkin) but to the owner of the mere possessory title which is being transferred in the particular transaction. The meaning of 'owner' in s 9 has been the subject of much discussion by legal writers. Professor Goode, in his Commercial Law (1986) p 414 suggests that 'owner' here means 'relevant owner', which again means the seller. a

One difficulty in giving the word 'owner' the suggested special meaning lies in the context in which it is found. The delivery of the goods has the same effect 'as if' the deliverer were a mercantile agent as defined in s 1. Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams [1964] 3 All ER 532, [1965] 1 QB 560 requires that the notional mercantile agent can only exercise the powers given to a real one by s 2(1). This requires him to be in possession of the goods with the consent of the owner. 'Possession' is given a wide definition in the Act. There is no definition of 'owner', which must therefore be given its ordinary meaning. b

Section 9 comes into operation where someone has bought or agreed to buy goods. Buying and selling in a commercial context means the transfer of title, of ownership. Agreeing to buy or sell means a binding agreement to the same effect. On this interpretation, the section requires an effective transaction, even though it may later be avoided by one of the parties on sufficient grounds. At any rate, it must be a transaction capable of transferring the true title. If that is what 'bought' means in the section it follows that both the seller and his buyer must have been parties to such a transaction. This does not mean that the 'owner' is always the same person as the seller, although in many cases he will be. The seller is the person who consents to the buyer having the possession of the goods but the seller might be a duly authorised agent of the true owner. Nevertheless, the 'owner' who is bound by the transaction is the true owner. c

The proper approach where there is a chain of transactions is to start with the initial defect in the title, in this case the thief. Lacey, who bought from the thief, got no title. Nor could he give one. The situation was the same as in Butterworth v Kingsway Motors Ltd [1954] 2 All ER 694, [1954] 1 WLR 1286, where a Miss Rudolph, who had hired the car, sold it on. It went through several further sales. None of the purchasers acquired a title until it so happened that Miss Rudolph belatedly completed her own hire-purchase transaction and obtained thereby a title which was transmitted down the line and 'fed' the title of the later purchasers. But until that happened only the hire-purchase company were the true owners. d

The first Factors Act was passed in 1823. Others were passed in 1825 and 1842. They were concerned with protecting innocent purchasers or pledgees of goods or documents of title where they had been 'entrusted' by the owner to a mercantile agent. The 1889 Act was both an amending and a consolidating Act. It substituted for the concept of entrusting that of obtaining possession with consent. The pre-1889 Acts were in 1899 declared to be in force in New South Wales Act. Section 9 of the 1889 Act was later paralleled in the New South Wales Sale of Goods Act 1923, as s 28(2) and s 2(1) in almost identical language became s 5 of the Factors (Mercantile Agents) Act 1923 of New South Wales. e

In Cook v Rodgers (1946) 46 SR (NSW) 229, a case in the Supreme Court of New South Wales, Roper J had to consider claims to a car both by the true owner and by a possessor at the end of a chain of transactions which included a sale by the hirer under a hire-purchase agreement. The possessor relied on s 5 of the Factors (Mercantile Agents) Act 1923 Roper J referred to a number of English decisions on the pre-1889 Acts, where the matters at issue were whether the goods had been 'entrusted' and whether the agent in question was a mercantile agent so as to come within the terms of the Acts. He observed that they were all cases where the 'entrusting' arose from the acts of, or acts binding on, the true owner. He referred in particular to Van Casteel v Booker (1848) 2 Exch 691 at f

- 698, 154 ER 668 at 671, where Parke B indicated in argument that to bring the transaction within the Factors Acts the entrusting must be by the true owner. He recognised that in s 2(1) of the 1889 Act the wording now required that the mercantile agent should be in possession of the goods 'with the consent of the owner', while in s 5 of the New South Wales Factors (Mercantile Agents) Act 1923 the wording was 'entrusted' with the possession, but he adopted the words of Channell J in Oppenheimer v Attenborough & Son [1907] 1 KB 510 at 516 that there was no real difference between the two expressions. He decided that to obtain title from a mercantile agent the possession (in the English Act) and the entrusting with possession (in the New South Wales Act) required the possession to come from or be with the consent of the true owner of the goods.

- Nevertheless, the wording in the new s 9 is different, and it would be right to consider its meaning afresh, and not to rely on that part of the approach of Roper J. For the reasons which I have already given, I conclude that the buying and the selling referred to in s 9 presuppose a valid transaction by or on behalf of the true owner at some stage.

- In the present case the judge followed Elwin v O'Regan and Maxwell [1971] NZLR 1124. The plaintiff bought a car from Maxwell. Maxwell had purchased it from a company which in turn had purchased it from a man called Nevin. Nevin had obtained it in New South Wales under a hire-purchase agreement and wrongfully sold it on. O'Regan had seized possession of the car on behalf of the true owners, the finance company. It was held that notwithstanding that there was a chain of purchasers for value without notice of any defect of title, the principle of nemo dat quod non habet applied, and the true owner could assert his right to the car. Reliance was placed by the plaintiff on the New Zealand Sale of Goods Act 1908 s 27(2), which is identical to s 28(2) of the Sale of Goods Act 1923 (NSW), a section relied on in Cook v Rodgers. They are both identical to the 1889 Act, s 9. The conclusion to which Beattie J came was that in s 9 'owner' means 'seller', in reliance on a dictum of Scrutton LJ in Marten v Whale [1917] 2 KB 480 at 486, where he equated the two.

- But Beattie J also adopted a dictum of Pearson J in Butterworth v Kingsway Motors Ltd [1954] 2 All ER 694 at 701, [1954] 1 WLR 1286 at 1295:

- 'The various purported sales all took place at times when Bowmaker, Ltd. were still the owners of the car, so that all the purported sellers in this rather long chain had no title to it at the times when the purported sales were made.'

Beattie J appears to have adopted as an alternative finding that the 'seller' in s 9 of the 1889 Act must be someone who can give a title.

- The only other case in which this problem seems to have been decided is Brandon v Leckie, Avco Corp v Borgal (1972) 29 DLR (3d) 633, consolidated actions tried in the Alberta Supreme Court. These, like the present, were cases where the goods were stolen. In each case the thief, a man called Young, sold to a mercantile agent who in turn sold on to a bona fide purchaser. The question was whether the purchaser could rely on s 10(1) of the Alberta Factors Act, which again is the same as s 9 of the 1889 Act. That section involved reading into it the Alberta equivalent of s 2 of the 1889 Act. Again the point was taken that 'seller' means the same thing as 'owners'.

- The judge, Moore J, put the matter simply. For simplicity I am indicating in square brackets the English equivalent of the Alberta legislation. He said (at 637):

- 'Section 27(2) of the Sale of Goods Act [s 9 of the 1889 Act] makes no reference to the rights of the true and lawful owner or for that matter to the rights of anyone other than the seller. Section 3(1) [s 2(1)] of the Factors Act states that the sale is "as valid" as if the mercantile agent were expressly authorized by the owner of the goods to make the same. It does not remove any right accruing in the true owner, either by statement or by implication. It therefore follows that the section applies on the face only to rights between a buyer and a seller and not against the true owner.'

After referring with approval to a decision of Sargent J of the British Columbia County Court in Bremmer v Johnson [1946] 3 WWR 39, he said:

'The rule nemo dat quod non habet must prevail in the absence of overriding statutory provisions . . . in the instant case George Young had nothing to sell . . . There is no need to distinguish "seller" and "owner" other than to say that Young never fell into either category as he could never sell something he did not have the right to sell and obviously he was never the owner of either motor home. Nor is there any need to comment on the fact that Calgary Automotive [the purchasers from Young] was admitted to be a mercantile agent at the outset of the trial. Calgary Automotive could not in any way, shape or form pass on good title.'

There cases are not directly in point with the present case on their facts, because there was no 'seller' to Calgary Automotive who put them in possession of the motor homes. There was no equivalent to Roderick Thomas. But the principle is clear. Just as the thief could not give title to Lacey, so Lacey could not be a 'seller' to Thomas, or Thomas a 'seller' to Autochoice, or Autochoice to Mid-Glamorgan.

My conclusion is that s 9 of the 1889 Act did not by a sidewind change the law as it had been up to that time. 'Owner' in that section means the true owner, but the effect of the section is not to give title where the seller's own possession is derived from unlawful possession, as from a thief. I base this conclusion on the construction of ss 9 and 2(1) read together, on the history of the Factors Acts and on the authorities such as they are. The dearth of case law on this point is only an example of the saying that the more self-evident a proposition is, the harder it is to find authority for it.

I would dismiss the appeal.

SIR DENYS BUCKLEY. When a court is required to interpret a statute its function is to discover the intention of the legislature in enacting the particular statutory provision under consideration. The material from which that intention must primarily be discovered is the language used in the particular provision, read in the context of the statute as a whole. If that language is clear and unequivocal, the court must interpret and give effect to the provision in the sense of that clear and unequivocal language, unless to do so would be incongruent with some other part of the statute, or produce an irrational result, thus engendering uncertainty about the legislature's true intention. If authority is required in these respects, it is to be found in Leader v Duffey (1888) 13 App Cas 294 at 301 per Lord Halsbury LC, A-G v Milne [1914] AC 765 at 771 per Lord Haldane LC, A-G for Canada v Hallett & Carey Ltd [1952] AC 427 at 449, per Lord Radcliffe, Westminster Bank Ltd v Zang [1966] 1 All ER 114 at 120, [1966] AC 182 at 222 per Lord Reid and many other authorities cited in the notes to 44 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) paras 856-857.

The question in the present case is whether the defendant can successfully assert that he has in the events which happened an indefeasible title as owner of the relevant motor car. The amount at stake is not great, but the question is one of general public interest.

The answer depends on the true interpretation and effect of s 9 of the Factors Act 1889 and s 25 of the Sale of the Goods Act 1979. Those sections are for present purposes in identical terms. I shall refer to s 9 only, but precisely similar considerations apply to s 25.

For the sake of clarity and ease of reference I will set out the words used in the sections, omitting all words which can be regarded as surplusage in relation to the facts of the present case, and introducing letters to identify the persons referred to in the various parts of the sections.

When so treated s 9 reads thus:

'Where a person (B), having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller (A) possession of the goods . . . the delivery or transfer, by that person (B) . . . of the goods . . . under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof . . . to any person (C) receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller (A) in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer (B) were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods . . . with the consent of the owner.'

It will be observed that everything in that passage which follows the words 'as if' sets up a fictitious hypothesis on which the section is to operate. I will call this 'the s 9 hypothesis'. To understand the effect of it, one must then turn to s 2 of the 1889 Act, which provides:

'(1) Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods . . . any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same.'

This section clearly infers that a mercantile agent to whom it applies has not in fact full authority to make the disposition in question, for, if he were duly authorised, the section would be otiose. Section 2 consequently, when read in conjunction with s 9, introduces a further hypothetical element to the operation of s 9, viz that the person who makes the disposition is doing so in the purported exercise of an authority with which he is not clothed.

Having regard to the s 9 hypothesis, it is not necessary for the purpose of applying s 9 to establish that B was in fact a mercantile agent at the relevant time or (if in fact he was so) that he was acting as a mercantile agent in his relevant transaction with C; nor is it necessary to establish that he was in possession of the goods with the consent of the owner. These matters are to be assumed. Nor, in my judgment, is it necessary to consider who is the owner whose consent is to be assumed. In a case to which s 2 alone applies, the fact of the owner's consent must be established, in which connection the identity of the owner must be ascertained; but, in a case in which s 2 is called into play only as a feature or consequence of the s 9 hypothesis, it is the quality of the assumed consent that is significant, not the identity of the person whose consent is to be assumed. In other words, the owner referred to in the s 9 hypothesis is as hypothetical as are the mercantile agent and the consent.

The hypothetical basis of the operation of s 9 was remarked on by Sellers and Pearson LJ in Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams [1964] 3 All ER 532, [1965] 1 QB 560. As was recognised in that case, some difficulty arises in applying s 2 as part of the s 9 hypothesis because s 2 requires that the disposer of the goods shall have disposed of them when acting in the ordinary course of business as a mercantile agent. This is not a feature which is expressly required to be assumed as part of the s 9 hypothesis. In Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams the party answering to B in my exposition of s 9 had bought a car and obtained possession of it with the consent of A, the vendor. The vendor subsequently rescinded the contract, but the car was still in B's possession when he sold it at a later date to C. The sale by B to C took place in a kerbside market in Warren Street, London, but it was not suggested that this constituted a sale in market overt. B by then had no subsisting title to the car, but s 9 was held to enable C to resist a claim by A for the return of the car. B seems not in fact to have been selling as a mercantile agent, but this court treated the conditions of s 2 as satisfied on the ground (as was expressed by Pearson LJ ([1964] 3 All ER 532 at 539, [1965] 1 QB 560 at 579)) either (i) that B's hypothetical business should be that of a mercantile agent or (ii) that B on his sale to C was doing something which would constitute acting in the ordinary course of business if he were a mercantile agent.

I must now consider the circumstances in which the s 9 hypothesis is to operate. These are set out in that part of s 9 which precedes the words 'as if', the requirements of which must historically have been fully satisfied for the section to apply. These requirements can be analysed as follows: (a) B must have bought or agreed to buy the relevant goods from A, (b) B must have obtained possession of the goods with A's consent, (c) B must have delivered or transferred the goods to C, (d) that delivery or transfer must have been effected under a sale, pledge or other disposition of the goods and (e) C must have received the goods in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right 'of the original seller'. It is, in my view, clear that the transaction between A and B must be a sale, or an agreement to sell, in which A is the seller and B the purchaser. It is also clear that the transaction between B and C must be a sale or a pledge or some other kind of disposition by B to C. a

The objective of the section is clearly, in my judgment, to confer on C an unassailable title to the ownership of the goods notwithstanding some circumstance which would otherwise prevent him having such a title. The circumstance in the present case which might have that effect is the fact that the car was stolen from Miss Hopkin. The contention of the plaintiffs is that the thief, having no title to the ownership of the car, could pass no such title to Lacey, and that that disability continued through the chain of successive sub-purchasers, so that the defendant could acquire no title to the ownership of the car from Glamorgan Motors. This, it was submitted, is the consequence of the ancient maxim of the common law nemo dat quod non habet. The question for consideration appears to me to be whether s 9 on its true construction confers a statutory title to the ownership of the goods overriding the title of the original owner. c

Suppose that goods in the ownership of O are stolen by a thief, T. T acquires no legal right to either the ownership or the possession of the goods. T, having the goods de facto in his possession or under his control, sells or agrees to sell them to X, or purports to do so. Having no title to the goods, T cannot pass any title in them to X, who accordingly acquires no title to them at common law. The transaction between T and X is not affected by s 9 because T has not bought or agreed to buy the goods, and so cannot be equated with B in my exposition of s 9; so X acquires no statutory title to the goods. So far I am entirely in agreement with this analysis. X obtains possession of the goods with T's consent and sells them to Y. At that point (if T, X and Y are to be equated with A, B and C in my exposition of s 9) the section will come into play, provided that Y has acted in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of 'the original seller'. In that case O would, in my judgment, be barred by the section from recovering the goods from Y, who would consequently become entitled to the ownership of the goods against all the world. The fact that T had stolen the goods from O must thereupon, in my judgment, cease to have any relevance to the ownership of the goods. e
f

Who then is to be understood to be referred to by the description 'the original seller'? One cannot go back further than T, for O was not a seller. If T can be regarded as a seller, he is not, I apprehend, a seller who could assert a lien or other right in the goods because, having stolen them, he could not claim to have had any title to them or interest in them. I for my part think that the most acceptable interpretation of 'the original seller' is to relate it to that party who answers to A in my exposition of s 9. That party is the first seller referred to in the section, that is to say the earliest seller whose sale is relevant to the operation of the section. g

But, as in the present case, the goods may have been the subject of a considerable series of sub-sales before O attempts to recover them. I must consider how the section works in such a case.

The list of persons through whom the possession of the car passed in the present case is Miss Hopkin, the thieves, Lacey, Thomas, Autochoice, Glamorgan Motors, the defendant. We are without information about the transfers from the thieves to Lacey and from Lacey to Thomas. Accordingly none of the requirements of s 9 can be shown to be satisfied by anyone before Autochoice. We do know that Autochoice bought the car from Thomas in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right existing in any other person, and obtained possession of it with Thomas's consent. Autochoice j consequently, in my view, fulfills the requirements relating to party B in s 9. We also a know that Glamorgan Motors bought the car from Autochoice in good faith and without any such notice, and obtained possession of it with the consent of Autochoice. Glamorgan Motors consequently, in my view, fulfills the requirements relating to party C in s 9.

 Where, as in this case, there are several successive possessors in the chain, the section, in my judgment, only requires consideration of the circumstances relating to the last three members of the chain, the last of whom will be the party invoking the protection of the b section, that is to say in the present case the defendant. It follows in my judgment that, unless the presence of the thieves in the chain of successive possession somehow excludes the operation of the section, the plaintiffs cannot succeed in this action.

Counsel for the plaintiffs contended that s 9 can confer on the last person in the chain (ie the party from whom the true owner seeks to recover the goods) no better title than that of the 'original seller', who in the present case, he says, was either the thieves or some c subsequent possessor of the goods who could have no better title than the thieves. They submitted that, where the goods have been stolen, the section has no effect on the title of the true owner from whom they have been stolen. In this respect they submitted that s 9 only effects the rights inter se of the parties who I have called A, B and C and has no effect on the title of the original true owner.

Counsel for the defendant relied on a literal construction of s 9. With deference to d those who think otherwise, I consider that the language of s 9 is clear and unequivocal, free from ambiguity and uncertainty. It is, in my opinion, susceptible of only one interpretation. The difficulty involved in applying the language of s 2 to the s 9 hypothesis is, in my view, disposed of, so far as this court is concerned, by the decision in Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams [1964] 3 All ER 532, [1965] 1 QB 560. Indeed, the e present case is, I think, a stronger case than that because, as is common ground, Glamorgan Motors do carry on a business of selling cars as mercantile agents and their sale to the defendant was carried out at their business premises and in just such a manner as a sale in the course of their business as mercantile agents would have been.

Those who take the contrary view, and hold that s 9 should be considered in some sense other than what its language appears literally to say, seem to me, with great f deference, to fall into the error against which Lord Halsbury LC gave a warning in Leader
v Duffey (1888) 13 App Cas 294 at 301, where he said:

'But it appears to me to be arguing in a vicious circle to begin by assuming an intention apart from the language of the instrument itself, and having made that fallacious assumption to bend the language in favour of the assumption so made.'

I do not find anything elsewhere in the Factors Act 1889 which conflicts with s 9
 g construed in its literal sense. Nor, in my view, does a literal construction of s 9 produce an unreasonable or unsensible result. The 1889 Act was the latest of a series of Acts of Parliament for the protection of innocent purchasers which at each stage increased the amount of protection afforded. The section as I would construe it confers no protection on a purchaser from a thief. Such a purchaser might by diligent inquiry have been able h to discover that his vendor was a thief. The section, so construed, would, however, enable that purchaser to confer on an innocent purchaser from him an unassailable title. The latter purchaser would be unlikely to be aware of any circumstances that would put him on inquiry whether his vendor's vendor had stolen the goods. In such a case it would not, in my view, be at all irrational that the legislature should consider that it would be right to let the loss resulting from the theft rest where it falls on the original owner, who j would, as was pointed out in argument, very probably be insured, rather than on the innocent purchaser.

May LJ has placed reliance on the definition of 'a contract of sale of goods' contained in s 2(1) of the 1979 Act and on ss 2(4) and 6(1) of the same Act. With very great diffidence, I do not think that a solution can be found by this route. When a thief contracts to sell stolen property, the fact that he cannot transmit a good title in that property to the purchaser does not, as I understand the law, mean that he has not contracted to sell it. He has contracted to sell it, and can be made liable in damages if and when the purchaser suffers damage by reason of the thief's breach of contract by selling without a good title. In the present case, on the assumed facts, the thieves, in my view, agreed to sell and sold the car to Lacey within the meaning of s 9, and each successive sub-purchaser did the same. Moreover, in my opinion, by handing over the car to Lacey the thieves conferred on him a possessory title good against the thieves and indeed everyone except the true owner. So, in my respectful opinion, each of the transactions in the chain in the present case was a contract to sell the car resulting in a sale of the car, notwithstanding any defect there may have been in the vendor's capacity to transmit a good title to it. The first requirement of s 9 is thus satisfied.

It is certainly surprising that the argument in favour of a literal construction of s 9 which has been presented in the present case by the defendant does not seem to have been presented in any reported case except to some extent in Newtons of Wembley Ltd v Williams. We have been referred to a considerable number of English authorities. I hope I shall not be thought discourteous to counsel's arguments if I do not discuss these cases in detail. Some were decisions on s 2 of the 1889 Act and were not concerned with s 9. I do not find these of assistance in construing s 9.

Two Commonwealth cases were referred to in which arguments, which were evidently on similar lines to the defendant's argument in the instant case, were presented and rejected in each case. Each of those cases was concerned with statutory provisions in terms identical with ss 2(1) and 9 of the 1889 Act. Those decisions, although not binding on us, are worthy of great respect. Brandon v Leckie (1972) 29 DLR (3d) 633 related to stolen vehicles which were sold by the thief to a concern called Calgary Automotive Brokerage Ltd (a mercantile agent) by whom the vehicles were sold to members of the public. Moore J of the Alberta Supreme Court took the view that the sections with which he was concerned made no reference to the rights of the true and lawful owners from whom the vehicles had been stolen, nor to the rights of anyone other than the seller, and did not remove any rights of the true owners. He held that the rule nemo dat quod non habet must prevail in the absence of overriding statutory provisions, that the thief could not sell something he did not have the right to sell and that the mercantile agent could not pass on a good title. With deference to the judge, I consider that, for reasons which I have already indicated, s 9 of the 1889 Act is a statutory provision which is designed to override the nemo dat principle and effectively does so, not by expressly destroying the rights of the true and lawful owner, but by conferring on the purchasers from the hypothetical mercantile agent a statutory title which is unassailable by that owner.

Elwin v O'Regan and Maxwell [1971] NZLR 1124 is concerned with a car which was initially the subject matter of a hire-purchase agreement. The hire-purchaser sold the car, while there were still instalments unpaid, to Broadlands Finance Ltd, who sold it to the defendant Maxwell, who sold it to the plaintiff. The defendant O'Regan was an agent of the true owners of the car, that is to say the hire-purchase company, who had repossessed the car. Beattie J in the New Zealand Supreme Court held with regret that the principle of nemo dat applied. He consequently upheld the claim of the hire-purchase company. In the course of his judgment the judge referred to the decision of Pearson J in Butterworth v Kingsway Motors Ltd [1954] 2 All ER 694, [1954] 1 WLR 1286, which was also a case of a car subject to a hire-purchase agreement. In that case also the hire-purchaser purported to sell the car while there were still instalments unpaid, and there were three further sub-sales. Pearson J said ([1954] 2 All ER 694 at 701, [1954] 1 WLR 1286 at 1295):

"The next question is as to the present ownership of the car. The various purported sales all took place at times when Bowmaker, Ltd. [the hire-purchase company] were still the owners of the car, so that all the purported sellers in this rather long chain had no title to it at the times when the purported sales were made. But on or about July 25, 1952, Miss Rudolph acquired a good title from Bowmaker, Ltd., or, at any

a rate, made a payment to Bowmaker, Ltd., which extinguished their title and induced them to relinquish any claim which they had to the car. I think that the right view is that Miss Rudolph acquired the title as between her and Bowmaker, Ltd., but I further hold on authority that the title so acquired went to feed the previously defective titles of the subsequent buyers and enured to their benefit.'

b It is perfectly clear that the judge there assumed that s 9 of the 1889 Act had not conferred a good title to the car on any of the sub-purchasers, but it was unnecessary for him to decide that question or even to give it close consideration, in view of the effect of the payment off of the arrears under the hire-purchase agreement.

c In my judgment, once the factual requirements of s 9 of the 1889 Act have been satisfied, the operation of this section is not to strike from the hand of the original true owner of the goods his title of ownership, but to place in the hand of him who has acquired those goods from the notional mercantile agent an impregnable shield which makes it impossible thenceforth for the original true owner to assert his original title against him who has the goods.

For these reasons I for my part would allow this appeal.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

Sale of goods – Transfer of title – Owner giving seller documents enabling seller to represent himself as owner – Seller agreeing to sell car to plaintiffs – Plaintiffs paying by banker's draft –

g Bank refusing to cash draft – Seller disappearing – Bank reimbursing plaintiffs – Plaintiffs claiming title to car – Whether seller had bought or agreed to buy car from owner – Whether owner precluded by conduct from denying seller's authority to sell if merely an agreement to sell and no actual sale – Sale of Goods Act 1979, ss 2(5), 21, 25.

h The claimant owned a car which he advertised for sale. He was contacted by L, who claimed to be interested in purchasing it on behalf of a client. L took delivery of the car and the claimant gave him a letter stating that he had sold the car to L and disclaiming further legal responsibility for it. He also completed a notification of sale form. In return L gave the claimant a postdated cheque for £17,250 which subsequently proved to be worthless. L agreed to sell the car to the plaintiffs for £11,500, £10,000 being paid by banker's draft. When L presented the draft the bank refused to cash it, whereupon L disappeared and in due course the police took possession of the car. The plaintiffs were later reimbursed by the bank for the amount of the draft, which was never presented. The plaintiffs issued a writ against the police seeking possession of the car as owners. On an interpleader summons to determine the ownership of the car the master found in favour of the claimant. The plaintiffs appealed, contending (i) that L had bought or agreed to buy the car from the claimant and had with his consent obtained possession of the car and document of title and therefore, applying s 25^a of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, there had been a valid sale to the plaintiffs, who had acted in good faith and without notice of the claimant's rights or (ii) alternatively, that the claimant was, under s 21^b of the 1979 Act, precluded by his conduct from denying L's authority to sell. a

Held – The appeal would be dismissed for the following reasons—

(1) An intermediate seller in possession of goods or the documents of title could only pass good title to a bona fide purchaser under s 25 of the 1979 Act if the intermediate seller had 'bought or agreed to buy' the goods from the owner. Despite the documents signed by the claimant, the evidence showed that L had in fact been acting as his agent in respect of the sale and had never bought or agreed to buy the car himself, with the result that s 25 did not apply to confer good title on the plaintiffs (see p 408 g to j and p 410 f to j, post). b

(2) The owner of goods was precluded by s 21 of the 1979 Act from denying an intermediate seller's authority to sell goods of which the seller was not the owner only if the goods were 'sold' by the intermediate seller; s 21 did not apply where there was merely an agreement to sell, since under s 2(5)^c an agreement to sell by definition involved no transfer of property. Accordingly, even though the claimant had by his conduct represented that L had title to the car and authority to sell it, s 21 did not apply because the property in the car was not to pass to the plaintiffs until L was paid, and since the banker's draft was never cashed that had never occurred. It followed that the car remained the property of the claimant (see p 409 g to p 410 c h j, post). c

15 April. The following judgments were delivered.

LLOYD LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Fox LJ). In December 1982 Mr Natalegawa, a student from Indonesia, acquired a red Porsche motor car, for which c he paid £16,750. In March 1984 he decided to return home to complete his studies. So on 6 April 1984 he advertised the car for sale in the Evening Standard. The price was £17,250 ono. On 15 April a man calling himself Jonathan London spoke to him on the telephone. He said he was a car dealer who was interested in purchasing the car on behalf of a client. On 16 April Mr Natalegawa, who I shall refer to as 'the claimant', let him have the car. On 1 May Mr London agreed to sell the car to another car dealer, Mr Tom Shaw. d Mr Shaw trades in association with Nidd Vale Motors Ltd. I shall refer to them together as 'the plaintiffs'. The price was £11,500. It was to be paid by a banker's draft for £10,000, and the balance in cash. The plaintiffs obtained a banker's draft dated 1 May from the Midland Bank, made out in favour of Mr London. The following day a representative of the plaintiffs met Mr London. They drove together in the car to a bank in Chiswick, where Mr London had opened an account the previous week. The plaintiffs' e representative gave Mr London the banker's draft. Mr London took it into the bank, and attempted to cash it. But the bank was unwilling to give him cash, whereupon Mr London disappeared, and has not been seen since.

In due course the police were called, and took possession of the car. The banker's draft has never been cashed. Within a few days Midland Bank reimbursed the plaintiffs with f the amount of the draft, against the plaintiffs' undertaking to indemnify the bank should the draft be presented hereafter. The date of the indemnity is 5 May 1984.

On 30 October 1984 the plaintiffs commenced proceedings against the Metropolitan Police Commissioner claiming that the car belonged to them. In December 1984 the police issued an interpleader summons. On 28 January 1985 Master Grant ordered an issue to be tried. Lengthy affidavits were sworn on either side. On 7 October 1986 Master g Grant, in a judgment of which we only have a note, but which, even from the note, appears to have been exceptionally careful and clear, decided the issue in favour of the claimant. He added the comment that he was glad that the law should, in this case, accord with justice.

It is, of course, a frequent occurrence that the courts have to decide which of two h innocent parties is to suffer by the fraud of a third. In Central Newbury Car Auctions Ltd v Unity Finance Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 905 at 909, [1957] 1 QB 371 at 379 Denning LJ described it as the 'ever-recurring question' and 'the familiar contest between the original owner who had been deceived into parting with his property, and the innocent purchaser who has been deceived into buying it'. In such cases it is often very difficult to say where justice lies. What makes the present case unique in my experience is that the plaintiffs, so far from suffering as a result of London's fraud will, if they succeed, have obtained a car without having had to pay for it. If they fail, they will have suffered nothing except j the loss of their bargain. They are not a penny out of pocket. They still have the £1,500 in cash, and although there is a theoretical possibility that they might have to honour the indemnity which they gave in favour of the Midland Bank, the chances of that happening in practice must now be regarded as extremely remote. So it is not surprising that the master regarded his decision in favour of the claimant in the present case as according with the justice of the case.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, who argued a difficult case with great skill, accepted that the burden was on him to show that the property in the car had passed to the plaintiffs. He sought to discharge that burden in two stages. First, by submitting that London had bought, or agreed to buy, the car from the claimant, and second by relying on s 25 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979. That section provides:

'(1) Where a person having bought or agreed to buy goods obtains, with the consent of the seller, possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, has the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner . . .'

As to the first step in the argument of counsel for the plaintiff, there was a good deal of evidence from which the master might have inferred that the claimant had sold the car to Mr London. Thus on 1 May, shortly before Mr London agreed to sell to the plaintiffs, the claimant gave Mr London, at London's request, a letter in the following terms:

'This letter serves to certify that I, A. D. H. NATALEGAWA Have sold the PORSCHE 3.3 TURBO Registration number NVS 958V to MR. JONATHAN LONDON of . . . and from the date shown below no longer have any legal responsibility connected with that car. [Signed] A. D. H. NATALEGAWA 18 March 1984.'

The claimant also signed the notification of sale or transfer slip attached to the car registration certificate showing that he had sold the car to Mr London on 18 March 1984, in return for which Mr London gave the claimant a postdated cheque in the sum of £17,250 which subsequently proved to be valueless. Even if the claimant had originally dealt with Mr London as an agent, or intermediary, the documents to which I have just referred show, according to counsel, that the claimant was 'backing it both ways'; in other words, if Mr London should fail to find a buyer for the car, then he had agreed to buy the car himself. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on a statement taken by the police on 3 May 1984, in which the claimant said, in unambiguous terms, that he was selling the car to London, and that he had accepted the cheque as payment.

The difficulty with that argument is that it is contrary to the claimant's affidavit, in which he was equally specific that Mr London was acting as his agent in respect of the sale at all material times, and that he had not in fact sold the car to him as a purchaser.

These inconsistencies could have been explored if the plaintiffs had applied to cross-examine the claimant on his affidavit. But they did not. In those circumstances the master was entitled to accept the evidence contained in the claimant's affidavit, in preference to the statement which he had previously given to the police. The master held that there never was a purported sale between the claimant and London. I see no ground on which we ought to interfere with that finding.

It follows that Mr London never bought or agreed to buy the car, and that the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs fails at the first stage. Since s 25 only applies, according to its terms, when a person has bought or agreed to buy goods, the second stage of the argument does not arise. But for completeness I should add the following points.

(i) It was not suggested that Mr London was a mercantile agent acting in the ordinary course of business so as to enable him to pass a good title under s 2 of the Factors Act 1889, irrespective of s 25 of the 1979 Act.

(ii) I would respectfully disagree with the master's view that the car registration certificate and the other documents to which I have referred were documents of title. In Joblin v Watkins & Roseveare (Motors) Ltd [1949] 1 All ER 47 it was held that a car registration book is not a document of title; see also Pearson v Rose & Young Ltd [1950] 2 All ER 1027 at 1033, [1951] 1 KB 275 at 289 per Denning LJ and Central Newbury Car

Auctions Ltd v United Finance Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 905 at 914, [1957] 1 QB 371 at 387 per Hodson LJ.

(iii) Since preparing this judgment I have read the very recent judgments of the Court of Appeal in National Employers Mutual General Insurance Association Ltd v Jones [1987] 3 All ER 385, in which it fell to the court to consider s 25 in some detail. However, there is nothing in that decision which throws any light on the present case.

That brings me to the only point of difficulty in the case. If the plaintiffs cannot rely on s 25 of the 1979 Act, are they nevertheless entitled to rely on s 21? That section provides:

Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that the claimant is precluded by his conduct from denying Mr London’s authority to sell, since he represented that Mr London had been the owner of the car since 18 March 1984, and that the plaintiffs relied on that representation. Counsel did not develop the point at any great length, and did not cite any authority. Nevertheless it deserves attention.

In Central Newbury Car Auctions Ltd v United Finance Ltd it was decided that the mere possession by an intermediate seller of the car and the registration book with the consent of the owner does not preclude the owner from asserting his title. The owner does not thereby represent that the intermediate seller has authority to sell. But here the facts go much further. The signature of the notification of sale or transfer slip, and above all, the document stating in so many words that the claimant had sold the car to Mr London, is the clearest possible representation, intended to be relied on by the ultimate purchaser, that the claimant had transferred the ownership to Mr London. So far as any representation goes, therefore, the case comes within the principles stated in Henderson & Co v Williams [1895] 1 QB 521 and Eastern Distributors Ltd v Goldring [1957] 2 All ER 525, [1957] 2 QB 600; and, if the plaintiffs had bought the car, I should have held that they had acquired a good title against the claimant, and, in practice, against all the world, by virtue of s 21 of the 1979 Act or, alternatively, by virtue of common law estoppel by representation, if it be different.

But the critical factor in the present case is that the plaintiffs did not buy the car. They agreed to buy it. It was expressly, and in my view rightly, conceded that the property in the car was not intended to pass until Mr London was paid. So when Mr London went into the bank to cash the banker’s draft, the moment had not yet come when the property was to pass from Mr London to the plaintiffs. That moment never did come. Does that make a difference? The master has held that it does. In my view he was right.

The meaning of the word ‘sold’ in the phrase ‘where goods are sold’ in s 21 of the 1979 Act does not appear to have been considered in any decided case or text book, except by Professor Atiyah in Sale of Goods (7th edn, 1985) p 266 and Professor Guest in Benjamin’s Sale of Goods (2nd edn, 1981) p 465. Professor Atiyah says: ‘It may be that the words “where goods are sold” must be given their strict significance and do not cover cases of an agreement to sell.’ The authority cited is Anderson v Ryan [1967] IR 34. In that case a car dealer agreed to sell a car to which he had no title. But he obtained title before he delivered the car. It was argued that the buyer could have no better title than the seller had had at the time of the agreement. Not surprisingly, that argument was rejected. I doubt if that decision helps much either way in the present case.

Professor Guest expresses the view in Benjamin’s Sale of Goods p 465, n 31 that the principle stated in s 21 applies not only to sale, but also where goods are pledged or otherwise disposed of for value to a third party. But there is no suggestion that the section applies to an agreement to sell. On principle, it seems to me that s 21 does not apply to an agreement to sell. It can only apply where the intermediate seller has purported to transfer the property in the goods, whether the general property or perhaps the special property. Section 21 is the first of a group of six sections, all of which are concerned with the transfer of title. Thus s 22 provides that a buyer who buys in a market overt acquires a good title, provided he buys in good faith without notice of any want of title on the part of the seller. Section 23 makes similar provision in the case of a buyer who buys from a seller with a voidable title. It was no doubt for the same reason that the phrase 'sale, pledge, or other disposition' in ss 24 and 25 was held by the Court of Appeal to be confined to cases where there had been a transfer of property, or some interest in property. Transfer of possession is not enough: see Worcester Works Finance Ltd v Cooden Engineering Co Ltd [1971] 3 All ER 708 at 714, [1972] 1 QB 210 at 220, where Megaw LJ said: "Disposition" must involve some transfer of an interest in property, in the technical sense of the word "property", as contrasted with mere possession.

If that is true of the word 'disposition' in ss 24 and 25 of the 1979 Act, a word which, as a matter of ordinary usage, is capable of a very wide meaning, it must be equally true of the word 'sale' in s 21 of the Act. So I would hold that 'sale' in s 21 does not include an agreement to sell, which, by definition, involves no transfer of property: see s 2(5) of the 1979 Act. Since it is conceded that the transaction between Mr London and the plaintiffs never got beyond an agreement to sell, it must follow that s 21 does not apply.

The second half of s 21 and ss 22 to 25 are all statutory exceptions to the rule nemo dat quod non habet, a rule which is expressed in statutory form in the first half of s 21. In the present case the plaintiffs fail, not because they cannot bring themselves within any of the exceptions to the rule (though they fail for that reason also in the case of s 25), but for the more fundamental reason that Mr London never even purported to give what he did not have. If he had purported to transfer the property in the car, then I should have held, as I have already said, that the case fell within Henderson & Co v Williams [1895] 1 QB 521 and Eastern Distributors Ltd v Goldring [1957] 2 All ER 525, [1957] 2 QB 600. But as he never purported to transfer the property, neither s 21 nor common law estoppel helps.

In para 1 of the statement of claim, the plaintiffs plead as follows:

'The plaintiff is the lawful owner of a Porsche motor car . . . having purchased the same in May 1984 . . . in good faith and without notice of any adverse claim upon it.'

I would hold that the plaintiffs are not the lawful owner of the car and never have been for the simple reason that Mr London never purported to transfer the property in the car. Nothing in ss 21 to 26 of the 1979 Act, or the general law of estoppel, can supply that omission.

In my view the master was right to decide the interpleader issue in the way he did. Like him, I am glad to have reached that conclusion. Although the claimant may be regarded as having been exceptionally gullible, it would offend my sense of justice if he were to lose the car, and the plaintiffs were to obtain it, for nothing. In the course of the argument we suggested various ways in which the appeal might have been compromised without injustice. But a compromise was not acceptable to either party.

For the reasons I have given, I would dismiss the appeal.

FOX LJ. I agree.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD LANE CJ, SKINNER AND McCOWAN JJ

28 NOVEMBER 1983

b Criminal law – Mistake – Mistake as a defence – Belief of defendant – Reasonableness of belief – Whether belief must be reasonable or merely honestly held.

M saw a youth attempting to rob a woman in the street. He gave chase, knocked the youth to the ground and attempted to immobilise him. The appellant, who had not witnessed the attempted robbery, then came on the scene. M told the appellant that he was a police officer, which was untrue, and that he was arresting the youth. When M failed to produce a warrant card a struggle ensued in which the appellant punched M in the face. The appellant was charged with assault causing actual bodily harm. At his trial his defence was that he had honestly believed that the youth was being unlawfully assaulted by M and that it was irrelevant whether his mistake was reasonable or unreasonable. The judge directed the jury that the appellant had to have an honest belief based on reasonable grounds that M was acting unlawfully. The appellant was convicted. He appealed on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury.

Held – If a defendant was labouring under a mistake of fact as to the circumstances when he committed an alleged offence he was to be judged according to his mistaken view of the facts regardless of whether his mistake was reasonable or unreasonable. The reasonableness or otherwise of the defendant's belief was only material to the question of whether the belief was in fact held by the defendant at all. It followed that there had been a material misdirection. The appeal would therefore be allowed and the conviction quashed (see p 413 g, p 414 c to e and p 415 d e g j, post).

f Per curiam. The defence of self-defence is made out if the defendant shows that he used such force in the defence of himself or another as was reasonable in the circumstances as he believed them to be. However, if the defendant's alleged belief was mistaken and his mistaken belief was unreasonable that may be good grounds for the jury to find that the belief was not honestly held (see p 415 f, post).

j Appeal against conviction

Gladstone Williams appealed against his conviction on 9 March 1983 in the Crown Court at Inner London Sessions before Mr Recorder Richard Du Cann QC and a jury of assault occasioning bodily harm in respect of which he was given a conditional discharge for 12 months, ordered to pay £100 compensation to the victim and £50 legal aid contribution. He appealed on a point of law, namely that the recorder erred in directing the jury by failing to make it clear to them that it was for the prosecution to eliminate the possibility that the appellant was acting under a genuine mistake of fact whether that mistake was reasonable or otherwise. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. a Desmond Fennell QC and John Perry (both assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant.

William Howard QC and Austen Issard-Davies for the Crown. b

LORD LANE CJ delivered the following judgment of the court. On 9 March 1983 Gladstone Williams appeared in the Crown Court at Inner London Sessions charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm. After a trial he was convicted and was given a conditional discharge for twelve months together with certain financial penalties. He now appeals on a point of law against his conviction. c

The facts were somewhat unusual and were as follows. On the day in question the alleged victim, a man called Mason, saw a black youth seizing the handbag belonging to a woman who was shopping. He caught up with the youth and held him, he said with a view to taking him to a nearby police station, but the youth broke free from his grip. Mason caught the youth again and knocked him to the ground, and he then twisted one of the youth's arms behind his back in order to immobilise him and to enable him, d Mason, so he said, once again to take the youth to a police station. The youth was struggling and calling for help at this time, and no one disputed that fact.

On the scene then came the appellant, who had only seen the latter stages of this incident. According to Mason he told the appellant first of all that he was arresting the youth for mugging the lady and secondly that he, Mason, was a police officer. That was not true. He was asked for his warrant card, which obviously was not forthcoming, and thereupon something of a struggle ensued between Mason on the one hand and the appellant and others on the other hand. In the course of these events Mason sustained injuries to his face, loosened teeth and bleeding gums. e

The appellant put forward the following version of events. He said he was returning from work by bus when he saw Mason dragging the youth along and striking him again and again. He was so concerned about the matter that he rapidly got off the bus and made his way to the scene and asked Mason what on earth he was doing. In short he said that he punched Mason because he thought if he did so he would save the youth from further beating and what he described as torture. f

There was no doubt that none of these dramatis personae were known to each other beforehand.

That simple statement of affairs caused a great deal of difficulty for the unfortunate recorder, with whom we have the utmost sympathy, because it raised issues of law which have been the subject of debate for more years than one likes to think about and the subject of more learned academic articles than one would care to read in an evening. Submissions were made to him as to the way in which he should direct the jury on the issue of possible mistake on the part of the appellant as to the circumstances in which he, g the appellant, used violence on Mason. h

The contention of the Crown was that the prosecution needed only to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the appellant was not acting under a mistaken view of the facts. Their contention was that they did not have to go further and (given that there was a mistake) show that the mistake was an unreasonable one. The appellant on the other hand contended that the reasonableness or otherwise of the mistake was immaterial, and once the jury were satisfied that he, the appellant, was labouring under a mistake and that on the mistaken facts as he believed them to be he would not have committed any offence, then the jury were not obliged to consider further the question of reasonableness. j

The recorder ruled that the prosecution's contentions as to the law were correct and rejected the submissions made by counsel for the appellant to the contrary.

a Undoubtedly this question of the proper direction to the jury loomed very largely on the horizon so far as the court was concerned, and understandably the recorder had his attention directed primarily, if not exclusively, to the problem of whether the belief had to be reasonable in order to afford a defence, if one may put it in that way. Consequently certain fundamental matters to which the jury's attention should have been directed were unhappily overlooked. If one turns to the transcript, one finds first of all the recorder giving the usual and perfectly correct direction to the jury as to the burden of proof being on the prosecution. He then at a later stage deals with the question of mistake and this is what he says:

c 'If you come to the conclusion that the defendant . . . had a belief, had the honest and genuine belief (and one could use all sorts of adjectives before the word "belief" but I am not sure they add very much), had the true belief and the reasonable belief, that is to say the belief based on reasonable grounds that Mason was acting unlawfully, then [his] use of force would be excused provided again that it was in all the circumstances reasonable and directed to preventing crime, namely the assault on the youth, and directed to no more than that in the way that I have explained.'

d That direction he repeats later almost word for word in order to make it clear to the jury. It is plain to this court that those directions failed to make it clear to the jury that it is for the prosecution to eliminate the possibility that the appellant was acting under a genuine mistake of fact. The nearest that the recorder ever got to such a direction is to be found at a stage where the jury returned to court with a question to ask of the recorder, and in the course of answering that question the recorder said:

e 'If you think the position is, or the position may be, that the defendant Mr Williams had such an honest and genuine belief based on reasonable grounds that Mason was acting unlawfully, then you go on to ask yourselves: was Mr Williams's use of force to be excused because, again in all the circumstances, it was a reasonable use of force and directed to no more than preventing the commission of crime?'

f We take the view that the words 'or the position may be' does not cure the earlier defect. If authority is required for the necessity of a careful direction in circumstances such as these, it is to be found in R v Abraham [1973] 3 All ER 694 at 696, [1973] 1 WLR 1270 at 1273-1274. More recently a similar indication is to be found in the judgment of Lawton LJ in R v Kimber [1983] 3 All ER 316, [1983] 1 WLR 1118 (to which it will be necessary for the court to refer at a later stage in the judgment).

g The answer is that this was a material misdirection. It was something at the very foundation of the case and that on its own would have been enough to require this court to allow the appeal and quash the conviction. But the story does not end there. We have been addressed on the question of whether the recorder was right in ruling against the submission by counsel for the appellant with regard to the reasonableness of the defendant's belief.

h Counsel for the Crown has helpfully conceded before this court first of all that the passage to which reference has already been made was indeed a material misdirection and that he cannot argue the contrary, and second he has made a further helpful concession that R v Kimber on the question of reasonable belief not only is binding upon this court, but answers the question contrary to the submissions of the Crown in the court below. Against that background we turn to consider the second point.

j One starts off with the meaning of the word 'assault'. 'Assault' in the context of this case, that is to say, using the word as a convenient abbreviation for assault and battery, is an act by which the defendant, intentionally or recklessly, applies unlawful force to the complainant. There are circumstances in which force may be applied to another lawfully. Taking a few examples. Firstly, where the victim consents, as in lawful sports, the application of force to another will, generally speaking, not be unlawful. Secondly, where the defendant is acting in self-defence the exercise of any necessary and reasonable force to protect himself from unlawful violence is not unlawful. Thirdly, by virtue of s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967, a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime or in effecting or assisting in the lawful arrest of an offender or suspected offender or persons unlawfully at large. In each of those cases the defendant will be guilty if the jury are sure that first of all he applied force to the person of another, and secondly that he had the necessary mental element to constitute guilt. a

The mental element necessary to constitute guilt is the intent to apply unlawful force to the victim. We do not believe that the mental element can be substantiated by simply showing an intent to apply force and no more. b

What then is the situation if the defendant is labouring under a mistake of fact as to the circumstances? What if he believes, but believes mistakenly, that the victim is consenting, or that it is necessary to defend himself, or that a crime is being committed which he intends to prevent? He must then be judged against the mistaken facts as he believes them to be. If judged against those facts or circumstances the prosecution fail to establish his guilt, then he is entitled to be acquitted. c

The next question is: does it make any difference if the mistake of the defendant was one which, viewed objectively by a reasonable onlooker, was an unreasonable mistake? In other words should the jury be directed as follows: 'Even if the defendant may have genuinely believed that what he was doing to the victim was either with the victim's consent or in reasonable self-defence or to prevent the commission of crime, as the case may be, nevertheless if you, the jury, come to the conclusion that the mistaken belief was unreasonable, that is to say that the defendant as a reasonable man should have realised his mistake, then you should convict him.' d

It is on this point that the large volume of historical precedent with which counsel for the Crown threatened us at an earlier stage is concerned. But in our judgment the answer is provided by the judgment of this court in R v Kimber [1983] 3 All ER 316, [1983] 1 WLR 1118, by which, as already stated, we are bound. There is no need for me to rehearse the facts, save to say that that was a case of an alleged indecent assault on a woman. Lawton LJ, delivering the judgment of the court said ([1983] 3 All ER 316 at 319-320, [1983] 1 WLR 1118 at 1122-1123): e

'The application of the Morgan principle [see DPP v Morgan [1975] 2 All ER 347, [1976] AC 182] to offences other than indecent assault on a woman will have to be considered when such offences come before the courts. We do, however, think it necessary to consider two of them because of what was said in the judgments. The first is a decision of the Divisional Court in Albert v Lavin [1981] 1 All ER 628, [1982] AC 546. The offence charged was assaulting a police officer in the execution of his duty, contrary to s 51 of the Police Act 1964. The defendant, in his defence, contended, inter alia, that he had not believed the police officer to be such and in consequence had resisted arrest. His counsel analysed the offence in the same way as we have done and referred to the reasoning in Morgan. Hodgson J, delivering the leading judgment, rejected this argument and in doing so said ([1981] 1 All ER 628 at 639, [1982] AC 546 at 561-562): "In my judgment counsel's ingenious argument for the appellant fails at an earlier stage. It does not seem to me that the element of unlawfulness can properly be regarded as part of the definitional element of the offence. In defining a criminal offence the word 'unlawful' is surely tautologous and can add nothing to its essential ingredients. . . . And, no matter how strange it may seem that a defendant charged with assault can escape conviction if he shows that he mistakenly but unreasonably thought his victim was consenting but not if he was in the same state of mind whether his victim had a right to detain him, that in my judgment is the law." We have found difficulty in agreeing with this reasoning [and I interpolate, so have we], even though the judge seems to be accepting that belief in consent does entitle a defendant to an acquittal on a charge of assault. We cannot accept that the word "unlawful" when used in a definition of an offence is to f a be regarded as "tautologous". In our judgment the word 'unlawful' does import an essential element into the offence. If it were not there, social life would be unbearable, because every touching would amount to a battery unless there was an evidential basis for a defence. This case was considered by the House of Lords (see [1981] 3 All ER 879, [1982] AC 546). The appeal was dismissed, but their Lordships declined to deal with the issue of belief.'

b That is the end of the citation from R v Kimber in so far as it is necessary for the second point. I read a further passage which sets out the proper direction to the jury, and is relevant to the first leg of the appellant's argument in this case. It reads as follows ([1983] 3 All ER 316 at 320, [1983] 1 WLR 1118 at 1123):

c 'In our judgment the recorder should have directed the jury that the Crown had to make them sure that the appellant never had believed that Betty was consenting. As he did not do so, the jury never considered an important aspect of his defence.'

We respectfully agree with what Lawton LJ said there with regard both to the way in which the defence should have been put and also with regard to his remarks as to the nature of the defence. The reasonableness or unreasonableness of the defendant's belief is material to the question of whether the belief was held by the defendant at all. If the belief was in fact held, its unreasonableness, so far as guilt or innocence is concerned, is neither here nor there. It is irrelevant. Were it otherwise, the defendant would be convicted because he was negligent in failing to recognise that the victim was not consenting or that a crime was not being committed and so on. In other words, the jury should be directed, first of all, that the prosecution have the burden or duty of proving the unlawfulness of the defendant's actions, second, that if the defendant may have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts he must be judged according to his mistaken view of the facts and, third, that that is so whether the mistake was, on an objective view, a reasonable mistake or not.

f In a case of self-defence, where self-defence or the prevention of crime is concerned, if the jury come to the conclusion that the defendant believed, or may have believed, that he was being attacked or that a crime was being committed, and that force was necessary to protect himself or to prevent the crime, then the prosecution have not proved their case. If, however, the defendant's alleged belief was mistaken and if the mistake was an unreasonable one, that may be a powerful reason for coming to the conclusion that the belief was not honestly held and should be rejected.

g Even if the jury come to the conclusion that the mistake was an unreasonable one, if the defendant may genuinely have been labouring under it, he is entitled to rely on it. We have read the recommendations in the Criminal Law Revision Committee's 14th Report, Offences Against the Person (Cmnd 7844 (1980)), in Pt IX, para 72(a) of which the following passage appears:

h 'The Common Law defence of self-defence should be replaced by a statutory defence providing that a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances as he believes them to be in the defence of himself or any other person . . .'

In the view of this court that represents the law as expressed in DPP v Morgan and in R v Kimber and we do not think that the decision of the Divisional Court in Albert v Lavin from which we have cited can be supported.

j For those reasons this appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.

Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD LAKE CJ, CAULFIELD AND STUART-SMITH JJ

15 MAY 1987

Criminal law – Wounding – Self-defence – Excessive force – Direction to jury – Defendant stabbing victim with lock-knife when punched in face by victim – Victim unarmed – Knife already open when defendant hit – Judge failing to direct jury that excessive force could be reasonable if defendant acting in a moment of unexpected anguish – Whether material misdirection.

The defendant stabbed a man with a lock-knife, the blade of which was already open, when the man punched him in the face. At his trial on a charge of wounding with intent the judge directed the jury that it was for them to decide whether the defendant had used the knife in self-defence and, if so, whether the use of a knife against an unarmed man was reasonable. The defendant was convicted. He appealed, contending that the judge ought to have directed the jury that the defendant was entitled to be acquitted if they thought that he had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary in a moment of unexpected anguish.

Held – Although what was reasonable by way of self-defence depended on the nature of the attack, if the moment was one of crisis for someone who was in imminent danger it might be necessary for that person to take instant action to avert that danger, in which case if the defendant showed that he had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary in a moment of unexpected anguish that would be very strong evidence that the defensive action he had taken was reasonable. However, since the defendant had deliberately used an already opened knife on his assailant in circumstances where such use could not possibly be reasonable, the absence of any direction regarding whether the defendant had acted in the agony of the moment was irrelevant. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 418 c to f h to p 419 b f, post).

Appeal against conviction

Ese Etenyin Whyte appealed against his conviction on 2 December 1986 in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook before his Honour Judge Stable QC and a jury, on count 1 of an indictment charging him with wounding with intent contrary to s 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861, in respect of which he was sentenced to three and a half years' imprisonment. An alternative count of wounding was allowed to remain on the file. The grounds of the appeal were, inter alia, that the judge had failed to direct the jury as to the appellant's state of mind at the time of the alleged assault. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

John O Haines for the Crown.

LORD LANE CJ delivered the following judgment of the court. On 2 December 1986 in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook before his Honour Judge Stable QC the appellant was convicted and sentenced on count 1 of the indictment of wounding with intent contrary to s 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861, and was sentenced to three and a half years' imprisonment. He now appeals against conviction by leave of the single judge.

The facts of the case were these. The appellant and his brother lived in an upstairs flat in a road called Pyrland Road, London N5. Their neighbours were a Mr and Mrs Holmes. Mr and Mrs Holmes owned a dog, which apparently was not fully house-trained. Mr and Mrs Holmes lived in the downstairs flat, but the appellant's flat and the Holmeses' flat shared a common landing and it seems that the door leading to the upstairs flat was close to the door which led into the Holmeses' flat. What happened was this. On the evening of 30 March Mr and Mrs Holmes were in a public house, and they met a man called Michael Khan, who had been an acquaintance of theirs for many years but whom they had not seen for some time. After they finished drinking in the public house they returned to the Holmeses' flat.

Thereafter there is a sharp divergence in the account of what happened, because according to Mr Khan, who was the eventual victim of the incident, the appellant's voice was heard outside the flat. Mr Khan went to the door to see what was required. When he opened the door, according to Mr Khan, the appellant punched him and said: 'The dog's pissed against my door.' Mr Khan, according to him, tried to calm the appellant down because he was very agitated, but the appellant reached round into the door which led into his, the appellant's, premises, produced a lock-knife, the blade of which was already open, and tried to stab Mr Khan in the stomach. Mr Khan put his arm across his stomach to protect himself, and as a result the arm received the effect of the knife. It was very severely cut. Mr Khan, having blocked the blow in that way, punched the appellant and slammed the door, and that, according to Mr Khan, was the end of the incident.

The appellant was interviewed by the police. To the police he was uncommunicative. He declined to answer any of the questions which they posed to him. The account of the events which he gave at the trial was this. He said first of all that he had not deliberately stabbed Mr Khan at all. It remained to some degree a mystery in those circumstances how Mr Khan received the wound that he did. But his defence was that he was acting in self-defence of himself and also of his brother. He said that what happened was this. He said that there was a knock at his door. He opened the door, but before he did so, he placed his lock-knife, the six-inch blade of which he had already opened, in his back pocket. This was before the door was open at all. He opened the door and there was Mrs Holmes, who asked him to join her for a drink. At that moment, he said, Mr Khan stepped in front of him, though it is not quite clear why. The appellant, according to himself, said: 'The dog's pissed on the floor.' Mr Khan told him to calm down, but then Mr Khan made a gesture towards him which he endeavoured to avoid, but he did not avoid. In other words Mr Khan struck him on the face. The appellant then took out the knife, according to him, but dropped it on the floor. There was then a struggle. He managed to pick up the knife. He tried to push away Mr Khan, and in some way, which he could not explain, the knife had penetrated Mr Khan's arm. The appellant then threw away the knife and ran away from the flat. Eventually, having seen his solicitor some two days later, he went to see the police seven or eight days later.

Those were the two conflicting versions.

The two complaints made by counsel for the appellant, to whom we are indebted for his concise submissions to us, are these. First of all the judge failed to direct the jury as to the appellant's state of mind at the time of the alleged assault. What the judge said to the jury on the question of self-defence, having given them an impeccable direction on the general effect of that defence, was this:

‘... if a man does use violence and claims he was only violent in self-defence, he may only use such force to defend himself as was reasonable in all the circumstances. It is for you, the jury, to decide as a matter of common sense whether a blow with a knife was in self-defence, and if it was, if the use of a knife against a man who is not alleged to have been armed was reasonable... So before you can convict Mr Whyte of either count 1 or count 2, you must be satisfied so that you are sure that Mr Whyte struck Mr Khan a blow with a knife as an assailant, and that the blow was not a blow in self-defence, or if it was, it was an unreasonable amount of force, having regard to the danger Mr Whyte himself was in at the hands of Mr Khan.’ a

In most cases, where the issue is one of self-defence, it is necessary and desirable that the jury should be reminded that the defendant's state of mind, that is his view of the danger threatening him at the time of the incident, is material. The test of reasonableness is not, to put it at its lowest, a purely objective test.

We have been referred to two authorities. The first is an opinion of the Privy Council in Palmer v R [1971] 1 All ER 1077, [1971] AC 814 and the second is R v Shannon (1980) 71 Cr App R 192, a decision of this court which of course is binding on us. The effect of those two decisions seems to be this. A man who is attacked may defend himself, but may only do what is reasonably necessary to effect such a defence. Simple avoiding action may be enough if circumstances permit. What is reasonable will depend on the nature of the attack. If there is relatively a minor attack, it is not reasonable to use a degree of force which is wholly out of proportion to the demands of the situation. But if the moment is one of crisis for someone who is in imminent danger, it may be necessary to take instant action to avert that danger. c

Although the test is what is sometimes called an objective one, yet nevertheless, to quote the words of Lord Morris in Palmer v R [1977] 1 All ER 1077 at 1088, [1971] AC 814 at 832: e

‘If a jury thought that in a moment of unexpected anguish a person attacked had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary, that would be most potent evidence that only reasonable defensive action had been taken.’

In R v Shannon, to which we have already referred, the trial judge had directed the jury to consider the question, ‘Are you satisfied that the defendant used more force than necessary in the circumstances?’ without going on to consider the qualification what the defendant may have done in ‘a moment of unexpected anguish’. On the facts of R v Shannon, that was clearly a fatal flaw which led to the conviction being quashed. f

The judge in the present case likewise omitted to mention the qualification which Lord Morris had suggested should be made and which R v Shannon says should be made in appropriate circumstances. g

It is a trite observation, but nevertheless true, that the requirements of a summing up will depend on the particular facts of the case. Whereas on the facts of R v Shannon the court correctly held that the qualifying effect mentioned by Lord Morris should have been given, one has to look at this case to see whether it was similarly necessary here. The jury in convicting him of the s 18 offence must have come to the conclusion that he had deliberately stabbed Mr Khan with the knife, despite what he himself said. They were directed correctly on the question of accident. The appeal on that point has been abandoned. So the jury must have decided that the knife was deliberately used by the appellant on Mr Khan. At the very best, from the appellant's point of view, the jury must have come to the conclusion that he stabbed Mr Khan because Mr Khan had hit him in the face with his hand. Now I am assuming in favour of the appellant that the facts were, with that small amendment about accident, as the appellant himself stated them to be. It is highly likely that the jury entirely disbelieved the appellant. h

Was it necessary in those circumstances that the judge should mention the qualifying factor as mentioned by Lord Morris? In our judgment it was not. There was no question a raised by the appellant that he, acting in the agony of the moment, went too far, that he failed to weigh accurately the precise degree of the attack which he was suffering. It is perfectly plain that on any view the use of an already prepared knife, the blade having been extended, in circumstances such as this, could not possibly be reasonable under any circumstances, whether the direction in Palmer v R was given or not.

b For those reasons we think that in this particular case it was not necessary for the judge to give the Palmer direction, although as a matter of abundance of caution he might perhaps have given it. So much for the first point.

The second point raised by counsel for the appellant is this, that the judge failed to direct the jury correctly on the law in respect of the issue of self-defence by stating to the jury that the defence of self-defence was not available to the appellant if there was an easy and obvious way out of the fight, that the appellant chose to reject that easy way out. The transcript reveals this passage of which complaint is made:

c 'Furthermore, the defence of self-defence is not open to a man, if there was an obvious and easy way of avoiding the incident instead of using violence. If a person rejects the obvious and easy way out of the trouble, and chooses instead to resort to violence, then he is not entitled to rely on self-defence.'

d The complaint is that the judge should have said that the ease of escape is only one of the matters which the jury has to consider when coming to the conclusion whether or not the actions of the appellant were reasonable in the circumstances.

e It may be that in a perfect world that would have been the way in which the judge expressed himself. But once again against the background of this case it seems to us that this expression of the law by the judge was perfectly accurate. If, even on the appellant's own story, he had chosen simply to back out of the way and close the door, any further trouble could have been avoided.

In those circumstances it seems to us that the second ground of appeal likewise must fail.

f The final point really disappears by reason of what we have already said. Counsel for the appellant contends that the joint effect of those two mistakes was to render the conviction unsafe and unsatisfactory. As each of those two grounds of appeal has severally failed, therefore the combined effect of them must also fail.

For those reasons this appeal against conviction must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD LAKE CJ, BOREHAM AND McCOWAN JJ

2, 11 JUNE 1987

Criminal law – Murder – Self-defence – Excessive force – Mistake – Self-induced intoxication – Defendant killing friend owing to mistake of fact caused by voluntary intoxication – Defendant pleading self-defence – Defendant mistaken as to severity of attack on him – Defendant believing his life endangered by attack – Whether reasonableness of force used by defendant to be judged according to his mistaken view of facts.

The defendant and the deceased spent the day drinking large quantities of alcohol and then went to the defendant's flat, where they fell asleep. The defendant woke to find the deceased hitting him and retaliated with what he thought were a few blows to defend himself. The fight eventually subsided and the defendant fell asleep again. When he awoke he found that the deceased was dead. A post-mortem revealed that the deceased had suffered extensive serious wounds to the face, a fracture of the spine, a fractured rib and severe bruising to the head, brain, neck and chest consistent with blows from both blunt and sharp objects. The defendant was charged with murder. At his trial he claimed to have acted in self-defence. The trial judge directed the jury that the defendant was entitled to rely on a mistake as to the existence of an attack but was not entitled to rely on a mistake as to the severity of the attack or the amount of force necessary to defend himself. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter. He appealed on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury.

Held – A defendant was not entitled to rely on the defence of self-defence if, because of his own self-induced intoxication, he had made a mistake as to the amount of force reasonably necessary to defend himself and had used more force than was necessary. The defendant had accordingly been rightly convicted and his appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 423 de and p 424 gh, post).

Appeal against conviction and sentence

a Patrick Gerald O'Grady appealed against his conviction in the Central Criminal Court on 19 September 1986 before his Honour Judge Underhill QC and a jury of manslaughter and against his sentence of seven years' imprisonment. c 11 June. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD LANE CJ. On 19 September 1986 at the Central Criminal Court the appellant, having been charged with murder, was convicted by the jury of manslaughter and was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. He now appeals against conviction and sentence d by leave of the single judge, McCullough J.

The appellant was addicted to drinking large quantities of alcohol, as were the friends and acquaintances with whom he consorted, one of whom was McCloskey, the deceased man. On Thursday, 26 September 1985 the appellant, McCloskey and another man called Brennan spent the day drinking. The appellant had drunk huge quantities of cider (some eight flagons), and he and Brennan and McCloskey repaired to the appellant's flat.

e Early on Friday morning Brennan woke up to see that the appellant was covered in blood. 'We [meaning McCloskey and himself] had a fight,' said the appellant, 'and I felt him. He was cold.' The appellant went to the police station saying he wished to report a murder. He was medically examined. He had a number of cuts and bruises to the head, hands and legs which were consistent with (a) fighting and (b) grasping broken glass.

f A post-mortem on McCloskey revealed extensive serious wounds to the face, no less than 20 in number, of varying degrees of severity, as well as injuries to the hands and a fractured rib. The wounds to the hands were probably defence injuries. There was severe bruising to the head, brain, neck and chest. There was a fracture of the spine at the level of the fifth cervical vertebra (probably caused by the head being forced backwards). There was a fractured rib. The blows to the body had been delivered by both sharp and blunt objects. He had bled to death from the wounds inflicted on and around the face.

g There was no doubt but that both the appellant and McCloskey were very drunk at the material time. The only evidence of what had led to the injuries of necessity came from the appellant himself. He and McCloskey were friends: there was no animosity between them. After their drinking bout the two fell asleep.

The material part of the appellant's account was as follows:

h 'I was awakened by a bang on the head and I jumped up and put my hand to my head and the blood was running down. I am not sure if it was one bang I got or more. I saw Eddie [McCloskey] standing up . . . he had a piece of glass in one hand . . . I made for him to stop him hitting me again. I picked up a piece of glass and I hit him. We were both standing up facing each other . . . We struggled. He was getting the better of me, trying to knock me over. I hit him to stop him hitting j me again.'

He went on to describe how the two of them had fought, how he thought that McCloskey was getting the better of him, how he thought he had only hit McCloskey a few times, how the fight eventually subsided. He described how he had then cooked a chop for McCloskey, who did not seem to want it. The appellant then sat down and fell asleep.

'Then I woke up and found that Eddie had gone from where he had been. I was scared at that. I was scared he would get out of the flat [and go and get men to help him]. I jumped up with the intention of leaving the place. I went to the toilet on the way to the front door and found Eddie kneeling by the toilet, his hands over the bowl. I called him and he gave no answer. I took hold of him and found he was cold. I moved him on to the floor and I thought to myself: "He is dead."' a

The appellant described how he reported McCloskey's condition to some friends and then went to Peckham police station. He said: 'I did not want to kill him. I wanted him alive, not dead. I had no enmity to him. If I had not hit him I would be dead myself.' b

The judge gave an impeccable direction on the ingredients of murder and on the way in which intoxication may affect proof of intent to kill or to do serious bodily harm. Likewise impeccable was his direction on provocation, including the correct observation that, when considering whether a reasonable man would have been caused to lose his self-control, questions of drink are irrelevant. c

Finally he gave the classic direction on self-defence. He made no mention of the possibility that the appellant might by reason of intoxication have been mistaken as to the threat posed to him by McCloskey's action. This was no doubt because no one had taken the point. Counsel for the prosecution, towards the close of the judge's directions, saw fit to invite the judge to remedy what he plainly regarded as this lacuna in the charge to the jury. Counsel for the appellant wisely held his peace. The judge then gave this further direction: d

'It might be a view that you might take, I know not, that this defendant thought he was under attack from the other man mistakenly and made a mistake in thinking that he was under attack because of the drink that was in him. If he made such a mistake in drink he would nevertheless be entitled to defend himself even though he mistakenly believed that he was under attack. He would be entitled in those circumstances to defend himself. But if in taking defensive measures, then he went beyond what is reasonable either because of his mind being affected by drink or for any other reason, then the defence of self-defence would not avail him because, as I told you earlier on, you are entitled to defend yourself if it is necessary to do so, but the defensive measures that you take must be reasonable ones and not go beyond what is reasonable.' e

The grounds of appeal advanced by counsel for the appellant are as follows. (1) Whilst the judge was correct to refer to mistake induced by drink in connection with self-defence, he was wrong to limit the reference to mistake as to existence of an attack: he should have included the possibility of mistake as to the severity of an attack which was the most likely possibility on the facts. (2) By leaving the matter to the jury as he did, the judge in effect divorced the reasonableness of the appellant's reaction from the appellant's state of mind at the time. (3) The judge failed when giving his further direction to the jury to remind them that a defendant is never required to judge to a nicety the amount of force which is necessary and that they should give great weight to the view formed by the appellant at the time, even though that view might have been affected by alcohol. f

As to the first two grounds, these require an examination of the law as to intoxication in relation to mistake. Counsel have referred us to a number of authorities. It is not necessary for us to refer to all of these. In three of them the jury were invited to take the defendant's drunkenness into account when deciding whether he genuinely apprehended an assault on himself: R v Gamlen (1858) 1 F & F 90, 175 ER 639, Marshall's Case (1830) 1 Lew CC 76, 168 ER 965 and R v Wardrope [1960] Crim LR 770. However, the reports of these cases leave a great deal to be desired and as far as we can discover there is no case directly in point which is binding on us. g

As McCullough J pointed out helpfully in his observations for the benefit of the court:

- a 'Given that a man who mistakenly believes he is under attack is entitled to use reasonable force to defend himself, it would seem to follow that, if he is under attack and mistakenly believes the attack to be more serious than it is, he is entitled to use reasonable force to defend himself against an attack of the severity he believed it to have. If one allows a mistaken belief induced by drink to bring this principle into operation, an act of gross negligence (viewed objectively) may become lawful even though it results in the death of the innocent victim. The drunken man would be guilty of neither murder nor manslaughter.'
- b

- c How should the jury be invited to approach the problem? One starts with the decision of this court in R v Williams (1983) [1987] 3 All ER 411, namely that where the defendant might have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts he must be judged according to that mistaken view, whether the mistake was reasonable or not. It is then for the jury to decide whether the defendant's reaction to the threat (real or imaginary) was a reasonable one. The court was not in that case considering what the situation might be where the mistake was due to voluntary intoxication by alcohol or some other drug.

- d We have come to the conclusion that, where the jury are satisfied that the defendant was mistaken in his belief that any force or the force which he in fact used was necessary to defend himself and are further satisfied that the mistake was caused by voluntarily induced intoxication, the defence must fail. We do not consider that any distinction should be drawn on this aspect of the matter between offences involving what is called specific intent, such as murder, and offences of so called basic intent, such as manslaughter. Quite apart from the problem of directing a jury in a case such as the present where
- e manslaughter is an alternative verdict to murder, the question of mistake can and ought to be considered separately from the question of intent. A sober man who mistakenly believes he is in danger of immediate death at the hands of an attacker is entitled to be acquitted of both murder and manslaughter if his reaction in killing his supposed assailant was a reasonable one. What his intent may have been seems to us to be irrelevant to the problem of self-defence or no. Secondly, we respectfully adopt the reasoning of
- f McCullough J already set out.

- This brings us to the question of public order. There are two competing interests. On the one hand the interest of the defendant who has only acted according to what he believed to be necessary to protect himself, and on the other hand that of the public in general and the victim in particular who, probably through no fault of his own, has been injured or perhaps killed because of the defendant's drunken mistake. Reason recoils
- g from the conclusion that in such circumstances a defendant is entitled to leave the court without a stain on his character.

- We find support for that view in the decision of the House of Lords in DPP v Majewski [1976] 2 All ER 142, [1977] AC 443, and in particular in the speeches of Lord Simon and Lord Edmund-Davies. We cite a passage from the speech of the former as follows ([1976] 2 All ER 142 at 152, [1977] AC 443 at 476):

- h '(1) One of the prime purposes of the criminal law, with its penal sanctions, is the protection from certain proscribed conduct of persons who are pursuing their lawful lives. Unprovoked violence has, from time immemorial, been a significant part of such proscribed conduct. To accede to the argument on behalf of the appellant would leave the citizen legally unprotected from unprovoked violence where such
- i violence was the consequence of drink or drugs having obliterated the capacity of the perpetrator to know what he was doing or what were its consequences. (2) Though the problem of violent conduct by intoxicated persons is not new to society, it has been rendered more acute and menacing by the more widespread use of hallucinatory drugs. For example, in R v Lipman [1969] 3 All ER 410, [1970] 1

QB 152, the accused committed his act of mortal violence under the hallucination (induced by drugs) that he was wrestling with serpents. He was convicted of manslaughter. But, on the logic of the appellant's argument, he was innocent of any crime.' a

Lord Edmund-Davies said ([1976] 2 All ER 142 at 166, [1977] AC 443 at 492):

'The criticism by the academics of the law presently administered in this country is of a twofold nature: (1) it is illogical and therefore inconsistent with legal principle to treat a person who of his own volition has taken drink or drugs any differently from a man suffering from some bodily or mental disorder of the kind earlier mentioned or whose beverage had, without his connivance, been "laced" with intoxicants. (2) It is unethical to convict a man of a crime requiring a guilty state of mind when, ex hypothesi, he lacked it.' b

Lord Edmund-Davies then demonstrated the fallacy of those criticisms. c

Finally we draw attention to the decision of this court in R v Lipman itself. The defence in that case was put on the grounds that the defendant, because of the hallucinatory drug which he had taken, had not formed the necessary intent to found a conviction for murder, thus resulting in his conviction for manslaughter. If the appellant's contentions here are correct, Lipman could successfully have escaped conviction altogether by raising the issue that he believed he was defending himself legitimately from an attack by serpents. It is significant that no one seems to have considered that possibility. d

The third and final ground of appeal has in effect already disappeared, because, if the judge's additional direction was unnecessary, so was any repetition of the passage from the speech of Lord Morris in Palmer v R [1971] 1 All ER 1077 at 1088, [1971] AC 814 at 832, namely: e

'If there has been [an] attack so that defence is reasonably necessary it will be recognised that a person defending himself cannot weigh to a nicety the exact measure of his necessary defensive action. If a jury thought that in a moment of unexpected anguish a person attacked had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary that would be most potent evidence that only reasonable defensive action had been taken.' f

Indeed, those words are scarcely apt to describe the actions of a man labouring under the effect of a drunken mistake. They accordingly add some marginal support to the views which we have expressed.

We have therefore come to the conclusion that a defendant is not entitled to rely, so far as self-defence is concerned, on a mistake of fact which has been induced by voluntary intoxication. g

As already indicated, the judge's addendum to his summing up, which he made at the suggestion of prosecuting counsel, was unnecessary and erred in favour of the appellant.

The appeal against conviction is accordingly dismissed.

[The court then went on to deal with the appeal against sentence and dismissed it.] h

Appeal dismissed.

The court refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords but certified, under s 33(2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, that the following point of law of general public importance was involved in the decision: is a defendant who raises the issue of self-defence entitled to be judged on the basis of what he mistakenly believed to be the situation when that mistaken belief was brought about by self-induced intoxication by alcohol or other drugs? i

The Crown alleged that the man was unarmed and was shot by the appellant and another police officer after he had been discovered in hiding and had surrendered, while the appellant claimed that the man had a firearm, had fired at the police and had been killed when they returned the fire. At the trial of the appellant for murder the judge directed the jury that if the appellant had a reasonable belief that his life was in danger or that he was in danger of serious bodily injury he was entitled to be acquitted on the grounds of self-defence. He was convicted. He appealed to the Court of

Appeal of Jamaica, contending that he was entitled to rely on the defence of self-defence if he had had an honest belief that he had been in danger. The Court of Appeal held that the appellant's belief that the circumstances required self-defence had to be reasonably and not merely honestly held, and dismissed his appeal. The appellant appealed to the Privy Council.

Held – If a plea of self-defence was raised when the defendant had acted under a mistake as to the facts, he was to be judged according to his mistaken belief of the facts regardless of whether, viewed objectively, his mistake was reasonable. Accordingly, the test for self-defence was that a person could use such force in the defence of himself or another was reasonable in the circumstances as he honestly believed them to be. It followed that the trial judge had misdirected the jury. The appeal would therefore be allowed and the conviction quashed (see p 426 g, p 431 e f and p 432 e f, post).

Appeal

Solomon Beckford appealed, with leave of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica granted on 7 November 1985, against the decision of that court (Rowe P, Carey and Campbell JJA) on 10 October 1985 dismissing his appeal against conviction of murder before Wolfe J and a jury on 28 March 1983. The facts are set out in the judgment of the Board. c

Michael Burton QC, Daniel Serota and John Perry for the appellant.

The Director of Public Prosecutions for Jamaica (Ian X Forte QC) and The Deputy Director of Public Prosecutions for Jamaica (Kent Pantry) for the Crown. d

At the conclusion of the argument the Board announced that it would advise Her Majesty that the appeal be allowed and the conviction quashed for reasons to be given later.

15 June. The following judgment of the Board was delivered. e

LORD GRIFFITHS. On 28 March 1985 the appellant was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. On 10 October 1985 the Court of Appeal of Jamaica dismissed his appeal against conviction, and gave leave to appeal, certifying the following question as being of exceptional public importance: f

'1.(a) Must the test to be applied for Self defence be based on what a person reasonably believed on reasonable grounds to be necessary to resist an attack or should it be what the accused honestly believed? 1.(b) Where, in the instant case, on a trial of an indictment for murder the issue of self defence is raised is it a proper direction in law for the Jury to be told by the trial Judge: A man who is attacked in circumstances where he reasonably believes his life to be in danger or that he is in danger of serious bodily injury may use such force as on reasonable grounds he thinks necessary in order to resist the attack and if in using such force he kills his assailant he is not guilty of any crime even if the killing is intentional?' g

At the conclusion of the hearing their Lordships indicated that they would humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed and the conviction quashed, and that they would give their reasons later. This they now do. h

The facts out of which the conviction arose present a confused pattern with many loose ends which might with advantage have been dealt with by further evidence. The appellant was a police officer who on 8 March 1983 was issued with a shot gun and ammunition and sent with a number of other armed police officers to a house at Greenvale Park in Manchester. The prosecution called no evidence to explain the circumstances in which this armed posse was sent out that morning but according to the appellant, in a statement he made from the dock, he and other police officers, including a Constable Reckord, were told by Deputy Superintendent Wilson that a report had been received from Heather Barnes that her brother Chester Barnes was terrorising her mother with a gun and that the police must come immediately to save her life. The appellant said that they were warned that the man appeared to be a dangerous gunman and that j

a they must take special care. Heather Barnes, however, who was the first witness called by the prosecution, denied in cross-examination that she had made a telephone call to the police or that her brother Chester Barnes was armed. It is to be regretted that the prosecution called no evidence to explain why these armed police were sent to the Barneses' house. If in fact Heather Barnes had telephoned for assistance, it might have thrown grave doubt on her testimony that her brother was unarmed; if she had not telephoned, the jury were surely entitled to know why so many armed police officers b were sent to the house. The inference is obviously that the police must have believed that they were dealing with a dangerous armed man, but in a capital murder charge such matters should be dealt with by evidence, not inference.

The prosecution case, based primarily on the evidence of Heather Barnes and a witness named Peart, was that the appellant, armed with a shotgun, and Pc Reckord, armed with a revolver, had aggressively entered the house whereupon the unarmed Chester Barnes c had fled from the house, run across the yard, jumped over a wall and tried to hide by a pigsty on the adjoining common. Heather Barnes said the appellant had fired at her brother in the yard and then he and Pc Reckord had pursued him over the wall onto the common from whence she heard more shots. Peart said he saw Chester Barnes jump the wall pursued by the police. Later he saw Barnes hiding by a pigsty, he put his hands in the air and both police officers fired at him. He heard Barnes say: 'Do officer, don't shoot d me, because me a cook.' He said Barnes had nothing in his hands, and when he fell after the first shots the appellant shot the deceased in the belly.

The evidence of the pathologist showed that the deceased had been shot three times, once in the head by the handgun and twice by the shotgun, once in the chest and lower neck and once on the inner side of the left forearm. There were no burn marks and this indicated that the shots were fired at more than 18 inches from the deceased's body.

e The police evidence established that prior to the incident the accused had been issued with a shotgun and nine cartridges and after the incident he returned the shotgun, seven cartridges and one spent cartridge. Pc Reckord handed in the revolver, nine cartridges and three spent shells.

On the prosecution evidence therefore this was a case of two police officers shooting at f and pursuing an unarmed man and finally killing him when he was pleading with them with his hands up. On this version of events both police officers were equally guilty of murder and the only reason why Pc Reckord did not also stand trial was that he had died since the incident.

After an inevitably unsuccessful submission of no case to answer the appellant presented his defence in a statement from the dock, which was summarised thus in the judgment of the Court of Appeal:

g 'The appellant made a statement from the dock, the gist of which was that he and other men from Mandeville police station were ordered to a house in Greenvale Park where, he was told, a gunman was menacing the occupant. He was informed, he said, that Heather Barnes had reported that her brother Chester Barnes, who had arrived from Kingston that morning armed with a firearm, was terrorising her. He h said further that the deputy superintendent who had dispatched them cautioned that Barnes was a dangerous gunman. On arrival at the house, they took up positions as instructed. The appellant said he saw a man run from the back door with an object which appeared to be a firearm. This man first hid behind a wall and took aim as if to fire. The appellant fired in his direction, whereupon the man ran off, jumped a wall and went into a common, where the appellant lost sight of him. The j police party went in the direction the man had taken. He heard gunshots and, as he neared the location from which the shots were being fired, he saw the same man firing at the police. He returned the fire as did other police officers. The man ran off and was pursued. He continued by saying: "We went in trace of him and still hear shots coming from a tree root in the common. Other policemen went in that direction, and I saw when Constable Reckord discharged three rounds at the man that morning, and he fell. We were looking around for the gun that we saw the man with in the bushes, searching and looking for the gun but we didn't find it. I went and searched the man and took from his pockets a kerchief and two live rounds of .38 cartridges was wrapped into a kerchief." Finally the appellant said that later that day when other policemen and himself returned to the scene they were informed that relatives of the slain man recovered the gun but had thrown it away. On the Crown's case, this amounted to a callous killing, an execution of Barnes by the appellant and another police officer, for the slain man had his hands raised in surrender but was nevertheless cut down. On the defence side, this was a plain case of self-defence. Policemen who were instructed to investigate a report of a dangerous gunman in their neighbourhood allegedly committing a breach of the peace were fired on and had returned the fire resulting in his death.'

At the conclusion of the defence case the only live issue for the jury was whether the prosecution had proved that the appellant had not killed in self-defence. The first ground of appeal before the Court of Appeal in Jamaica, and the only ground with which their Lordships are concerned, was that the trial judge had misdirected the jury on the issue of self-defence. No criticism can be made of the trial judge: his direction to the jury was in accordance with a recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Jamaica. The Court of Appeal likewise considered itself bound by its previous decision and dealt succinctly with the appellant's submission:

'A ground of appeal which may be dealt with shortly challenged the trial judge's directions to the jury with respect to self-defence. [Counsel for the appellant] submitted that the trial judge's direction that "A man who is attacked in circumstances where he reasonably believes his life to be in danger or that is in danger of serious bodily injury may use such force as on reasonable grounds as he thinks necessary in order to resist the attack and if in using such force he kills his assailant he is not guilty of any crime even if the killing is intentional" was wrong in law as being against the weight of current authorities in the United Kingdom. The test suggested in the extract was the reasonable man's assessment of circumstances that would make defensive action necessary. He submitted that the true principle of law is that the test is the appellant's assessment of all the circumstances and the question of what is reasonable is merely to be used in determining whether the appellant's assertion as to the belief he holds is honest or not. We accept that there appears to be two schools, the "reasonable belief" on the one hand and the "honest belief" on the other. Be that as it may, in our judgment this point is concluded by a recent decision of the court in R v Barrett (31 May 1985, unreported), in which the same point was canvassed by the same counsel. We can see no warrant whatever to depart from that decision or to amplify or alter the reasons on which it is based. We are content to say that the directions of the trial judge on this aspect of the case are in keeping with the law as we conceive it to be in this jurisdiction. This ground of appeal therefore fails.'

It is accepted by the Crown that there is no difference on the law of self-defence between the law of Jamaica and the English common law and it therefore falls to be decided whether it was correctly decided by the Court of Appeal in R v Williams (1983) [1987] 3 All ER 411 that the defence of self-defence depends on what the accused 'honestly' believed the circumstances to be and not on the reasonableness of that belief: what the Court of Appeal in Jamaica referred to as the 'honest belief' and 'reasonable belief' schools of thought.

There can be no doubt that prior to the decision of the House of Lords in DPP v Morgan [1975] 2 All ER 347, [1976] AC 182 the whole weight of authority supported the view that it was an essential element of self-defence not only that the accused believed that he was being attacked or in imminent danger of being attacked but also that such belief was based on reasonable grounds. No elaborate citation of authority is necessary but counsel for the Crown rightly drew attention to such nineteenth century authorities as Re Forster (1825) 1 Lew 187, 168 ER 1007, R v Weston (1879) 14 Cox CC 346 and R v Rose (1884) 15 Cox CC 540, in which the judges charged the jury that self-defence provided a defence to a charge of murder if the accused honestly and on reasonable grounds believed that his or another's life was in peril. It is, however, to be remembered that it was not until 1898 that an accused was able to give evidence in his own defence and it is natural that the judges, in the absence of any direct statement of his belief from the accused, should have focused attention on the inference that could be drawn from the surrounding circumstances. Nevertheless, even after 1898 the law of self-defence continued to be stated as propounded by the judges in the nineteenth century: see R v Chisam (1963) 47 Cr App R 130, in which Lord Parker CJ approved the following statement of the law in 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd edn) p 721, para 1382:

'Where a forcible and violent felony is attempted upon the person of another, the party assaulted, or his servant, or any other person present, is entitled to repel force by force, and, if necessary, to kill the aggressor. There must be a reasonable necessity for the killing, or at least an honest belief based upon reasonable grounds that there is such a necessity ...'

In R v Fennell [1970] 3 All ER 215 at 217, [1971] 1 QB 428 at 431 Widgery LJ, who was soon to succeed Lord Parker CJ as Lord Chief Justice, said:

'Where a person honestly and reasonably believes that he or his child is in imminent danger of injury, it would be unjust if he were deprived of the right to use reasonable force by way of defence merely because he had made some genuine mistake of fact.'

The question then is whether the present Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lane CJ, in R v Williams (1983) [1987] 3 All ER 411 was right to depart from the law as declared by his predecessors in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in DPP v Morgan.

DPP v Morgan was a case of rape, and counsel for the prosecution has submitted that the decision of the majority turns solely on their view of the specific intention required for the commission of that crime and accordingly had no relevance to the law of self-defence. It was further submitted that the question now before their Lordships was settled by an earlier decision of the Privy Council in Palmer v R [1971] 1 All ER 1077, [1971] AC 814. This submission is founded on the fact that Lord Morris in giving the judgment of the Board set out a very lengthy passage from the summing up of the judge and commented ([1971] 1 All ER 1077 at 1082, [1971] AC 814 at 824):

'Their Lordships conclude that there is no room for criticism of the summing-up or of the conduct of the trial unless there is a rule that in every case where the issue of self-defence is left to the jury they must be directed that if they consider that excessive force was used in defence then they should return a verdict of guilty of manslaughter. For the reasons which they will set out their Lordships consider that there is no such rule.'

The only question raised for the determination of the Board was that stated by Lord Morris. It is true that, in the passage quoted from the summing up the judge had stated the ingredients of self-defence in the then conventional form of reasonable belief; but it was not this part of his summing up that was under attack nor did it receive any particular consideration by the Board. Their Lordships are unable to attach greater weight to the approval of the summing up than as indicating that it was in conformity with the practice of directing juries that the accused must have reasonable grounds for believing that self-defence was necessary.

In DPP v Morgan each member of the House of Lords held that the mens rea required to commit rape is the knowledge that the woman is not consenting or recklessness whether she is consenting or not. From this premise the majority held that unless the prosecution proved that the man did not believe the woman was consenting or was at least reckless as to her consent they had failed to prove the necessary mens rea which is an essential ingredient of the crime. Lord Edmund-Davies in his dissent referred to the large body of distinguished academic support for the view that it is morally indefensible to convict a person of a crime when owing to a genuine mistake as to the facts he believes that he is acting lawfully and has no intention to commit the crime and therefore has no guilty mind. He expressed his preference for this moral approach but felt constrained by the weight of authority, including the cases on self-defence, to hold that the law required that the accused's belief should not only be genuine but also based on reasonable grounds.

In R v Kimber [1983] 3 All ER 316, [1983] 1 WLR 1118 the Court of Appeal applied the decision in DPP v Morgan to a case of indecent assault and held that a failure to direct the jury that the prosecution had to make them sure that the accused had never believed that the woman was consenting was a misdirection. Lawton LJ, in the course of his judgment, rejected the submission that the decision in DPP v Morgan was confined to rape and clearly regarded it as of far wider significance. Commenting on an obiter dictum in R v Pheko [1981] 3 All ER 84, [1981] 1 WLR 1117, he said:

'... the court went on, after referring to DPP v Morgan, to say, clearly obiter ([1981] 3 All ER 84 at 93, [1981] 1 WLR 1117 at 1127): "... it seems to us clear that this decision was confined and intended to be confined to the offence of rape." We do not accept that this was the intention of their Lordships in Morgan's case. Lord Hailsham started his speech by saying that the issue of belief was a question of great academic importance in the theory of English criminal law.'

In R v Williams the decision in DPP v Morgan was carried a step further and, in their Lordships' view, to its logical conclusion. The facts and the grounds of the decision are adequately summarised in the headnote (see 78 Cr App Rep 276):

'One M. saw a black youth rob a woman in a street. He caught the youth and held him, but the latter broke from M.'s grasp. M. caught the youth again and knocked him to the ground. The appellant, who had only seen the later stages of the incident, was told by M. that he, M. was arresting the youth for mugging a woman. M. said that he was a police officer, which was untrue, so when asked by the appellant for his warrant card, he could not produce one. A struggle followed and the appellant assaulted M. by punching him in the face and was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. His defence was that he honestly believed that the youth was being unlawfully assaulted by M. The jury was directed that, on the assumption that M. was acting lawfully, the appellant's state of mind on the issue of defence of another was to be determined by whether the appellant had an honest belief based on reasonable grounds that reasonable force was necessary to prevent a crime. The appellant was convicted and appealed on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury. Held, that the jury should have been directed that, first, the prosecution had the burden of proving the unlawfulness of the appellant's actions; secondly, if the appellant might have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts, he was to be judged according to his mistaken view of the facts, whether or not that mistake was, on an objective view, reasonable or not. The reasonableness or unreasonableness of the appellant's belief was material to the question whether the belief was held by him at all. If the belief was held, its unreasonableness, so far as guilt or innocence was concerned, was irrelevant. Accordingly, the appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.'

In the course of his judgment Lord Lane CJ, discussing the offence of assault, said ([1987] 3 All ER 411 at 414):

a 'The mental element necessary to constitute guilt is the intent to apply unlawful force to the victim. We do not believe that the mental element can be substantiated by simply showing an intent to apply force and no more.'

And later in the judgment he expressly disapproved the decision of the Divisional Court in Albert v Lavin [1981] 1 All ER 628, [1982] AC 546, in which it was said that the word 'unlawful' was tautologous and not part of the definitional element of assaulting a police officer in the course of his duty. In so doing Lord Lane CJ was expressing the same view

b of Albert v Lavin that had been previously expressed by Lawton LJ in R v Kimber.
The common law recognises that there are many circumstances in which one person may inflict violence on another without committing a crime, as for instance in sporting contests, surgical operations or, in the most extreme example, judicial execution. The common law has always recognised as one of these circumstances the right of a person to protect himself from attack and to act in the defence of others and if necessary to inflict

c violence on another in so doing. If no more force is used than is reasonable to repel the attack such force is not unlawful and no crime is committed. Furthermore, a man about to be attacked does not have to wait for his assailant to strike the first blow or fire the first shot: circumstances may justify a pre-emptive strike.
It is because it is an essential element of all crimes of violence that the violence or the threat of violence should be unlawful that self-defence, if raised as an issue in a criminal

d trial, must be disproved by the prosecution. If the prosecution fail to do so the accused is entitled to be acquitted because the prosecution will have failed to prove an essential element of the crime, namely that the violence used by the accused was unlawful.
If then a genuine belief, albeit without reasonable grounds, is a defence to rape because

e it negates the necessary intention, so also must a genuine belief in facts which if true would justify self-defence be a defence to a crime of personal violence because the belief negates the intent to act unlawfully. Their Lordships therefore approve the following passage from the judgment of Lord Lane CJ in R v Williams [1987] 3 All ER 411 at 415 as correctly stating the law of self-defence:
f 'The reasonableness or unreasonableness of the defendant's belief is material to the question of whether the belief was held by the defendant at all. If the belief was in fact held, its unreasonableness, so far as guilt or innocence is concerned, is neither here nor there. It is irrelevant. Were it otherwise, the defendant would be convicted because he was negligent in failing to recognise that the victim was not consenting or that a crime was not being committed and so on. In other words, the jury should be directed, first of all, that the prosecution have the burden or duty of proving the unlawfulness of the defendant's actions, second, that if the defendant may have been

g labouring under a mistake as to the facts he must be judged according to his mistaken view of the facts and, third, that that is so whether the mistake was, on an objective view, a reasonable mistake or not. In a case of self-defence, where self-defence or the prevention of crime is concerned, if the jury come to the conclusion that the defendant believed, or may have believed, that he was being attacked or

h that a crime was being committed, and that force was necessary to protect himself or to prevent the crime, then the prosecution have not proved their case. If, however, the defendant's alleged belief was mistaken and if the mistake was an unreasonable one, that may be a powerful reason for coming to the conclusion that the belief was not honestly held and should be rejected. Even if the jury come to the conclusion that the mistake was an unreasonable one, if the defendant may genuinely have been labouring under it, he is entitled to rely on it.'

i Looking back, DPP v Morgan can now be seen as a landmark decision in the development of the common law, returning the law to the path on which it might have developed but for the inability of an accused to give evidence on his own behalf. Their Lordships note that not only has this development the approval of such distinguished criminal lawyers as Professor Glanville Williams and Professor Smith (see Textbook of Criminal Law (2nd edn, 1983) pp 137–138 and Smith and Hogan Criminal Law (5th edn, 1983) pp 329–330) but it also has the support of the Criminal Law Revision Committee (see 14th Report on Offences Against the Person (1980) (Cmnd 7844) and of the Law Commission (see Codification of the Criminal Law (1985) (Law Com no 143)).

There may be a fear that the abandonment of the objective standard demanded by the existence of reasonable grounds for belief will result in the success of too many spurious claims of self-defence. The English experience has not shown this to be the case. The Judicial Studies Board, with the approval of the Lord Chief Justice, has produced a model direction on self-defence which is now widely used by judges when summing up to juries. The direction contains the following guidance:

‘Whether the plea is self-defence or defence of another, if the defendant may have been labouring under a mistake as to the facts, he must be judged according to his mistaken belief of the facts: that is so whether the mistake was, on an objective view, a reasonable mistake or not.’

Their Lordships have heard no suggestion that this form of summing up has resulted in a disquieting number of acquittals. This is hardly surprising, for no jury is going to accept a man’s assertion that he believed that he was about to be attacked without testing it against all the surrounding circumstances. In assisting the jury to determine whether or not the accused had a genuine belief the judge will of course direct their attention to those features of the evidence that make such a belief more or less probable. Where there are no reasonable grounds to hold a belief it will surely only be in exceptional circumstances that a jury will conclude that such a belief was or might have been held.

Their Lordships therefore conclude that the summing up in this case contained a material misdirection and they answer question 1(a) by saying that the test to be applied for self-defence is that a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances as he honestly believes them to be in the defence of himself or another. It follows from this that their Lordships answer the second part of the question 1(b) in the negative.

Their Lordships received a powerful submission from the Crown that notwithstanding the misdirection they should nevertheless apply the proviso to s 14(1) of the Judicature (Appellate Jurisdiction) Act and dismiss the appeal on the ground that no substantial miscarriage of justice had actually occurred. It was submitted that the jury must have accepted the evidence of Peart that the deceased had been shot down in the act of surrender and rejected the appellant’s account that he was killed in a gun battle, which the judge had clearly directed them would amount to self-defence. Their Lordships have given anxious consideration to this submission for there is much force in it. If on the facts as they appear from the summing up the judge had left the matter to the jury on the basis of a choice between the two accounts then any misdirection as to the reasonableness or otherwise of the appellant’s belief would have been of only academic interest.

However, the judge did not leave it to the jury as a choice between the two accounts, for he clearly thought that there was a further possibility, namely that the appellant mistakenly believed that the deceased was armed and would shoot him if he did not shoot first. It is not readily apparent why the judge regarded this as a possible view of the facts, but their Lordships have no transcript of the evidence and must accept the view of the judge that the facts were open to such an interpretation. Directing the jury on this alternative, the judge said:

‘The other situation is this, if you say you don’t find that he had a gun, but we are satisfied that the accused reasonably believed that the man had a gun and that he reasonably apprehended danger to himself because of the belief which he held, and if in those circumstances he used reasonable force to prevent that danger which he reasonably apprehended, in those circumstances he would also be entitled to a acquittal. And if you are in doubt about that as well, he must also be acquitted. If you are in doubt about whether or not he reasonably believed that the man had a gun, you must acquit him as well. I don't think I can put it any plainer. So then, what are the verdicts which are open to you on this case? There are only two, namely, guilty of murder as charged, or not guilty of murder. Those are the only two verdicts that I leave to you on these facts. One other thing before I ask you to retire, when you come to consider—remember I told you that you must consider b all circumstances of the case, all the circumstances of the case includes all the circumstances that exist in the Jamaica of today, you cannot divorce that from your mind, because, when you come to consider the question of reasonableness, that is a factor to be considered; the Jamaica today that we live in. But when I tell you that, you must consider that, it doesn't mean that a man is entitled to say that because the Jamaica in which we live today many people are armed with guns and many people c are out there with guns, a man can just come and say I believe because we live in Jamaica today and so many guns are around and firing willy-nilly, he must reasonably, that is the test, reasonably believe and he must believe that he had reasonable cause to act as he did. So it is not just a matter of saying to yourselves, plenty man have gun in Jamaica today, so when I see a man running I believe him d have a gun and shoot him down. That is not the test, the test is reasonableness, but of course, you consider it, the situation in the country today when you come to consider the reasonableness of his belief.'

In this passage the judge is emphasising time and again that the appellant's belief had to be held on reasonable grounds, and it was the final passage of his summing up before the jury retired. As counsel for the appellant said, the jury retired with the test of reasonable e belief ringing in their ears. In these circumstances their Lordships cannot feel with that utter certainty that is required in a case of capital murder that the jury would necessarily have returned the same verdict if they had been directed in terms of 'honest' as opposed to 'reasonable' belief.

Before parting with this appeal there is one further matter on which their Lordships wish to comment. The appellant chose not to give evidence but to make a statement
f from the dock which, because it cannot be tested by cross-examination, is acknowledged not to carry the weight of sworn or affirmed testimony. Their Lordships were informed, to their surprise, by counsel for the Crown that it is now the practice, rather than the exception, in Jamaica for an accused to decline to give evidence in his own defence and to rely on a statement from the dock, a privilege abolished in this country by s 72 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982. Now that it has been established that self-defence depends on g a subjective test their Lordships trust that those who are responsible for conducting the defence will bear in mind that there is an obvious danger that a jury may be unwilling to accept that an accused held an 'honest' belief if he is not prepared to assert it in the witness box and subject it to the test of cross-examination.

Practice Note

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR

2 OCTOBER 1987

Court of Appeal – Practice – Lists – List of forthcoming appeals – Abolition of warned list – Entry of appeals in list of forthcoming appeals – Timetable following entry of appeal in list – Compliance with timetable – Bundles – Estimates of length of hearing – Listing for hearing – Default in compliance with timetable – RSC Ord 59, r 9.

SIR JOHN DONALDSON MR made the following statement at the sitting of the court. In the interests of achieving a further simplification and streamlining of the progress of appeals in the Court of Appeal, Civil Division, it is proposed to abolish the warned list, which has ceased to fulfil its original purpose. Its function will be taken over by the list of forthcoming appeals, which will become the sole list of pending appeals and will be printed in the Daily Cause List in the same manner and with the same frequency as the warned list appeared in the past.

With a view to assisting appellants and their legal representatives to comply with the very strict and important timetable which is based on the date when appeals enter the list of forthcoming appeals, the Civil Appeals Office, when acknowledging the setting down of an appeal, will not only inform the parties of the number allocated to the appeal in the list in which it is entered, but will also specify the date on which it is intended to include it in the list of forthcoming appeals.

This change will take effect from 2 October 1987. As from that date the significance of an appeal entering the list of forthcoming appeals will be as follows.

(i) Bundles

The requisite number of bundles for the use of the judges must be lodged not later than 14 days after the appeal enters the list of forthcoming appeals, or within such longer period (if any) as the registrar may allow on application for cause. Any application for an extension should be made to the registrar by letter setting out the length of extension sought and the reasons for it.

The documents required to be included are listed in RSC Ord 59, r 9 (as amended) and the bundles must comply with this court's practice statement of 22 October 1986 (see Practice Note [1986] 3 All ER 630, [1986] 1 WLR 1318). (For further guidance on the form and content of bundles see The Supreme Court Practice 1988 vol 1, paras 59/9/1–59/9/12.)

(ii) Counsel's estimates of the length of hearing

A written estimate signed by counsel for the appellant must be sent or delivered to the Civil Appeals Office and a photocopy sent to the respondent's counsel, either directly or through the respondent's solicitors, not later than 14 days after the appeal enters the list of forthcoming appeals or within such further period as the registrar may allow on an application for cause.

It is the duty of the respondent's counsel to consider the estimate signed by the appellant's counsel as soon as it is received by him and to notify the Civil Appeals Office in writing of his own estimate if it differs from that of the appellant's counsel. In the absence of such notification the respondent's counsel will be deemed to have adopted the estimate by the appellant's counsel as his own.

It is a further, and very important, duty of both counsel to notify the Civil Appeals Office in writing of any change in their respective estimates immediately on that change taking place, whether it arises out of new matters coming to their attention or out of a revised appreciation of the position.

Listing for hearing

- a Without prejudice to listing earlier in case of urgency, an appeal may be listed for hearing at any time after the expiry of a period of 14 days from its entry in the list of forthcoming appeals or such longer period as the registrar may have ordered in response to an application for an extension.

In order to avoid being taken by surprise, counsel's clerks should keep in touch with the Civil Appeals Office, which will provide them with such information as can be made available on the likely progress of appeals towards being listed for hearing.

- b Appellants and respondents who are not represented by solicitors and counsel will be notified of the date for hearing by the Civil Appeals Office.

Default in compliance with the timetable

Non-compliance by appellants with this timetable will result in the appeal being listed to show cause why it should not be dismissed.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH, LORD TEMPLEMAN, LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN, LORD OLIVER OF

- e AYLMEYTON AND LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY

9, 10, 11, 12 MARCH, 14 MAY 1987

Land registration – Overriding interest – Rights of person in actual occupation of land – Parents and daughter and son-in-law jointly purchasing house – Conveyance in names of daughter and son-in-law only – Parents occupying house as their home – Daughter and son-in-law mortgaging property without parents' knowledge or consent – Daughter and son-in-law defaulting on mortgage repayments – Possession sought by mortgagee – Whether parents having an 'overriding interest' – Whether disposition by two trustees for sale overreaching parents' equitable interest – Law of Property Act 1925, ss 2(1)(ii), 14 – Land Registration Act 1925, s 70(1)(g).

- f In 1977 the respondents, their daughter and her husband jointly purchased a house in which all four intended to live. The respondents provided £18,000 of the purchase price of £34,000. The property was conveyed into the names of the daughter and her husband as beneficial joint tenants under an express trust for sale and they were registered as the proprietors in the Land Registry. In 1982 the daughter and her husband mortgaged the property to the plaintiffs, a building society, as security for an advance of £37,500. The plaintiffs were unaware that the respondents were in occupation of the property and made no inquiries to ascertain who was in occupation before making the advance. The respondents were unaware of the mortgage. The daughter and her husband subsequently defaulted on the mortgage repayments and the plaintiffs brought an action for possession of the property. The judge held that the respondents' overriding interest arising under s 70(1)(g)^a of the Land Registration Act 1925 because of their actual occupation of the property had been overreached by the plaintiffs' mortgage by virtue of s 2(1)(ii)^b of the Law of Property Act 1925, which provided that a conveyance of a legal estate to a purchaser overreached any equitable interests in that estate, whether or not the purchaser had notice of the equitable interests, if 'the conveyance is made by trustees for sale and a Section 70(1), so far as material, is set out at p 440 e, post

b Section 2(1), so far as material, is set out at p 444 b, post

the equitable interest . . . is . . . capable of being overreached by such trustees'. The judge accordingly made an order for possession. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal by the respondents on the grounds that their equitable interest in the property was an overriding interest which was protected by s 70(1)(g) and therefore binding on the plaintiffs and was also protected by s 14^c of the Law of Property Act 1925, which provided, inter alia, that Pt I of that Act (which included s 2) was not prejudicially to affect the interest of any person in actual occupation of land to which he was entitled in right of such occupation. The plaintiffs appealed to the House of Lords.

Held – The rights which the respondents had by reason of their occupation of the property and as beneficiaries under the trust for sale were no more than the rights to enjoy in specie the rents and profits of the land held in trust for them and were referable to and derived from the trust for sale. Accordingly, when the daughter and her husband, exercising as registered proprietors the powers conferred on them as trustees for sale, created a legal mortgage, the respondents' rights shifted from the land to the capital advanced to and the equity of redemption vested in the daughter and her husband as trustees for sale and thereafter the respondents no longer had an interest in the land which their occupation could protect as an overriding interest under s 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925. Furthermore, the respondents' position was not saved by s 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925, because s 14 could not enlarge or add to the respondents' beneficial interest in the equity of redemption by preserving it as an equitable interest in the land or by bringing it on to the title. It followed that the respondents' interest had been overreached by and subordinated to the legal charge executed by the daughter and her husband in favour of the plaintiffs, who were therefore entitled to an order for possession. The appeal would accordingly be allowed (see p 437 g, p 439 c to g, p 440 d f g, p 441 d, p 445 j to p 446 a c f g, p 448 b to h, p 451 f g and p 453 f to p 454 b e f, post).

Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v Boland [1980] 2 All ER 408 distinguished.

Per curiam. (1) One of the main objects of the 1925 legislation was to effect a compromise between the public interest in securing that land held on trust is freely marketable and the interests of beneficiaries in preserving their rights under the trusts. The Land Registration Act 1925 and the Law of Property Act 1925 were intended to operate in parallel and (per Lord Templeman) the object of s 70 of the Land Registration Act was to reproduce for registered land the same limitations regarding overriding interests as s 14 of the Law of Property Act produced for both registered and unregistered land (see p 437 g, p 440 f h j, p 441 d, p 449 b c and p 454 f, post).

(2) Although the interest of a beneficiary of the trust for sale who is in actual occupation will not be overreached or overridden if a mortgagee makes an advance to a single trustee of the trust for sale without the beneficiary's knowledge or consent, the beneficiary's interest will be overreached if there are two or more trustees to whom the advance is made (see p 437 g, p 441 d, p 452 e f, p 453 d and p 454 f, post); Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v Boland [1980] 2 All ER 408 explained.

Appeal

- d* City of London Building Society appealed with leave of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords granted on 13 March 1986 against the decision of the Court of Appeal (Kerr, Dillon LJ and Sir George Waller) ([1986] 1 All ER 989, [1986] Ch 605) on 4 December 1985 allowing an appeal by the respondents, Edgar Edward Flegg and Joan Eileen Flegg, against the judgment of his Honour Judge Thomas sitting as a judge of the High Court in the Chancery Division on 31 July 1985 whereby he (i) held that the equitable interest of the respondents in a freehold property known as Bleak House,
- e* Gillingham, Kent which they occupied as their home was overreached by a charge in favour of the appellants dated 12 January 1982 created by George Maxwell-Brown and Marilyn Maxwell-Brown, who were the registered proprietors of the property, and (ii) granted possession of the property to the appellants. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Templeman.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Templeman and Lord Oliver. I agree with them and for the reasons they give I would allow the appeal and restore the order of his Honour Judge Thomas.

- h*
- LORD TEMPLEMAN. My Lords, the appellants, City of London Building Society, are the mortgagees under a charge by way of legal mortgage of registered land held at the date of the charge by two trustees on trust for sale and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale on trust for four tenants in common including the respondents, Mr and Mrs Flegg. The legal charge was entered into by the trustees in breach of trust, although the appellants were unaware of this. The respondents, who were in actual occupation of the mortgaged land, claim that the appellants' legal charge is subject to the respondents' overriding interest. The Court of Appeal declined to order the respondents to deliver up possession of the land to the appellants; hence this appeal.

By a conveyance dated 18 October 1977 the land appropriately named Bleak House was conveyed to Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown in fee simple on trust for sale and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale on trust for the Maxwell-Browns as joint tenants. In fact, the purchase price paid by the Maxwell-Browns for Bleak House, amounting to £34,000, had been provided as to £18,000 or more by the respondents, who were the parents of Mrs Maxwell-Brown. In consequence and notwithstanding the express trusts set out in the conveyance, Bleak House was held by the Maxwell-Browns on trust for sale and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale on trust for the Maxwell-Browns and the respondents as tenants in common in the proportions in which they had respectively contributed to the purchase price. The respondents were entitled to occupy Bleak House together with the Maxwell-Browns as tenants in common under the trust for sale and all four beneficiaries duly went into occupation. a

By a legal charge by way of mortgage dated 12 January 1982 the Maxwell-Browns charged Bleak House to secure £37,500 advanced by the appellants to the Maxwell-Browns. The respondents knew nothing of the legal charge, which was granted by the Maxwell-Browns for their own purposes and in breach of trust. The appellants knew nothing of the respondents. b

By s 27 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (as amended by the Law of Property (Amendment) Act 1926, Sch): c

'(1) A purchaser of a legal estate from trustees for sale shall not be concerned with the trusts affecting the proceeds of sale of land subject to a trust for sale . . . or affecting the rents and profits of the land until sale . . . d

(2) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the instrument (if any) creating a trust for sale of land or in the settlement of the net proceeds, the proceeds of sale or other capital money shall not be paid to or applied by the direction of fewer than two persons as trustees for sale, except where the trustee is a trust corporation . . . ' e

By s 205(1)(xxi) of the 1925 Act the expression 'purchaser' as used in ss 27 and 28 includes a chargee by way of legal mortgage, and the sum of £37,500 advanced by the appellants to the Maxwell-Browns was capital money within the meaning of s 27(2) and was duly paid to two persons as trustees for sale. f

By s 28(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925, read in conjunction with s 71 of the Settled Land Act 1925, trustees for sale of land have powers to mortgage the land and—

'all capital money arising under the said powers shall, unless paid or applied for any purpose authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925, be applicable in the same manner as if the money represented proceeds of sale arising under the trust for sale.' g

Section 17 of the Trustee Act 1925 provides:

'No purchaser or mortgagee, paying or advancing money on a sale or mortgage purporting to be made under any trust or power vested in trustees, shall be concerned to see that such money is wanted, or that no more than is wanted is raised, or otherwise as to the application thereof.' h

Thus the appellants advancing money in good faith to two trustees for sale on the security of a charge by way of legal mortgage of Bleak House were not concerned with the trusts affecting the proceeds of sale of Bleak House or with the propriety of the trustees entering into the legal charge. As a result of the legal charge the interests of the beneficiaries in Bleak House pending sale were transferred to the equity of redemption vested in the Maxwell-Browns and to the sum of £37,500 received by the Maxwell-Browns from the appellants in consideration for the grant of the legal charge. The Maxwell-Browns did not account to the respondents for any part of the sum of £37,500 and defaulted in the performance of their obligations to the appellants under the legal charge. The appellants seek possession of Bleak House with a view to enforcing its security. j a The respondents resist the claim of the appellants to possession of Bleak House and rely on s 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925. Sections 27 and 28 of that Act, which overreach the interests of the respondents under the trust for sale of Bleak House, are to be found in Pt I of the Act. Section 14 provides:

b ‘This Part of this Act shall not prejudicially affect the interest of any person in possession or in actual occupation of land to which he may be entitled in right of such possession or occupation.’

The respondents were in actual occupation of Bleak House at the date of the legal charge. It is argued that their beneficial interests under the trust for sale were not overreached by the legal charge or that the respondents were entitled to remain in occupation after the legal charge and against the appellants despite the overreaching of their interests.

c My Lords, the respondents were entitled to occupy Bleak House by virtue of their beneficial interests in Bleak House and its rents and profits pending the execution of the trust for sale. Their beneficial interests were overreached by the legal charge and were transferred to the equity of redemption held by the Maxwell-Browns and to the sum advanced by the appellants in consideration of the grant of the legal charge and received by the Maxwell-Browns. After the legal charge the respondents were only entitled to d continue in occupation of Bleak House by virtue of their beneficial interests in the equity of redemption of Bleak House and that equity of redemption is subject to the right of the appellants as mortgagees to take possession. Sections 27 and 28 did not ‘prejudicially’ affect the interests of the respondents, who were, indeed, prejudiced but by the subsequent failure of the trustees for sale to account to their beneficiaries for capital money received by the trustees. A beneficiary who is entitled to share in the proceeds of e sale of land held on trust for sale relies on the trustees. Section 26(3) of the Act (as amended) requires trustees for sale to consult their beneficiaries and to give effect to the wishes of the majority of the beneficiaries ‘but a purchaser shall not be concerned to see that the provisions of this subsection have been complied with’. If the argument for the respondents is correct, a purchaser from trustees for sale must ensure that a beneficiary
f in actual occupation is not only consulted but consents to the sale. Section 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925 is not apt to confer on a tenant in common of land held on trust for sale, who happens to be in occupation, rights which are different from and superior to the rights of tenants in common, who are not in occupation on the date when the interests of all tenants in common are overreached by a sale or mortgage by trustees for sale.

g The Maxwell-Browns registered their title to Bleak House under the Land Registration Act 1925 with title absolute for a legal estate in fee simple in possession. They continued to hold Bleak House on trust for sale and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale on trust for the Maxwell-Browns and the respondents as tenants in common. By s 74:

h ‘... neither the registrar nor any person dealing with a registered estate or charge shall be affected with notice of a trust express implied or constructive, and references to trusts shall, so far as possible, be excluded from the register.’

By ss 2 and 18 proprietors of registered land may dispose of the land by transfer or by the creation of a legal estate including the grant of a legal charge by way of mortgage. Section 20(1) provides as follows:

j ‘In the case of a freehold estate registered with an absolute title, a disposition of the registered land or of a legal estate therein, including a lease thereof, for valuable consideration shall, when registered, confer on the transferee or grantee an estate in fee simple or the term of years absolute or other legal estate expressed to be created in the land dealt with ... subject—(a) to the incumbrances and other entries, if any, appearing on the register . . . and (b) unless the contrary is expressed on the register, to the overriding interests, if any, affecting the estate transferred or created, but free from all other estates and interests whatsoever . . . and the disposition shall operate in like manner as if the registered transferor or grantor were (subject to any entry to the contrary in the register) entitled to the registered land in fee simple in possession for his own benefit.' a

Amongst the 'other estates and interests' which do not affect the legal estate transferred or created are 'minor interests' defined by s 3(xv) as: b

'... the interests not capable of being disposed of or created by registered dispositions and capable of being overridden (whether or not a purchaser has notice thereof) by the proprietors unless protected as provided by this Act, and all rights and interests which are not registered or protected on the register and are not overriding interests, and include—(a) in the case of land held on trust for sale, all interests and powers which are under the Law of Property Act, 1925, capable of being overridden by the trustees for sale, whether or not such interests and powers are so protected . . . ' c

It follows that, when the legal charge in the present case is registered, the appellants will take free from all the interests of the beneficiaries interested under the trust for sale in the proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale of Bleak House but subject to any overriding interest. d

Section 70(1) of the Land Registration Act 1925 defines overriding interests, which include:

'(g) The rights of every person in actual occupation of the land or in receipt of the rents and profits thereof, save where enquiry is made of such person and the rights are not disclosed.' e

In my view the object of s 70 was to reproduce for registered land the same limitations as s 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925 produced for land whether registered or unregistered. The respondents claim to be entitled to overriding interests because they were in actual occupation of Bleak House on the date of the legal charge. But the interests of the respondents cannot at one and the same time be overreached and overridden and at the same time be overriding interests. The appellants cannot at one and the same time take free from all the interests of the respondents yet at the same time be subject to some of those interests. The right of the respondents to be and remain in actual occupation of Bleak House ceased when the respondents' interests were overreached by the legal charge save in so far as their rights were transferred to the equity of redemption. As persons interested under the trust for sale the respondents had no right to possession as against the appellants and the fact that the respondents were in actual occupation at the date of the legal charge did not create a new right or transfer an old right so as to make the right enforceable against the appellants. f

One of the main objects of the legislation of 1925 was to effect a compromise between, on the one hand, the interests of the public in securing that land held in trust is freely marketable and, on the other hand, the interests of the beneficiaries in preserving their rights under the trusts. By the Settled Land Act 1925 a tenant for life may convey the settled land discharged from all the trusts, powers and provisions of the settlement. By the Law of Property Act 1925 trustees for sale may convey land held on trust for sale discharged from the trusts affecting the proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale. Under both forms of trust the protection and the only protection of the beneficiaries is that capital money must be paid to at least two trustees or a trust corporation. Section 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925 and s 70 of the Land Registration Act 1925 cannot have been intended to frustrate this compromise and to subject the purchaser to some beneficial interests but not others depending on the waywardness of actual occupation. g h j

The Court of Appeal took a different view, largely in reliance on the decision of this House in Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v Boland [1980] 2 All ER 408, [1981] AC 487. In that case the sole proprietor of registered land held the land as sole trustee on trust for sale and to stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale on trust for himself and his wife as tenants in common. This House held that the wife's beneficial interest coupled with actual possession by her constituted an overriding interest and that a mortgagee from the husband, despite the concluding words of s 20(1), took subject to the wife's overriding interest. But in that case the interest of the wife was not overreached or overridden because the mortgagee advanced capital moneys to a sole trustee. If the wife's interest had been overreached by the mortgagee advancing capital moneys to two trustees there would have been nothing to justify the wife in remaining in occupation as against the mortgagee. There must be a combination of an interest which justifies continuing occupation plus actual occupation to constitute an overriding interest. Actual occupation is not an interest in itself.

For these reasons and for the reasons to be given by my noble and learned friend Lord Oliver, I would allow this appeal and restore the order of his Honour Judge Thomas, who ordered the respondents to deliver up Bleak House to the appellants.

LORD MACKAY OF CLASHFERN. My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading in draft the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Templeman and Lord Oliver. I agree with them that the appeal should be allowed for the reasons that they have given.

LORD OLIVER OF AYLERTON. My Lords, on 12 January 1982 the appellant society, in the ordinary course of its business, lent to Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown a sum of £37,500. The Maxwell-Browns were the registered proprietors with title absolute of a freehold property known as Bleak House, Grange Road, Gillingham, Kent, registered at the Land Registry under title no K467866. That property had been acquired by them by a conveyance dated 18 October 1977 at a price of £34,000 and the conveyance expressly provided that they were to hold the property on trust for sale for themselves as joint tenants beneficially and that, during the period of 21 years from the death of the survivor of them, the trustees should have all the powers of an absolute owner. There was no subsisting restriction entered on the proprietorship register at the date of the appellants' loan to the Maxwell-Browns and nothing on the registered title to suggest to the appellants that they were anything other than what they appeared to be, that is to say joint tenants absolutely and beneficially entitled. In fact they were not. They were respectively the son-in-law and the daughter of the respondents, Mr and Mrs Flegg, and, as between the four of them, it is beyond dispute that Mr and Mrs Flegg had an equitable interest in the proceeds of the property, which was, to a substantial extent, purchased with the proceeds of a bungalow at Rainham which they sold in 1977 and which, for some 28 years before that, had been their home. In the summer of 1977 they decided in conjunction with their daughter and son-in-law, to buy Bleak House, a larger house in which it was the intention that all four of them should live. The respondents provided the deposit of £3,400 and paid a further sum of £14,600 out of the proceeds of their bungalow towards the purchase price of the property. At the trial of the action giving rise to this appeal, the judge, his Honour Judge Thomas, found as a fact that it was always the intention of the respondents and of Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown that the balance of the purchase price should be raised by means of a mortgage and this was in fact done, the money being raised by Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown alone on the security of a legal charge on the property in favour of the Hastings and Thanet Building Society. The respondents were professionally advised in connection with this transaction and the judge found as a fact that their solicitor had advised them that the conveyance of the property should be taken in the names of all four of them. They were, however, unwilling personally to assume any liability for repayment of the mortgage and the property was in fact conveyed to Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown alone and charged by them to the building society. The conveyance contains no reference whatever to any interest of the respondents. It was, as already mentioned, a simple conveyance to Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown as joint tenants beneficially and they were subsequently registered as proprietors with title absolute at the Land Registry without any restriction being entered on the register. a

From a date shortly after the completion of the purchase the respondents occupied the property in common with their daughter and son-in-law and they spent considerable further sums on improving the property. By the end of 1981, however, Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown were in financial difficulties and have since been adjudicated bankrupt. They had already, without the knowledge or consent of the respondents, borrowed further sums on the security of charges on the property and on 12 January 1982 they executed yet another charge by way of legal mortgage in favour of the appellants to secure a sum of £37,500. Some £26,199 of this was applied to discharging the mortgage in favour of the Hastings and Thanet Building Society and the balance for other purposes including the discharge of the further charges on the property which they had executed. Before advancing the money the appellants caused a search to be made at the Land Registry and an official certificate of search, giving priority until 14 January 1982, was issued on 30 November 1981. The legal charge was duly executed and the money advanced on 12 January 1982, but the deed was not in fact lodged for registration until 26 January 1982, by which time the priority period had expired. Although the judge found as a fact that the respondents knew nothing of this charge and would not have consented to it if they had known, it seems clear that they must at least have entertained a suspicion that their daughter and son-in-law were contemplating some sort of dealing with the land, because on 7 December 1981 they applied for the entry of a caution on the register. In the result the appellants' charge has not yet been registered. b

Inevitably Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown defaulted in paying the instalments of principal and interest due under the legal charge and the appellants commenced proceedings to have the caution removed and for possession. Those proceedings were defended by the respondents on the ground that, as persons beneficially entitled under a resulting trust in their favour to a share in the property or its proceeds of sale and as persons in actual occupation of the property at the date of the execution of the legal charge, they had an overriding interest which took priority to the interest of the appellants under the charge. The judge accepted that, following the decision of this House in Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v Boland [1980] 2 All ER 408, [1981] AC 487, the respondents had, immediately prior to the advance by the appellants, an overriding interest pursuant to s 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925 by virtue of their occupation of the property in common with the respondents, but he held that the charge by Mr and Mrs Maxwell-Brown, as the only two trustees of the property, had, under the provisions of the Law of Property Act 1925, the effect of overreaching any interest conferred on or preserved for the respondents by their occupation and that the overreaching of that interest was not affected by s 14 of that Act. From this decision the respondents appealed to the Court of Appeal, which, on 4 December 1985, unanimously allowed the appeal, holding that the case was substantially indistinguishable from Boland's case and that, in any event, s 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925 had the effect of preventing the interest of the tenant in common in actual occupation of the land from being overreached without his consent (see [1986] 1 All ER 989, [1986] Ch 605). f

My Lords, ever since Boland's case it has been widely assumed by those called on to advise banks and building societies that, so long as capital moneys arising from an exercise of their powers by trustees for sale holding on the statutory trusts have been paid in accordance with the statutory provisions to not less than two trustees or a trust corporation pursuant to the provisions of s 27 of the Law of Property Act 1925, a purchaser need not concern himself with the beneficial interests in the property even where one or more of the beneficiaries is or are in actual occupation of the property at j

- the time of the transaction. That assumption was shared by the Law Commission in their
- a Report on the Implications of Williams & Glyn's Bank Ltd v Boland (Law Com no 115) para 42. This appeal is, therefore, of very considerable importance not only to conveyancers but to anyone proposing to lend on the security of property in respect of which there is any possibility of the existence of beneficial interests which have not been disclosed by the apparent absolute owner. If it be the case, as the Court of Appeal held, that the payment by the appellants in the instant case to two properly constituted trustees for sale,
- b holding on the statutory trusts, provides no sensible distinction from the ratio of the decision of this House in Boland's case, the legislative policy of the 1925 legislation of keeping the interests of beneficiaries behind the curtain and confining the investigation of title to the devolution of the legal estate will have been substantially reversed by judicial decision and financial institutions advancing money on the security of land will face hitherto unsuspected hazards, whether they are dealing with registered or
- c unregistered land.

- My Lords, I propose to approach the problems raised by this appeal in four stages: first, by considering briefly the position of tenants in common of real estate prior to 1926 and, in particular, their rights in relation to occupation; second, by considering the effect which the 1925 property legislation had on that position and the policy behind such legislation; third, by considering what would have been the result on the facts of the
- d instant case if the land concerned had, throughout, been unregistered land; and, finally, by considering the impact on that result of the provisions of the Land Registration Act 1925.

- Prior to 1926 the interest of a tenant in common, unless taking effect under a trust, was a legal estate and devolved as such. The one essential feature which tenants in common shared with joint tenants was unity of possession. Thus each co-owner was as
- e much entitled to every part of the land as were his co-tenants and he had the right to occupy the land concurrently with them. If they were unable to agree, their remedy lay in partition under the Partition Acts of 1539, 1540 and 1697 (31 Hen 8 c 1, 32 Hen 8 c 32 and 8 & 9 Will 3 c 31) or, after the Partition Act 1868, in obtaining from the court an order for sale of the property. The inconvenience of this is manifest. If the land was
- f partitioned, the result was the fragmentation of estates into small holdings. If it was sold without partitioning, the purchasers were compelled to investigate the title of each co-owner. The 1925 legislation achieved a measure of simplification by providing (in s 1(6) of the Law of Property Act 1925) that a legal estate should no longer be capable of subsisting or being created in an undivided share in land and by imposing in all cases in which undivided shares existed or were created the statutory trusts set out in s 35 of that
- g Act. The whole philosophy of the Act in relation to undivided shares was that a purchaser of the legal estate (which, by s 205(1)(xxi), includes a mortgagee) should not be concerned with the beneficial interests of the tenants in common, which were shifted to the proceeds of sale. This is familiar material for conveyancers and it is unnecessary to do more than cite a few of the sections of the Act which have an immediate bearing on the problem raised by this appeal. Sections 34 and 36 deal with express limitations in
- h undivided shares or to persons as joint tenants respectively, but there is no section dealing specifically with the case where, as here, land becomes held beneficially for tenants in common by means of a resulting trust. Nevertheless, s 34(1) provides that an undivided share shall not be capable of being created except as provided by the Settled Land Act 1925 or as thereafter mentioned and s 36(4) of the Settled Land Act 1925 provides in terms that an undivided share in land shall not be capable of being created except under
- j a trust instrument or under the Law of Property Act 1925, and shall then only take effect behind a trust for sale. Having thus established the trust for sale as the conveyancing machinery through which effect is given to the interests of owners in undivided shares, those interests are, by virtue of the equitable doctrine of conversion, transferred to the proceeds of sale and the net rents and profits pending sale, although, pending the exercise of the trustees' powers, they retain, by judicial construction, some of the incidents of the legal interests which they replaced. The Act, however, contains elaborate provisions for overreaching equitable interests and for exonerating purchasers from being concerned with them. Section 2(1) provides that a conveyance to a purchaser of a legal estate in land shall overreach any equitable interest or power affecting that estate, whether or not he has notice of it, if, inter alia—

'(ii) the conveyance is made by trustees for sale and the equitable interest or power is at the date of the conveyance capable of being overreached by such trustees . . . and the statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money arising under a disposition upon trust for sale are complied with . . .'

Under s 205(1)(ii) 'conveyance' includes a mortgage. Section 26(3), whilst obliging trustees for sale so far as practicable to consult the persons for the time being interested in possession in the rents and profits, specifically exonerates a purchaser from being concerned to see that the provisions of the subsection have been complied with. Similarly, s 27(1) provides that a purchaser is not to be concerned with the trusts affecting the proceeds of sale or the rents and profits until sale. Subsection (2) of the same section contains a mandatory requirement that (subject to an exception in the case of the sole personal representative) the proceeds of sale or other capital money shall not be paid to or applied by the direction of fewer than two persons as trustees for sale, except where the trustee is a trust corporation. Section 28(1) confers on trustees for sale the powers of the tenant life under the Settled Land Act 1925 and goes on to provide that those powers when exercised—

'shall operate to overreach any equitable interests or powers which are by virtue of this Act or otherwise made to attach to the net proceeds of sale as if created by a trust affecting those proceeds.'

Thus the trustees for sale are empowered to exercise the powers of a tenant for life to mortgage the land which are contained in s 71 of the Settled Land Act 1925. At the same time s 17 of the Trustee Act 1925 provides:

'No purchaser or mortgagee, paying or advancing money on a sale or mortgage purporting to be made under any trust or power vested in trustees, shall be concerned to see that such money is wanted, or that no more than is wanted is raised, or otherwise as to the application thereof.'

Thus far it is tolerably clear that the scheme of the Act is to enable a purchaser or mortgagee, so long as he pays the proceeds of sale or other capital moneys to not less than two trustees or to a trust corporation, to accept a conveyance or mortgage without reference at all to the beneficial interests of co-owners interested only in the proceeds of sale and rents and profits until sale, which are kept behind the curtain and do not require to be investigated. There are, however, a number of cases in which the question has arisen between beneficiary and trustee as to the rights of the beneficiary in occupation, either alone or in common with his or her co-beneficiary, of the trust property pending sale, particularly where the property has been purchased with a view to its being occupied, for instance, as the matrimonial home of the parties. In Bull v Bull [1955] 1 All ER 253, [1955] 1 QB 234, where a mother and son had together purchased as their residence a house which had been conveyed into the son's name alone, the Court of Appeal upheld the decision of a county court judge who had dismissed the son's claim for possession. Denning LJ gave the leading judgment, in which he quoted the following passage from the judgment of Maugham J in Re Warren, Warren v Warren [1932] 1 Ch 42 at 47, [1931] All ER Rep 702 at 704:

'There is no doubt that, since the coming into force of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the position of undivided owners is different from what it was before. That Act, for the purpose of simplifying the law, has introduced provisions for undivided shares, and has made partition actions unnecessary and obsolete. But in substance a the beneficial interests of the undivided owners in regard to enjoyment so long as the land remains unsold have not been altered, and it is true to say that the ordinary layman possessed of an undivided share in land would be quite unaware of any alteration in his rights as the result of the Act.'

b 'My conclusion, therefore, is that, when there are two equitable tenants in common, then, until the property is sold, each of them is entitled concurrently with the other to the possession of the land and to the use and enjoyment of it in a proper manner; and that neither of them is entitled to evict the other.'

c That, of course, was sufficient to dispose of the case, which was a simple action for possession, and it was on that ground that the appeal was dismissed. Denning LJ, however, went on to consider the way in which the mother was entitled to exercise her equitable interest in the following passage ([1955] 1 All ER 253 at 256, [1955] 1 QB 234 at 238):

d 'The mother is entitled to rely on her equitable interest as tenant in common which is preserved by two sections of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The first is s. 14 which says that the Act "... shall not prejudicially affect the interest of any person in possession or in actual occupation of land to which he may be entitled in right of such possession or occupation." The second is s. 35 which says that the trust for sale is "... subject to such ... provisions, as may be requisite for giving effect to the rights of the persons ... interested in the land ..." In this case the mother is in possession and in actual occupation as equitable co-owner and by virtue of that interest cannot be evicted by the trustees except with her consent. If the trustees wished in these circumstances to sell with vacant possession the only thing they could do would be apply to the court under s. 30 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, on the ground that the mother's consent could not be obtained. The court could then make such order as it thought fit and this would include, I think, an order to turn the mother out if it was right and proper for such an order to be made (compare Re Buchanan-Wollaston's Conveyance ([1939] 2 All ER 302, [1939] Ch 738), and Re Hyde's Conveyance ((1952) 102 LJo 58). My conclusion is, therefore, that the son, although he is the legal owner of the house, has no right to turn his mother out. She has an equitable interest which entitles her to remain in the house as tenant in common with him until the house is sold.'

j In the Court of Appeal in the instant case Dillon LJ followed and adopted this passage and held that, quite apart from the provisions of the Land Registration Act 1925, the respondents had an equitable interest in the property protected by occupation which took priority over the appellants' mortgage by virtue of s 14 of the Law of Property Act 1925. My Lords, the ambit of s 14 is a matter which has puzzled conveyancers ever since the Law of Property Act was enacted. It has been suggested that its purpose was to make it clear that the provisions of Pt I were not prejudicially to affect the rights of occupiers of the land who either had or, by virtue of their occupation, were in the process of acquiring title by adverse possession. If so, the section seems unnecessary. Another suggestion canvassed during the course of the argument was that it might have been intended to preserve the right of, for instance, a statutory tenant under the Rent Acts whose status could quite properly be said to arise 'in right of' his occupation. For my part, I think that it is unnecessary for present purposes to seek to resolve the conundrum. What s 14 does not do, on any analysis, is to enlarge or add to whatever interest it is that the occupant has 'in right of his occupation' and in my judgment the argument that places reliance on it in the instant case founds itself on an assumption about the nature of the occupying co-owners' interest that cannot in fact be substantiated. The section cannot of itself create an interest which survives the execution of the trust under which it arises or answer the logically anterior question of what, if any, interest in the land is conferred by the possession or occupation. It is suggested in Wolstenholme and Cherry's Conveyancing Statutes (13th edn, 1972) vol 1, p 69 that s 14 was designed to preserve the principle, exemplified by Hunt v Luck [1902] 1 Ch 428, [1900-3] All ER Rep 295, that a purchaser will have constructive notice of any rights reasonably discoverable from inspection of the property and, in particular, from inquiry of any occupier as to his interest and the terms on which he holds it. With that I respectfully agree. Leaving aside, however, the question whether the words 'in right of such possession or occupation' have, as the judge thought and as the appellants have argued before your Lordships, the effect of limiting the interests to which the section applies to those which are conferred by the preceding fact of possession or occupation or whether, as the Court of Appeal held in effect, they mean merely 'in respect of' or 'associated with' possession or occupation, the section cannot, in my judgment, have the effect of preserving, as equitable interests in the land, interests which are overreached by the exercise of the trustees' powers or of bringing on to the title which the purchaser from trustees for sale is required to investigate the equitable interest of every beneficiary who happens to be in occupation of the land. That would be to defeat the manifest purpose of the legislature in enacting the sections to which reference has already been made. Looking at the interest of the tenant in common in actual occupation and considering for the moment only the position in relation to unregistered land, one has, as it seems to me, to bear in mind always the distinction between his rights as against his co-beneficiaries or against the trustee or trustees in whom the legal estate is vested and his rights against a purchaser of the legal estate from the trustees for sale. His interest is overreached and the purchaser is absolved from inquiry only if the statutory requirements respecting the payment of capital money arising under a disposition on trust for sale are complied with (see ss 2(1)(ii) and 27). Until that occurs, he remains entitled to assert against the trustees and, indeed, against any purchaser from the trustees who has not complied with the statutory requirements all the incidents of his beneficial interest in the proceeds of sale of the property and in the net rents and profits until the sale. One of the incidents of that beneficial interest is, or may be according to the agreement between the beneficiaries or to the purpose for which the trust was originally created, the enjoyment of the property in specie either alone or concurrently with other beneficiaries. But the enjoyment in specie, whilst it may serve to give notice to third parties of the occupier's interest under the trust, is not a separate and severable right which can be regarded as, as it were, free standing. It is and has to be referable to the trust from which, and from which alone, it arises. It is the beneficial interest in the rents and profits pending sale that is the foundation of that enjoyment and there is nothing in the statute or in the cases, leaving aside, for the moment, the Boland case [1980] 2 All ER 408, [1981] AC 487, which I shall have to come to a little later, to suggest that the enjoyment of the property in specie of itself confers some independent right which will survive the operation of the overreaching provisions of the Law of Property Act 1925. Indeed, the framers of that legislation would, I think, have been shocked and surprised to hear it asserted that a purchaser in proper form from the trustees of the statutory trusts was required to investigate the purposes for which the trust property had been acquired by the trustees or the terms of some private and unwritten agreement or understanding between the beneficiaries inter se or between one or more of the beneficiaries and the trustees. Bull v Bull [1955] 1 All ER 253, [1955] 1 QB 234 was, of course, a case where the only question was whether a sole trustee was entitled to an order for possession against a beneficiary with a subsisting interest in the trust property who had been permitted to occupy it. In dealing with the occupying beneficiary's rights Denning LJ was at pains to say that the entitlement to retain possession which he held to exist was 'until the place is sold'. The mother had, he said, 'an equitable interest which entitled her to remain in the house as tenant in common with him until the house is sold' (see [1955] 1 All ER 253 at 256, [1955] 1 QB 234 at 239). Waller v Waller [1967] 1 All ER 305, [1967] 1 WLR 451 and Barclay v Barclay [1970] 2 All ER 676, [1970] 2 QB 677 were again cases where the question arose prior to sale between the sole trustee and an occupying beneficial tenant in common. Clearly when the question is whether the trustee or trustees shall execute the trust by selling or exercising their power to postpone, as, for instance, in Re Buchanan-Wollaston's Conveyance [1939] 3 All ER 302, [1939] Ch 738, a court called on to adjudicate at the instance of an opposing beneficiary or trustee is concerned to investigate all the circumstances with a view to considering whether a party opposing sale has some equity which renders an immediate execution of the trust unfair or unjust. But that is not because such a person has, by virtue of his occupation, some interest in the land which is incapable of being overreached but precisely because, in the absence of some intervention of the court, the effect of a sale in accordance with the statutory provisions will be to overreach it, the whole question being whether that would be an equitable result. The position of the occupying tenant in common of unregistered land is, in my judgment, lucidly and accurately summarised in Irani Finance Ltd v Singh [1969] 3 All ER 1455, [1971] Ch 59; affd [1970] 3 All ER 199, [1971] Ch 59, CA, a decision which was treated by the Court of Appeal in Boland's case [1979] 2 All ER 697, [1979] Ch 313 with perhaps rather less respect than it deserved having regard to the fact that it was both binding on it and was a decision of four judges of unrivalled experience in the law of real property (Buckley J at first instance and Russell, Widgery and Cross LJ in the Court of Appeal). The question at issue was whether the interest of an occupying tenant in common (the joint tenancy having been severed) was an 'interest in land' which could be made the subject matter of a charging order under s 35(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1956. Although the actual decision was confined to the meaning of the words 'interest in land' in the particular context of the 1956 Act and is therefore less than helpful in the context of the present inquiry, the case contains a useful general analysis of the rights of a beneficiary under the statutory trusts and I do not think that I can do better than to quote verbatim the following passage from the judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Cross LJ ([1970] 3 All ER 199 at 203, [1971] Ch 59 at 79–80):

"The words 'interest in land' are no doubt capable in an appropriate context of including interests under trusts for sale of land, and although there is no need for us to express a concluded opinion on the point, we certainly do not wish to be taken to be casting any doubt on the correctness of the dicta in Cooper v Critchley [1955] 1 All ER 520, [1955] Ch 431, but for 100 years before 1956 the words, or equivalent words, have been held in this field not to include interests arising under trusts for sale . . . To turn finally to Bull v Bull [1955] 1 All ER 253, [1955] 1 QB 234 and Barclay v Barclay [1970] 2 All ER 676, [1970] 2 QB 677, in the judgments in Bull v Bull, and in Cook v Cook [1962] 2 All ER 811, [1962] P 235 in which the principle laid down in Bull v Bull was applied, the beneficiaries are in places described as 'equitable tenants in common' of the house in question. But the use of these words—which are apt enough to describe the physical situation—does not, we think, necessarily imply that the court considered that the interests of the beneficiaries were interests in realty and not interests in personality. It is true that in his judgment in Barclay v Barclay [1970] 2 All ER 676 at 678, [1970] 2 QB 677 at 684 Lord Denning MR referred to the interests of the beneficiaries in Bull v Bull as equitable interests in land, but that expression of opinion was not necessary to the decision in any of the cases and, with respect, we cannot agree with it. No doubt such tenants in common are interested in the land in a general sense, as was remarked by Russell LJ in Re Kempthorne, Charles v Kempthorne [1930] 1 Ch 268 at 292, [1929] All ER Rep 495 at 501. But that is not the same thing as their being owners of equitable interests in the realty. The whole purpose of the trust for sale is to make sure, by shifting the equitable interests away from the land and into the proceeds of sale, that a purchaser of the land takes free from the equitable interests. To hold these to be equitable interests in the land itself would be to frustrate this purpose. Even to hold that they have equitable interests in the land for a limited period, namely until the land is sold, would, we think, be inconsistent with the trust for sale being an "immediate" trust for sale working an immediate conversion, which is what the Law of Property Act 1925 envisages (see s 205(1)(xxix)); although of course, it is not in fact only such a limited interest that the plaintiff company is seeking to charge.'

If this is right, as I believe that it is, the reason why a purchaser of the legal estate (whether by way of outright sale or by way of mortgage) from a single proprietor takes subject to the rights of the occupying beneficiary is not because s 14 of the Act confers on the latter some interest in land which is incapable of being overreached but because, having constructive notice of the trust as a result of the beneficiary's occupation, he steps into the shoes of the vendor or mortgagor and takes the estate subject to the same equities as those to which it was subject in the latter's hands, those equities and their accompanying incidents not having been overreached by the sale under the provisions of ss 2(1) and 27 of the Act. Where the purchase has taken effect in accordance with those provisions, it is quite clear from the terms of the statute both that the purchaser, even with express notice, is not concerned with the beneficiary's interest in the proceeds of sale or the net rents and profits until sale and that that interest is overreached. The beneficiary's possession or occupation is no more than a method of enjoying in specie the rents and profits pending sale in which he is entitled to share. It derives from and is, as counsel for the appellants has graphically put it, fathered by the interests under the trust for sale. Once that goes, as it does on the execution of the trust for sale, then the foundation of the occupation goes and the beneficiary has no longer any 'interest . . . to which he may be entitled in right of such . . . occupation'. We are, of course, concerned here not with the execution of the trust by a sale of the land by the trustees, but with the exercise by the trustees of their power to raise capital money by creating a charge on the land. But the same principle must, in my judgment, apply, the 'overreaching' in this case consisting in the creation by the trustees of a legal estate and of powers incidental thereto (including the mortgagee's power of sale) which have an absolute priority over the beneficial interests, although, no doubt, those beneficial interests and their accompanying incidents continue as against the equity of redemption which remains vested in the trustees. If I may say so respectfully, the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in the instant case starts at the wrong end by assuming that there is an interest conferred by occupation which, were it not for s 14, would be in some way prejudiced by the provisions of Pt I of the Act, whereas in fact the occupier's interest in this instance is one which stems from, depends on and is coterminous with the interest in the rents and profits arising under those very provisions and which is displaced by the execution of the trust or the exercise of the trustees' powers to the same extent as that interest. For my part, I have found myself unable to accept the reasoning in this part of the judgment of Dillon LJ. If this were a case concerned solely with unregistered land, I am of opinion that the appellants' charge would take effect in priority to the respondents' interest, which would be pro tanto overreached and which, so far as it can properly be considered as an equitable interest in land, would continue to subsist only in the equity of redemption.

So to conclude, however, resolves only part of the question, for the land concerned was at the material time registered land and there remain to be considered two questions, viz, first, how do the provisions of the Land Registration Act 1925 fit with the provisions of the Law of Property Act 1925 and, second, does the decision of this House in Boland's case [1980] 2 All ER 408, [1981] AC 487, which was concerned with a transaction between a mortgagee and a sole individual trustee, falsify or otherwise affect the conclusion just stated?

My Lords, the Land Registration Act 1925 was by no means the first attempt to introduce into English conveyancing a system of land registration. Previous attempts in the Land Registry Act 1862, the Land Transfer Act 1875 and the Land Transfer Act 1897 had not proved wholly popular or successful, although the 1897 Act introduced for the first time the concept of compulsory registration and a system of registration had in fact been operative in the county of London from the turn of the century. The 1925 Act was introduced as part and parcel of the overall property legislation enacted in that year and it introduced for the first time, in s 120, a power in the central government to designate areas in which registered conveyancing would be compulsory. Initially, however, there was built in a ten-year delay on the exercise of this power (s 120(2)) with the object of providing an experimental period during which it could be seen how a system of registered conveyancing operated alongside the amended system of unregistered conveyancing and which system it would be preferable to adopt over the country as a whole. Thus the philosophy behind both the Land Registration Act 1925 and the Law of Property Act 1925 was that they should operate in parallel and it would, therefore, be surprising if it were found that the two systems were not constructed so as to dovetail into one another. In fact they do. The Land Registration Act 1925 came into operation on 1 January 1926 but was (by s 148(2)) deemed to come into operation immediately after the remainder of the 1925 property legislation so that it operates against the background of the alterations effected by that legislation and, in particular, those relating to interests in common. Section 3 incorporates many of the definitions from the Law of Property Act 1925 but the important definitions for present purposes are those contained in s 3(xi) (legal estates), (xv) (minor interests) and (xvi) (overriding interests). These are, so far as material, as follows:

(xi) "Legal Estates" mean the estates interests and charges in or over land subsisting or creating at law which are by the Law of Property Act, 1925, authorised to subsist or to be created at law; and "Equitable interests" mean all the other interests and charges in or over land or in the proceeds of sale thereof . . . (xv) "Minor interests" mean the interests not capable of being disposed of or created by registered dispositions and capable of being overridden (whether or not a purchaser has notice thereof) by the proprietors unless protected as provided by this Act, and all rights and interests which are not registered or protected on the register and are not overriding interests, and include—(a) in the case of land held on trust for sale, all interests and powers which are under the Law of Property Act, 1925, capable of being overridden by the trustees for sale, whether or not such interests and powers are so protected [plainly here 'overridden' is used as embracing interests which are overreached under the provisions of s 2 of the Law of Property Act 1925] . . . (xvi) "Overriding interests" mean all the incumbrances, interests, rights, and powers not entered on the register but subject to which registered dispositions are by this Act to take effect . . .

It should perhaps also be mentioned that a charge by way of legal mortgage, with which this appeal is concerned, is defined by reference to the Law of Property Act 1925. Section 2 delimits the estates which are capable of being registered and is, so far as material, in the following terms:

(1) After the commencement of this Act, estates capable of subsisting as legal estates shall be the only interests in land in respect of which a proprietor can be registered and all other interests in registered land (except overriding interests and interests entered on the register at or before such commencement) shall take effect in equity as minor interests, but all interests (except undivided shares in land) entered on the register at such commencement which are not legal estates shall be capable of being dealt with under this Act . . .

There can be seen in the definition of minor interests the same philosophy as is apparent in the Law of Property Act of keeping behind the curtain those interests which are overreached by dispositions by the registered owner. This is again reflected in s 74, which is in the following terms:

'Subject to the provisions of this Act as to settled land, neither the registrar nor any person dealing with a registered estate or charge shall be affected with notice of a trust express implied or constructive, and references to trusts shall, so far as possible, be excluded from the register.'

Again, s 103(1) contains provisions for compelling the registered proprietor to give effect to dispositions which create minor interests capable, if registered, of taking effect as legal estates but subject to the following proviso:

'... (b) So long as the proprietor holds the land on trust for sale, no estate or charge shall be registered in respect of an interest which, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, or otherwise, ought to remain liable to be overridden on the execution of the trust for sale ...'

Section 25 of the Act confers on the registered proprietor the ability to charge the land by way of legal mortgage and the effect of a registered disposition is set out in s 20, which, so far as relevant, is in the following terms:

'(1) In the case of a freehold estate registered with an absolute title, a disposition of the registered land or of a legal estate therein, including a lease thereof, for valuable consideration shall, when registered, confer on the transferee or grantee an estate in fee simple or the term of years absolute or other legal estate expressed to be created in the land dealt with, together with all rights privileges, and appurtenances belonging or appurtenant thereto, including (subject to any entry to the contrary in the register) the appropriate rights and interests which would, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, have been transferred if the land had not been registered, subject—(a) to the incumbrances and other entries, if any, appearing on the register; and (b) unless the contrary is expressed on the register, to the overriding interests, if any, affecting the estate transferred or created, but free from all other estates and interests whatsoever, including estates and interests of His Majesty, and the disposition shall operate in like manner as if the registered transferor or grantor were (subject to any entry to the contrary in the register) entitled to the registered land in fee simple in possession for his own benefit.'

Finally, overriding interests are defined by s 70, which provides, for relevant purposes:

'(1) All registered land shall, unless under the provisions of this Act the contrary is expressed on the register, be deemed to be subject to such of the following overriding interests as may be for the time being subsisting in reference thereto, and such interests shall not be treated as incumbrances within the meaning of this Act, (that is to say) ... (g) The rights of every person in actual occupation of the land or in receipt of the rents and profits thereof, save where enquiry is made of such person and the rights are not disclosed ...'

The respondents' submission, which succeeded in the Court of Appeal, is a very simple one. What is said is that the decision of this House in Boland's case [1980] 2 All ER 408, [1981] AC 487 established the proposition that the interest of a tenant in common in occupation of registered land is, by reason of such occupation, an interest incapable of being overreached by a sale or other disposition of the land, save with the consent of the occupier, that s 70 makes that interest an overriding one and that, accordingly, the disposition by the registered proprietors in favour of the appellants takes effect subject to the right of the respondents to remain in occupation of the house indefinitely notwithstanding that (a) the appellants were specifically exonerated from inquiry into the trusts affecting the rents and profits of land pending sale by s 27 of the Law of Property Act 1925 and (b) the capital moneys raised by the registered proprietors were paid to two trustees in accordance with s 27(2). My Lords, if the first step in this composite proposition be correct, then the remainder follows as a matter of unassailable logic. The Court of Appeal concluded that it was correct by reference to an analysis of the speech of Lord Wilberforce in Boland's case. Dillon LJ accepted that Lord Wilberforce's observations were made in the context of a case where the dealing which was claimed as being subject to an overriding interest in the occupying beneficiary was with a single trustee and would not therefore overreach the beneficiary's interest. But in his view the reasoning did not depend on the fact that in Boland's case there was only one registered proprietor of the land and therefore only one trustee for sale. It concentrated simply on the distinction between a minor interest and an overriding interest, the mere fact of occupation converting what would otherwise be a minor interest into an overriding interest. Thus he found the instant case indistinguishable from Boland's case in any material respect. The proposition is encapsulated in the following short passage from his judgment ([1986] 1 All ER 989 at 994-995, [1986] Ch 605 at 617):

'... the reasoning of Lord Wilberforce concentrates on the distinction between the minor interest and the overriding interest. This necessarily covers the case where there are two registered proprietors and so two trustees for sale, because the wording in the definition of "minor interests" in s 3(xv) of the Land Registration Act 1925—"... in the case of land held on trust for sale, all interests and powers which are under the Law of Property Act, 1925, capable of being overridden by the trustees for sale..." must refer to the case where there are two trustees for sale; indeed, only where there are two (or three or four) trustees for sale would the interests of the beneficiaries be overridden under the Law of Property Act 1925. On a sale what would otherwise have been a minor interest capable of being overridden under the Law of Property Act 1925 by two trustees for sale is, if protected by the fact of actual occupation of the land, elevated to the status of an overriding interest. In my judgment, therefore, the reasoning in Boland covers entirely the position of the Fleggs in the present case. As no inquiry was made of the Fleggs before the plaintiffs took their mortgage on the property, the Fleggs have an overriding interest in the property which binds the plaintiffs.'

The fundamental criticism of this advanced by the appellants is that it fails to analyse the incidents of and limitations on the interest which the court held to override the interest of the appellants. What s 70(1)(g) does is to define as an overriding interest the rights (whatever they may be) of every person in actual occupation and to subject the registered land to such overriding interests 'as may be for the time being subsisting in reference thereto'. It does not create or enlarge rights but merely operates, to use the words of Lord Wilberforce in National Provincial Bank Ltd v Ainsworth [1965] 2 All ER 472 at 502, [1965] AC 1175 at 1260-1261—

'to adapt the system of registration, and the modified form of enquiry which is appropriate to that system, to the same kind of right as under the general law would affect a purchaser finding a person in occupation of his land.'

One may, quoting again from the speech of Lord Wilberforce in the same case ([1965] 2 All ER 472 at 503, [1965] AC 1175 at 1261)—

'have to accept that there is a difference between unregistered land and registered land as regards what kind of notice binds a purchaser, or what kind of enquiries a purchaser has to make. But there is no warrant in the terms of this paragraph or elsewhere in the Act for supposing that the nature of the rights which are to bind a purchaser is to be different, excluding personal rights in one case, including them in another. The whole frame of s. 70, with the list that it gives of interests, or rights, which are overriding, shows that it is made against a background of interests or rights whose nature and whose transmissible character is known, or ascertainable, aliunde, i.e., under other statutes or under the common law.'

With this preliminary caution in mind, therefore, I turn to consider whether, in fact, the decision of this House in Boland's case does lead to the conclusion that the occupying co-owner's interest under the statutory trusts is, by reason of his occupation, one which is incapable of being overreached. It has, I think, to be borne in mind when reading both the judgments in the Court of Appeal in that case and the speeches in this House that they were prepared and delivered against a background of fact which precluded any argument that the interests of Mrs Boland and Mrs Brown had been overreached under the provisions of the Law of Property Act 1925. Equally, the holding, contrary to the argument of the mortgagees, that Mrs Boland and Mrs Brown were in actual occupation ruled out any question of the mortgagees having taken their interest without notice of the occupier's rights, whatever those rights were. The mortgagees in that case were, therefore, quite simply purchasers from the owner of the legal estate with notice of the existence of whatever equitable rights the occupier was entitled to claim. Their claim to take free from them accordingly rested simply and solely on the fact that the land charged happened to be registered land, a feature which enabled them to claim, if they could substantiate it, that the beneficiaries' interests were minor interests and so overridden by a disposition by the registered proprietor. Thus, in the argument for the mortgagees before the Court of Appeal, it was contended that the argument for the appellants involved the proposition that even if two trustees or a trust corporation received the purchase money there would still be an overriding interest (see [1979] Ch 312 at 319). In the argument in reply this was countered by counsel for the appellants who pointed out that the rights of beneficiaries are not overreached by a sale by one trustee. In such a case, s 199 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (relating to notice) applies. Counsel emphasised in this context that there was no inconsistency between the Law of Property Act and the Land Registration Act and went on to point out that the powers of management in s 28 of the Law of Property Act (and, in particular, the power to mortgage contained in s 71 of the Settled Land Act 1925) do not apply to one trustee, who would have no power to borrow money. It is in the light of these arguments that one finds in the judgments of the Court of Appeal specific references to the fact that the transactions there in question were transactions in which the capital money was received by one trustee only, so that the beneficiaries' rights were not overreached (see [1979] 2 All ER 697 at 703-704, 707, 710, 712-713, [1979] Ch 312 at 330, 334, 337, 340-341 per Lord Denning MR, Ormrod and Browne LJ). Dillon LJ in the Court of Appeal regarded these references as merely part of the narrative but I am, for my part, unable to agree. They were, as it seems to me, an essential part of the reasoning on which the judgments were based, for it was a critical feature of the appellants' argument that their interests were not overreached but were kept alive as against the purchaser, by notice in the case of unregistered land or by being overriding interests in the case of registered land. In the argument before your Lordships' House, one finds the same underlying thesis in the respondents' argument and the appellants' argument in reply (see [1981] AC 487 at 498-499, 501). It was, indeed, this feature, namely that in each case the mortgage was effected by a single registered proprietor, which compelled the mortgagees to argue that the beneficiaries' interests in that case fell within the definition of minor interests, that 'minor interests' and 'overriding interests' were mutually exclusive categories and that an interest under a trust for sale was incapable of constituting an overriding interest. They could not deny that they had constructive notice, so that if they were to succeed at all it could only be because the land was registered land and the provisions of s 20(1) of the Act enabled them to take free from minor interests. It is this argument to which the relevant part of Lord Wilberforce's speech was directed and he pointed out at the inception, in considering whether the provisions of s 70(1)(g) could afford protection to the interests of the tenant in common in equity, that the effect of a disposition by two trustees or a trust corporation would be to overreach the trusts, with the result that a purchaser would take free from them, whether or not he had notice (see [1980] 2 All ER 408 at 411, [1981] AC 487 at 503). Thus, the only question, it being common ground that there had not, in fact, been any overreaching, was whether the respondents' interests, although capable of being a overreached by appropriate machinery and so within the definition of minor interests, could also be overriding interests by reason of the beneficiaries' occupation of the land. That question is answered by Lord Wilberforce in the following passage in his speech ([1980] 2 All ER 408 at 414, [1981] AC 487 at 507):

b 'How then are these various rights to be fitted into the scheme of the Land Registration Act 1925? It is clear, at least, that the interests of the co-owners under the "statutory trusts" are minor interests: this fits with the definition in s 3(xv). But I can see no reason why, if these interests, or that of any one of them, are or is protected by "actual occupation" they should remain merely as "minor interests". On the contrary, I see every reason why, in that event, they should acquire the status of overriding interests. And, moreover, I find it easy to accept that they satisfy the opening, and governing, words of s 70, namely, interests subsisting in reference to the land.'

c My Lords, if I may respectfully say so, this is plainly right, but it has to be read in the context of the facts in Boland's case. Quite clearly the interests of the respondents in that case were subsisting. Nothing had occurred which had the effect of overreaching them. I cannot, however, for my part, read Lord Wilberforce's words as applying to a case which was not before the House where the effect of the transaction in question was precisely d that to which he himself had alluded in his outline of the legal framework within which the appeals before the House fell to be decided, that is to say a conveyance by two trustees involving the consequence that the purchaser took free from the trusts regardless of notice.

e Considered in the context of a transaction complying with the statutory requirements of the Law of Property Act 1925 the question of the effect of s 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925 must, in my judgment, be approached by asking, first, what are the 'rights' of the person in occupation and whether they are, at the material time, subsisting in reference to the land. In the instant case the exercise by the registered proprietors of the powers conferred on trustees for sale by s 28(1) of the Law of Property Act 1925 had the effect of overreaching the interests of the respondents under the f statutory trusts on which depended their right to continue in occupation of the land. The appellants took free from those trusts (s 27) and were not, in any event, concerned to see that the respondents' consent to the transaction was obtained (s 26). If, then, one asks what were the subsisting rights of the respondents referable to their occupation, the answer must, in my judgment, be that they were rights which, vis-à-vis the appellants, were, eo instanti with the creation of the charge, overreached and therefore subsisted g only in relation to the equity of redemption. I do not, for my part, find in Boland's case anything which compels a contrary conclusion. Granted that the interest of a co-owner pending the execution of the statutory trust for sale is, despite the equitable doctrine of conversion, an interest subsisting in reference to the land the subject matter of the trust and granted also that Boland's case establishes that such an interest, although falling h within the definition of the minor interest and so liable to be overridden by a registered disposition, will, so long as it subsists, be elevated to the status of an overriding interest if there exists also the additional element of occupation by the co-owner, I cannot for my part accept that, once what I may call the parent interest, by which alone the occupation can be justified, has been overreached and thus subordinated to a legal estate properly created by the trustees under their statutory powers, it can, in relation to the proprietor of the legal estate so created, be any longer said to be a right 'for the time being subsisting'.

j Section 70(1)(g) protects only the rights in reference to the land of the occupier whatever they are at the material time: in the instant case the right to enjoy in specie the rents and profits of the land held in trust for him. Once the beneficiary's rights have been shifted from the land to capital moneys in the hands of the trustees, there is no longer an interest in the land to which the occupation can be referred or which it can protect. If the trustees sell in accordance with the statutory provisions and so overreach the beneficial interests in reference to the land, nothing remains to which a right of occupation can attach, and the same result must, in my judgment, follow vis-à-vis a chargee by way of legal mortgage so long as the transaction is carried out in the manner prescribed by the Law of Property Act 1925, overreaching the beneficial interests by subordinating them to the estate of the chargee, which is no longer 'affected' by them so as to become subject to them on registration pursuant to s 20(1) of the Land Registration Act. In the instant case, therefore, I would, for my part, hold that the charge created in favour of the appellants overreached the beneficial interests of the respondents and that there is nothing in s 70(1)(g) of the Land Registration Act 1925 or in Boland's case which has the effect of preserving against the appellants any rights of the respondents to occupy the land by virtue of their beneficial interests in the equity of redemption which remains vested in the trustees. a

There is a further point which was argued before your Lordships. As already mentioned, the appellants' charge, although executed within the protected period provided by the official search, was not in fact lodged for registration until 26 January 1982, by which time the respondents' caution had been entered on the register. As a result, the appellants have still not been registered as the proprietors of the legal charge in the charges registered. It is submitted on behalf of the respondents that since, under s 20(1) of the Land Registration Act 1925, the legal estate is conferred on a purchaser only when registered, the present position is that there is a contest between two competing equities in which the respondents, as the first in time, are entitled to prevail. I am not persuaded by this argument. The fact is that, whether or not the respondents had an overriding interest, the appellants were and are entitled to be registered. The trustees' power to mortgage the land was exercised when the charge was executed and the money was advanced and it was, under s 28 of the Law of Property Act 1925, at this point that the interests of the appellants was overreached. c

I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the order for possession in favour of the appellants made by his Honour Judge Thomas in the Chancery Division.

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Templeman and Lord Oliver. I agree with them and for the reasons they give I too would allow the appeal and restore the order of his Honour Judge Thomas. f

DILLON, WOOLF AND BINGHAM LJ

5, 26 JUNE 1987

a Damages – Personal injury – Psychiatric damage – Nervous shock caused by damage to property – Plaintiff suffering nervous shock caused by seeing her house on fire – Fire caused by defendants' negligence – Whether defendants liable for plaintiff's psychiatric damage.

b Practice – Preliminary point of law – Question of far-reaching legal principle – Assumed facts – Unsuitability of procedure.

c The plaintiff engaged the defendants to install central heating in her house. While the defendants were carrying out the work the plaintiff returned home one afternoon to see smoke pouring from the loft of the house. She telephoned the fire brigade but by the time they arrived the whole house was on fire and by the time the fire was brought under control over four hours later the house and contents were extensively damaged. The defendants admitted liability for the fire and settled the plaintiff's claim for damage to the house and contents. The plaintiff also claimed damages for nervous shock and psychological reaction caused by seeing her house on fire. The defendants disputed that claim and when the plaintiff issued a writ the question whether the plaintiff's claim gave rise to cause of action sounding in damages was tried as a preliminary issue. The defendants contended (i) that damages for nervous shock could only be recovered, as a matter of law and public policy, if the shock was caused by fear of death or injury to a person closely related to the plaintiff and could not be recovered if the shock was caused merely by damage to property and (ii) that the plaintiff's nervous shock was not reasonably foreseeable as being a direct consequence of the defendants' negligence. The judge gave judgment for the defendants and the plaintiff appealed.

f Held – Damages for nervous shock or psychiatric damage resulting from witnessing the consequences of the defendant's negligence were not limited to psychiatric damage caused by witnessing a personal injury but could be recovered where the plaintiff witnessed the destruction of property, such as his home and possessions, as a result of the defendant's negligence, eg in starting a fire, provided the plaintiff proved psychiatric damage and not merely grief, sorrow or emotional distress and provided that his psychiatric damage was reasonably foreseeable. Whether the plaintiff's psychiatric damage was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the defendants' negligence was a question of fact to be decided at the trial. The plaintiff's appeal would therefore be allowed (see p 458 c to f h j, p 459 a b, p 461 f to p 462 a, p 463 g, p 464 g to j and p 465 a to c, post).

g Hay (or Bourhill) v Young [1942] 2 All ER 396 and McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298 considered.

h Per curiam. Questions of far-reaching legal principle, such as the conditions in which damages can or cannot be recovered as matter of public policy, are not suitable to be determined as preliminary issues on assumed facts (see p 457 h, p 462 a b h to p 463 a, post).

j Per Bingham LJ. 'Nervous shock' is a misleading and inaccurate term; it is preferable to use the term 'psychiatric damage' as comprehending all relevant forms of mental illness, neurosis and personality change (see p 462 d, post).

Appeal

The plaintiff, Madiha Attia, appealed against the decision of Sir Douglas Frank QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court on 19 December 1986, by which he gave judgment for the defendants, British Gas plc, on the trial of a preliminary issue, namely: 'Can the plaintiff recover damages for nervous shock caused by witnessing her home and possessions damaged and/or destroyed by a fire caused by the defendants' negligence while installing central heating in the plaintiff's home?' The facts are set out in the judgment of Dillon LJ. d

Janet Turner for the defendants. e

26 June. The following judgments were delivered.

DILLON LJ. This is an appeal by the plaintiff in the action against a decision of Sir Douglas Frank QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court in the Queen's Bench Division, which was given on 19 December 1986 by way of the determination of a preliminary issue in the action. f

As to the facts, in the summer of 1981 the plaintiff, lived (as I apprehend she still does) at 11 Leaver Gardens, Greenford, Middlesex and the defendants, British Gas, were engaged to install central heating there. When she was returning home at about 4 pm on 1 July 1981 she saw smoke coming from the loft of the house. She telephoned the fire brigade but, by the time the firemen arrived, the whole house was on fire and it took the firemen over four hours to get the fire under control. Obviously the house and its contents were extensively damaged. g

The defendants admit that the fire was caused by their negligence, i.e. by the carelessness of their employees who were working at the house, and we were told that the plaintiff's claims for damage to the house itself and its contents have been settled. In this action the plaintiff's only claim is for a different type of damage, namely damages for nervous shock; by this is meant that, although she did not suffer any physical injury, the plaintiff, as the result of seeing her home and its contents ablaze, has suffered a psychiatric or mental illness, the effects of which are set out in some detail in her statement of claim. h

The defendants dispute this claim of the plaintiffs, but in order to save costs, especially as the plaintiff has legal aid, the parties agreed, and the master ordered, that the following question should be set down for determination as a preliminary issue, namely: i

'Can the plaintiff recover damages for nervous shock caused by witnessing her home and possessions damaged and/or destroyed by a fire caused by the defendants' negligence while installing central heating in the plaintiff's home?'

For the purpose of this preliminary issue, the facts alleged in the statement of claim are to be assumed to be true; in particular it is to be assumed that the plaintiff has suffered a psychiatric illness which was caused by the shock of seeing her home and its contents ablaze. Causation does not therefore have to be considered on the preliminary issue, although it will have to be considered at the trial if the preliminary issue is not answered in the negative, as the defendants would wish. The defendants say on the preliminary issue that the plaintiff cannot succeed in this action for either of two reasons, namely

- (1) that it was not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff might suffer any psychiatric illness as a result of the defendants' negligence in starting the fire or
- (2) that, even if it was reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff might suffer psychiatric illness, damages for 'nervous shock' can, as a matter of law and public policy, only be recovered if the shock was caused by the death or injury of a person, or by fear of the death or injury of a person, normally a person closely related to the plaintiff, and cannot be recovered if it was merely caused by injury to property.

The preliminary issue was raised to test these two contentions of the defendants. The deputy judge decided in favour of the defendants on the first contention and therefore dismissed the action. The plaintiff now appeals.

The law as to 'nervous shock' has recently been considered very carefully and helpfully by the House of Lords in McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298, [1983] 1 AC 410 and by the High Court of Australia in Jaensch v Coffey (1984) 54 ALR 417. In McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298 at 311, [1983] 1 AC 410 at 431 Lord Bridge said:

'The common law gives no damages for the emotional distress which any normal person experiences when someone he loves is killed or injured. Anxiety and depression are normal human emotions. Yet an anxiety neurosis or a reactive depression may be recognisable psychiatric illnesses, with or without psychosomatic symptoms. So, the first hurdle which a plaintiff claiming damages of the kind in question must surmount is to establish that he is suffering, not merely grief, distress or any other normal emotion, but a positive psychiatric illness.'

The plaintiff accepts this statement of the law, and accordingly it is claimed that what she has suffered, as described in the statement of claim, amounts to a positive psychiatric illness. Where exactly the line is to be drawn between possibly extravagant grief, distress or other normal emotion and a positive psychiatric illness may perhaps be difficult to discern in what may for all I know be a matter of degree; but that is a matter for the trial and does not arise on the preliminary issue.

In the next place it is to be assumed that the plaintiff is of a normal disposition or toughness, possessing, as it has been put in the cases, 'the customary phlegm'. Whatever the position may be at the trial, on this preliminary issue we are not concerned with the possibility of it being shown that she has suffered psychiatric illness because, although the defendants did not know and she herself may not have known, she was particularly or 'abnormally' susceptible to some form of psychiatric illness.

A third point which emerges from the cases cited is that damage for 'nervous shock', ie for psychiatric illness occasioned by shock, is regarded as a separate head of damage, distinct, for example, from damage for personal injury. The law has developed step by step and is still developing. In those circumstances I would be particularly reluctant to lay down any general rule as to the conditions in which such damages can or cannot be recovered as a matter of public policy. For that reason the procedure of a preliminary issue on assumed facts, somewhat briefly stated, has disadvantages where what is under consideration is how the law should develop in a matter of some general importance.

That said, however, as appears from the speeches in McLoughlin v O'Brian and the judgments in Jaensch v Coffey, a great deal of the difficulty which has been felt over the development of the law as to damages for 'nervous shock' has arisen in relation to what, in the terminology of the tort of negligence, is described as the question of proximity. How far is it right that the law should allow a claim for damages against a wrongdoer, where the wrong done by the wrongdoer was primarily a wrong done to someone other than the claimant, and the claimant is a person of whom, at the relevant time, the wrongdoer had no knowledge and who may then have been far away from the scene of the wrongdoer's act? This difficulty is particularly concerned with whether the wrongdoer owed any duty of care to the claimant. But that difficulty does not arise in the present case because in the present case there is no problem of proximity. The defendants knew about the plaintiff and unquestionably owed a duty of care to her not to start a fire in her house. If her claims for damage to the house and contents had not been settled, she would have brought the one action against the defendants in which she would have pleaded the negligence of the defendants in starting the fire and would have gone on to assert that, by reason thereof, she had suffered and was suffering damage and loss, which would be put under two headings, namely (1) damage to the house and contents and (2) damage for nervous shock. The issues at the trial, assuming the facts pleaded, including the psychiatric illness, were proved, would have been (a) causation and (b) foreseeability of the damage as a question of remoteness. I can see no good reason why, in such a context, the law should have refused to allow her damages for 'nervous shock' if she could get over the hurdles of causation and foreseeability as an aspect of remoteness. It cannot make any difference that in the event her claim for damage to the house and contents has been settled; the duty was none the less there.

I am not therefore prepared to hold that the fact that the shock which caused the plaintiff's assumed psychiatric illness was caused by damage to property must preclude her from recovering damages for 'nervous shock' even if it was reasonably foreseeable that she might suffer psychiatric illness as a consequence of the defendants' negligence in causing the fire in her house.

Are the defendants right, then, in asserting a priori that it was not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff might suffer any psychiatric illness as a result of their negligence in starting the fire? It is not necessary that any particular psychiatric illness should have been foreseen.

Whether it was reasonably foreseeable to the reasonable man, whether a reasonable onlooker, or, in the context of the present case, a reasonable gas fitter employed by the defendants to work in the plaintiff's house, is to be decided, not on the evidence of psychiatrists as to the degree of probability that the particular cause would produce the particular effect in a person of normal disposition or customary phlegm, but by the judge, relying on his own opinion of the operation of cause and effect in psychiatric medicine, treating himself as the reasonable man, and forming his own view from the primary facts as to whether the chain of cause and effect was reasonably foreseeable (see McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298 at 312, [1983] 1 AC 410 at 432 per Lord Bridge). The good sense of the judge is, it would seem, to be enlightened by progressive awareness of mental illness ([1982] 2 All ER 298 at 320, [1983] 1 AC 410 at 443 per Lord Bridge). One consequence of this approach is, however, that the view of the courts as to what is reasonably foreseeable is, in this field, likely to lag behind informed medical opinion. Another consequence is that a view which finds favour with the courts at one time may well be considered unacceptable and out of date a few years later when progressive awareness has progressed further.

The question which the deputy judge asked himself in the present case was whether it was readily foreseeable by the defendants that the ordinary householder exposed to the experience undergone by the plaintiff might break down under the shock of the event and suffer psychiatric illness as opposed to grief and sorrow at losing one's home. If 'reasonably' is substituted for 'readily', as the judge probably intended, I would for my part indorse that as a correct direction. It is not, however, a test of probability as opposed to possibility.

Was the damage, in the way of psychiatric illness from shock, although of a different kind from the damage to the house itself and contents most obviously foreseeable, none the less itself foreseeable? Would the reasonable man, endowed with appropriately progressive awareness of mental illness, have regarded the danger of psychiatric illness from shock as so fantastic or far-fetched that he would have paid no attention to it or would he have thought that it was something that the plaintiff might suffer from seeing her house and its contents in flames?

a That, if the house caught fire from the defendants' workmen's fault, the plaintiff would see and hear it burning was foreseeable. But how much she saw and heard, and how extensive was the damage to or destruction of the house and contents by the fire we are left to guess at on this preliminary issue. We are asked to say, in effect, that psychiatric illness caused by the shock can never, as a matter of fact rather than law, be a foreseeable consequence when a woman sees her home and its contents burning down. I am not prepared to make any such general a priori ruling on such scanty material. Whether the plaintiff's assumed illness caused by the shock was or was not a foreseeable consequence of the defendants' negligence must depend on the actual evidence given at the trial.

b Accordingly, I would allow this appeal, set aside the order of the deputy judge and leave this action to proceed to trial.

c It follows that the attempt to decide this action on a preliminary issue has, in my judgment, failed. But, in view of the expense and delays of litigation at the present time and of the difficult position of a defendant who is not legally aided when sued by a legally-aided plaintiff, I would not for my part criticise the parties' advisers at all for making the attempt.

d WOOLF LJ. There have now been a series of decisions by courts of the highest authority both in this country and in the Commonwealth dealing with the problems created by actions for damages where the plaintiff is seeking to recover compensation for psychiatric illness due to what has been colloquially called 'nervous shock'. On this appeal counsel on both sides relied on two of these decisions, namely the decision of the House of Lords in McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298, [1983] AC 410 and the decision of the High Court of Australia in Jaensch v Coffey (1984) 54 ALR 417. However, the circumstances giving rise to the preliminary issue with which this appeal is concerned differ from the circumstances of those two decisions in two significant respects.

e The first difference is that in those two decisions the plaintiff was contending that she suffered her injuries because she had learnt that members of her family had been involved in a serious accident as a result of which they had either been killed or seriously injured while in this case no one had suffered any personal injury. The plaintiff alleges that her injury was caused in consequence of her seeing her home, of which she was proud, on fire, a fire which continued to burn for over four hours before the fire was brought under control by the fire brigade.

f The second difference is that in both of the earlier decisions the plaintiff had not witnessed the accident which caused the injuries to their respective families and the judgments therefore focused on the question as to whether the plaintiffs were owed a duty of care by the defendants, it being contended by both defendants that it could not be foreseen that their acts could injure the plaintiffs. However, in this case undoubtedly the defendants owed a duty of care to the plaintiff in respect of the damage which was caused to her home and indeed she has been compensated for this damage. Furthermore, g if the plaintiff, who entered the house to telephone the fire brigade, had been physically injured, as could have happened, then in relation to that physical injury the defendants would have owed her a duty of care and she would be entitled to be compensated by them for that injury. The problem raised by the preliminary issue is therefore whether the damage actually alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff is too remote and is not whether there was a breach of a duty of care. The distinction between the two situations was discussed in eloquent terms by Denning LJ in King v Phillips [1953] 1 All ER 617 at 622-623, [1953] 1 QB 429 at 439:

'What is the reasoning which admits a cause of action for negligence if the injured person is actually struck, but declines it if he only suffers from shock? I cannot see why the duty of a driver should differ according to the nature of the injury. I should have thought that every driver was under a plain duty which he owed to everyone in the vicinity. He ought to drive with reasonable care. If he drives negligently with the result that a bystander is injured, then his breach of duty is the same, no matter whether the injury is a wound or is emotional shock. Only the damage is different. The bystander may be so close as to be put in fear for himself, or he may be just a little way off and be shocked by fear for the safety of others. In either case he has been injured by the driver's negligence. If you view the duty of care in this way, and yet refuse to allow a bystander to recover for shock, it is not because there was no duty owed to him, nor because it was not caused by the negligence of the driver, but simply because it is too remote to be admitted as a head of damage. A different result is reached by viewing the driver's duty differently. Instead of saying simply that his duty is to drive with reasonable care, you say that his duty is to avoid injury which he can reasonably foresee, or, rather, to use reasonable care to avoid it. Then you draw a distinction between physical injury and emotional injury, and impose a different duty on him in regard to each kind of injury, with the inevitable result that you are driven to say there are two different torts, one tort when he can foresee physical injury, another tort when he can foresee emotional injury. I do not think that is right. There is one wrong only, the wrong of negligence. I know that damage to person and damage to property are for historical reasons regarded as different torts, but that does not apply to physical injury and emotional injury. LORD WRIGHT clearly treated impact and shock as one cause of action when he said in Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young ([1942] 2 All ER 405, [1943] AC 92 at 109): "The man who negligently allows a horse to bolt, or a car to run at large down a steep street, or a savage beast to escape is committing a breach of duty towards every person who comes within the range of foreseeable danger, whether by impact or shock . . ." The true principle, as I see it, is this. Every driver can and should foresee that, if he drives negligently, he may injure somebody in the vicinity in some way or other, and he must be responsible for all the injuries which he does in fact cause by his negligence to anyone in the vicinity, whether they are wounds or shocks, unless they are too remote in law to be recovered. If he does by his negligence in fact cause injury by shock, then he should be liable for it unless he is exempted on the ground of remoteness.'

The position must be the same if, instead of causing a traffic accident, what is being considered is causing a fire at someone's home. Later in the same judgment Denning LJ went on to say that whether the issue was one of duty of care or remoteness of damage, 'since Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young the test of liability for shock is foreseeability of injury by shock'. This dictum was expressly indorsed by Viscount Simonds when giving the judgment of the House of Lords in Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v Morts Dock and Engineering Co Ltd, The Wagon Mound (No 1) [1961] 1 All ER 404 at 415, [1961] AC 388 at 426.

However, notwithstanding the fact that the test both in the case of breach of duty and remoteness is foreseeability, it is helpful to identify the true nature of the problem in considering the two reasons relied on by the defendants for saying that it is possible on this preliminary issue to decide that the plaintiff cannot succeed in her action. Those reasons are (1) that the defendants could not reasonably foresee that, as a result of their being responsible for starting the fire, the plaintiff would suffer psychiatric injury and (2) that in any event as a matter of policy the law does not allow damages for psychiatric injury to be recovered in the absence of personal injury either to the plaintiff or a member of her family.

In Jaensch v Coffey (1984) 54 ALR 417 at 427 Brennan J, in a judgment in which he helpfully analysed virtually all the authorities on recovering damages for 'nervous shock', with regard to the test of foreseeability referred to the present rule in negligence as being that stated by Lord Reid in The Heron II, Koufos v C Czarnikow Ltd [1967] 3 All ER 686, [1969] 1 AC 350. In that case Lord Reid was considering foreseeability in the context of remoteness of damage. He said ([1967] 3 All ER 686 at 692, [1969] 1 AC 350 at 385):

a 'The defendant will be liable for any type of damage which is reasonably foreseeable as liable to happen even in the most unusual case, unless the risk is so small that a reasonable man would in the whole circumstances feel justified in neglecting it ...'

In the same case a similar approach was adopted by Lord Upjohn, who said ([1967] 3 All ER 686 at 715-716, [1969] 1 AC 350 at 422):

b 'The test in tort, as now developed in the authorities, is that the tortfeasor is liable for any damage which he can reasonably foresee may happen as a result of the breach however unlikely it may be, unless it can be brushed aside as far fetched.'

In deciding the preliminary issue in favour of the defendants Sir Douglas Frank (before whom the issue was argued, as it was before this court, on the basis that it raised a question of duty of care) said:

c 'It is widely recognised that the burning of one's home can be a frightening experience and can give rise to a sense of grief and sorrow at the loss of all that is embodied in the word "home" and of one's possessions. It can result in great inconvenience and sometimes hardship. Nevertheless, the loss of possessions from various causes happens to a large proportion of the population. A burglary can not only result in the loss of valued and irreplaceable possessions but to some people it is a traumatic and frightening experience. Nevertheless, in my judgment the ordinary householder endures such incidents and the shock of them without suffering mental illness. I think that the same applies to nervous shock caused by a fire, albeit in one's own house, unless the fire caused injury which in turn triggered off the nervous shock. That is where I would draw the line. In my judgment, therefore, it was not reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff would suffer mental illness as a result of the defendants' negligence and this action fails.'

Especially if the question of foreseeability is approached in the manner indicated by Lord Reid, as I consider it should be, the deputy judge was not entitled to come to this conclusion. I can conceive of circumstances where it would be readily foreseeable that f intense distress would be caused to an 'ordinary householder' who saw her home being destroyed by fire particularly if the process was as protracted as it appears to have been on the basis of the facts set out in the statement of claim, which for the purpose of the determination of the issue have to be assumed to be true. Such distress could well be of the order of the 'acute emotional trauma [which], like a physical trauma, can well cause a psychiatric illness in a wide range of circumstances and in a wide range of individuals' g (see Lord Bridge in McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298 at 312, [1983] 1 AC 410 at 433).

It appears from the passage which I have quoted that the deputy judge came to his decision in favour of the defendants not only on the basis of foreseeability but also as a matter of policy in accordance with the second ground relied on by the defendants. With regard to this part of Sir Douglas Frank's judgment, differing views were taken by the members of the House of Lords in McLoughlin v O'Brian and by the members of the High Court of Australia in Jaensch v Coffey on the question whether, if the injury was foreseeable, liability could be excluded as a matter of policy. Fortunately, for the purposes of this appeal I do not consider that it is necessary to resolve this divergence of opinion. Even assuming that the test is not confined to being one of foreseeability, I cannot conceive that, if the injury which the plaintiff alleges that she suffered was a foreseeable consequence of the defendants' negligence, there could be any overriding policy reason for preventing her recovering damages. As I have already pointed out, she could well have sustained physical injuries as well as the psychiatric injuries of which she complains when she would have been entitled to damages and in my view there can be no reason of policy for distinguishing between the two types of injury.

In agreement therefore with the judgments of Dillon and Bingham LJ, which I have had the advantage of seeing in draft, I would allow this appeal. I would also not determine finally the preliminary issue in favour of the plaintiff on the facts before this court. Like Dillon and Bingham LJ, I consider that it is preferable that an issue of this sort should only be determined after the court has had an opportunity of exploring all the relevant facts as to liability. The statement of claim which contains the only facts before this court only indicates in outline the circumstances in which the plaintiff sustained her injuries. While the facts which are before this court do not disclose a situation where as a matter of law the plaintiff cannot succeed, whether she is entitled to succeed should only be finally determined after a trial.

BINGHAM LJ. The plaintiff's claim pleaded in this action is a simple one. She alleges that the defendants were installing central heating in her house and that a fire occurred as a result of the defendants' negligent work. This the defendants admit. The plaintiff further pleads that she returned home to see smoke coming from the loft of the house and then witnessed the burning of the house for over four hours until the fire was brought under control. This experience, she alleges, caused her 'nervous shock in the form of a serious psychological reaction evidenced by an anxiety state and depression'.

Her claim is accordingly one for what have in the authorities and the literature been called damages for nervous shock. Judges have in recent years become increasingly reticent at the use of this misleading and inaccurate expression, and I shall use the general expression 'psychiatric damage', intending to comprehend within it all relevant forms of mental illness, neurosis and personality change. But the train of events (all of which must be causally related) with which this action, like its predecessors, is concerned remains unchanged: careless conduct on the part of the defendant causing actual or apprehended injury to the plaintiff or a person other than the defendant; the suffering of acute mental or emotional trauma by the plaintiff on witnessing or apprehending that injury or witnessing its aftermath; psychiatric damage suffered by the plaintiff.

There is, however, one respect in which this case differs from all the decided cases, or almost all: Owens v Liverpool Corp [1938] 4 All ER 727, [1939] 1 KB 394 would appear to be an exception. Although the plaintiff suffered injury in that her home and presumably her possessions were burned and damaged, it is not said that she was at any time in fear for her own personal safety or that of anyone else, nor is it said that physical injury (as opposed to the psychiatric damage of which she complains) was suffered by anyone. It was no doubt this singular feature of the case which led the parties to agree to the trial of a preliminary issue:

'Can the plaintiff recover damages for nervous shock caused by witnessing her home and possessions damaged and/or destroyed by a fire caused by the defendants' negligence while installing central heating in the plaintiff's home?'

The parties are not to be criticised for adopting a procedure which they conscientiously believed would save costs and time. But it would, I think, have been better if the action had proceeded to trial, at any rate on liability, perhaps leaving the assessing of damages, if any, to a later date. For I think that there are, within the issue set down for trial, two distinct questions. One is a question of far-reaching legal principle: is a claim for damages for psychiatric damage suffered by one who has witnessed the destruction of her property, in the absence of any actual or apprehended physical injury, one that must necessarily fail as a matter of law? In the light of such illustrious precedents as Donoghue (or M'Alister) v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1 and Dorset Yacht Co Ltd v Home Office [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004, questions such as this cannot be regarded as unsuitable for determination on (in effect) demurrer. But there is in this case a special feature to which I shall return, namely a pre-existing relationship between the defendants as contractors and the plaintiff as occupant of a house in which they were working. I would be happier deciding even this legal question against a background of full and

- a proven, rather than outline and assumed, facts. The second question is much more limited. It is whether on the facts pleaded it was reasonably foreseeable by the defendants that careless performance of their work might cause psychiatric damage to the plaintiff. This is a question of fact which, for reasons I shall give, cannot in my view be fairly decided at this stage.

The question of principle

- b As Lord Russell pointed out in Hay (or Bourhill) v Young [1942] 2 All ER 396 at 401, [1943] AC 92 at 101, what the defendant ought to have contemplated as a reasonable man is relevant both to testing the existence of a duty as the foundation of alleged negligence and to the question of remoteness of damage. The leading cases on psychiatric damage have very largely concentrated on examining what was reasonably foreseeable by the defendant in order to determine whether the careless defendant owed a duty of care to the particular plaintiff at all. This is understandable and perhaps inevitable. A defendant, however careless, cannot owe a duty of care towards the whole world. It is accordingly necessary to apply the tests of proximity and foreseeability derived from Lord Atkin's classic statement in Donoghue v Stevenson in order to define the class to whom the defendant owes a duty and decide whether the plaintiff falls within it. This is a particularly necessary exercise in the psychiatric damage cases, where the defendant will ordinarily have no awareness of the plaintiff as an individual before the act of carelessness occurs. Unless, therefore, it can be shown that the plaintiff is a person who is so closely and directly affected by the defendant's act that he ought reasonably to have him or her in contemplation as being so affected when he directs his mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question, the plaintiff cannot surmount the first hurdle which confronts any plaintiff in negligence, that of establishing a duty of care.
- e In this case the problem is somewhat different. Since the defendants were working in the house where the plaintiff lived, it must have been obvious to them that she would be so closely and directly affected by their performance of their work that they ought reasonably to have had her in contemplation as being so affected when they carried out the work. It is not, I think, contested that the defendants owed her a duty to take reasonable care to carry out the work so as to avoid damaging her home and property.
- f But it is said that the defendants owed her no duty to take reasonable care to carry out the work so as to avoid causing her psychiatric damage. This analytical approach cannot, I think, be said to be wrong, but it seems to me to be preferable, where a duty of care undeniably exists, to treat the question as one of remoteness and ask whether the plaintiff's psychiatric damage is too remote to be recoverable because it was not reasonably foreseeable as a consequence of the defendants' careless conduct. The test of reasonable foreseeability is, as I understand it, the same in both contexts, and the result should be the same on either approach. So the question in any case such as this, applying the ordinary test of remoteness in tort, is whether the defendant should reasonably have contemplated psychiatric damage to the plaintiff as a real, even if unlikely, result of careless conduct on his part.
- g
- h McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298, [1983] AC 410 is the most recent House of Lords authority on psychiatric damage and the ratio of that decision is of course binding upon us. All members of the House were agreed that for the plaintiff in that case to succeed it was necessary for her to show that the psychiatric damage which she in fact suffered was a reasonably foreseeable result of the defendant's careless driving. A minority of the House (Lord Scarman and Lord Bridge) held that that, if causation was established,
- j was all that the plaintiff need show and that it was not for the courts on policy grounds to limit a right to recover for reasonably foreseeable psychiatric damage caused by the defendant. Lord Wilberforce and Lord Edmund-Davies, although agreeing in the result, rejected the contention that reasonable foreseeability was the sole test of liability for the consequences of wrongdoing. It was, they held, proper for the courts to limit on grounds of policy, within the larger class of those to whom psychiatric damage was reasonably foreseeable, the class of those to whom a duty of care should be held to be owed. Lord Russell accepted policy as something which might in an appropriate case feature in a judicial decision, but saw no policy requirement to restrict the plaintiff's right to recover on the facts of that case. The majority ratio of this decision is, therefore, if I have correctly understood their Lordships' speeches, that reasonable foreseeability of psychiatric damage to the plaintiff is a necessary condition of a successful claim, but that even where reasonable foreseeability of such damage is shown a right to recover may be denied on grounds of policy.

Whether the psychiatric damage suffered by this plaintiff as a result of the carelessness of the defendants was reasonably foreseeable is not something which can be decided as a question of law. In considering the present question of principle reasonable foreseeability must for the present be assumed in the plaintiff's favour. So the question is whether, assuming everything else in the plaintiff's favour, this court should hold this claim to be bad in law because the mental or emotional trauma which precipitated the plaintiff's psychiatric damage was caused by her witnessing the destruction of her home and property rather than apprehending or witnessing personal injury or the consequences of personal injury.

It is submitted, I think rightly, that this claim breaks new ground. No analogous claim has ever, to my knowledge, been upheld or even advanced. If, therefore, it were proper to erect a doctrinal boundary stone at the point which the onward march of recorded decisions has so far reached, we should answer the question of principle in the negative and dismiss the plaintiff's action, as the deputy judge did. But I should for my part erect the boundary stone with a strong presentiment that it would not be long before a case would arise so compelling on its facts as to cause the stone to be moved to a new and more distant resting place. The suggested boundary line is not, moreover, one that commends itself to me as either fair or convenient. Examples which arose in argument illustrate the point. Suppose, for example, that a scholar's life's work of research or composition were destroyed before his eyes as a result of a defendant's careless conduct, causing the scholar to suffer reasonably foreseeable psychiatric damage. Or suppose that a householder returned home to find that his most cherished possessions had been destroyed through the carelessness of an intruder in starting a fire or leaving a tap running, causing reasonably foreseeable psychiatric damage to the owner. I do not think a legal principle which forbade recovery in these circumstances could be supported. The only policy argument relied on as justifying or requiring such a restriction was the need to prevent a proliferation of claims, the familiar floodgates argument. This is not an argument to be automatically discounted. But nor is it, I think, an argument which can claim a very impressive record of success. All depends on one's judgment of the likely result of a particular extension of the law. I do not myself think that refusal by this court to lay down the legal principle for which the defendants contend, or (put positively) our acceptance that a claim such as the plaintiff's may in principle succeed, will lead to a flood of claims or actions, let alone a flood of successful claims or actions. Insistence that psychiatric damage must be reasonably foreseeable, coupled with clear recognition that a plaintiff must prove psychiatric damage as I have defined it, and not merely grief, sorrow or emotional distress, will in my view enable the good sense of the judge to ensure (adopting Lord Wright's language in Hay (or Bourhill) v Young [1942] 2 All ER 396 at 405-406, [1943] AC 92 at 110) that the thing stops at the appropriate point. His good sense provides a better, because more flexible, mechanism of control than a necessarily arbitrary rule of law.

I would therefore answer this broad question of principle in favour of the plaintiff.

The question of fact

We were asked to determine, assuming the truth of the facts pleaded, whether psychiatric damage to the plaintiff was reasonably foreseeable by the defendants. This might fairly have been done in McLoughlin v O'Brian, where the plaintiff was the mother, or in Jaensch v Coffey (1984) 54 ALR 417, where the plaintiff was the wife, of the alleged tortfeasor's immediate victim, although in each of those cases there was a full trial. But one must be very cautious in determining questions of fact on assumed facts, and the risk of doing so unfairly to one side or the other is increased where, as here, the parties were by no means strangers to each other before the careless act occurred. In deciding what the defendants should reasonably have foreseen I would wish to have a much fuller picture than pleadings can give of the plaintiff's personality and circumstances as manifested to, and known by, the defendants. I therefore decline to answer this question because I do not think it is fairly answerable on existing materials at this stage.

I am accordingly of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. The case should be remitted to a judge for trial of all live issues related to reasonable foreseeability, causation and damage on the footing that, if the plaintiff succeeds on all these issues, her claim may in principle be upheld. Whether the parties wish to defer the assessment of damages, if any, is a question for them.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Business Computers International Ltd v Registrar of Companies and others

CHANCERY DIVISION

SCOTT J

18, 19 JUNE 1987

Negligence – Duty to take care – Litigation – Conduct of litigation – Defendant serving winding-up petition on company – Petition served at wrong address – Company wound up without knowing of winding-up proceedings – Company subsequently incurring costs in setting aside order and suffering damage to reputation – Company claiming damages for defendant's negligence in serving petition at wrong address – Whether defendant owing duty of care to company in relation to service of petition – Whether litigant owing duty of care to another litigant in conduct of litigation.

The second defendant, which claimed to be the assignee of a debt owed by the plaintiff company, presented a petition to wind up the plaintiff company based on its failure to pay the alleged debt. The petition was duly advertised but served at the wrong address, so that the plaintiff company was unaware of it. The petition came before the Companies Court and a winding-up order was made. When the plaintiff discovered that the winding-up order had been made, it applied to have it set aside. The plaintiff then claimed damages against, inter alios, the second defendant for negligence in serving the petition at the incorrect address and subsequently advertising a petition which had not been duly served. The plaintiff alleged that the second defendant, as petitioner, owed it a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that the registered office of the plaintiff was correctly stated in the petition, that the matters in the petition were properly verified and that the petition was properly served at the plaintiff's registered office. The plaintiff claimed damages, including costs of over £8,000 incurred in having the winding-up order set aside, expenditure of over £90,000 in promoting its existing name or alternatively devising, promoting and publicising another trading name by reason of having to abandon its existing name, and damages for loss of goodwill in its existing name. The second defendant applied to have the claim struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. a

Held – A litigant did not owe a duty of care to another litigant regarding the manner in which the litigation was conducted, whether in regard to service of process or any other step in the proceedings, since the safeguards against impropriety in the conduct of litigation were to be found in the rules and procedure that controlled litigation rather than tortious remedies. Since the damage suffered by the plaintiff was caused by the legal process instituted by the defendant and the winding-up order of the court, such damage was not remediable in an action based on negligence, and the statement of claim would be struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action against the second defendant (see p 472 f to j and p 473 e to h, post). b

Motion

By writ of summons issued on 4 February 1987 the plaintiff, the Business Computers International Ltd, claimed damages for negligence against the defendants, the Registrar of Companies, Alex Lawrie Factors Ltd, Monorell Ltd, Noleen Mullins and ICC Information Group Ltd. By notice of motion dated 10 April 1987 the second defendant applied to the court for an order that the plaintiff's claim against it be struck out on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The facts are set out in the judgment. i 19 June. The following judgment was delivered.

SCOTT J. I have before me an application by the second defendant, Alex Lawrie Factors Ltd, that the claim made against it by the plaintiff, Business Computers International Ltd, be struck out on the ground that the claim discloses no reasonable cause of action.

The circumstances which give rise to the claim are unusual. The second defendant claimed to be the assignee of a debt owed by the plaintiff. On 11 June 1986 the second defendant presented a petition to wind up the plaintiff. The petition was based on the plaintiff's failure to pay the alleged debt. In the petition the plaintiff's registered office was stated to be '65, Castleton Avenue, Wembley'. The second defendant served the petition at 65 Castleton Avenue, Wembley. Subsequently the petition was advertised. On 21 July 1986 the petition came before the Companies Court. Nobody appeared for the plaintiff, and the usual winding-up order was made. 65 Castleton Avenue was not in fact the registered office of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's registered office was at 5-7 Singer Street, London EC2. The circumstances which gave rise to the error in the petition and to the service of the petition at 65 Castleton Avenue are not relevant to the application before me. Suffice it to say that the other defendants in the plaintiff's action include the Registrar of Companies, Monorell Ltd, whose registered office was at the material time 65 Castleton Avenue, and one of the directors of Monorell Ltd.

Having learnt of the winding-up order the plaintiff at once applied to the Companies Court for the order to be set aside. The order was set aside. The plaintiff contends that it has suffered damage caused by the winding-up order.

The writ in this action was issued on 4 February 1987 and was accompanied by a statement of claim. I will read the paragraphs of the statement of claim that plead the plaintiff's case against the second defendant:

g

'4(a) On or about 26th June 1985 the Plaintiff duly presented to the Registrar Form 4A dated 26th June 1985 notifying the Registrar that its registered office was 5/7 Singer Street, London EC2 (being the office of the Plaintiff's accountants). . . Such forms were all duly recorded by the Registrar. . . 9 The Second Defendant is

h

and was at all material times a company engaged in the business of debt factoring. 10 At the material time the Second Defendant believed that there had been assigned to it by Trinitec Limited a debt owed to Trinitec by the Plaintiff. (The Plaintiff disputes that the debt to Trinitec was in fact owed by the Plaintiff but such dispute is not material to these proceedings). 11 On a date unknown to the Plaintiff, the Second Defendant acting by itself or its agent, searched in the Plaintiff's Register at the Companies Registry and recorded the registered office of the Plaintiff as being 65 Castleton Avenue, Wembley, Middlesex. . . 13 On the 11 June 1986 the Second Defendant presented a Petition for the compulsory winding up of the Plaintiff, based upon the aforesaid alleged debt. In so doing, the Second Defendant owed a duty to the Plaintiff to take reasonable steps to ensure that the registered office of the Plaintiff was correctly stated in the Petition, that the matters alleged in the Petition could be conscientiously verified and that the Petition was properly served on the Plaintiff's registered office. 14 In the Petition it was falsely alleged that the Plaintiff's registered office was 65 Castleton Street. The Second Defendant then purported to serve the Petition at 65 Castleton Avenue aforesaid and subsequently advertised the Petition. 15 The Petition did not come to the notice of the Plaintiff prior to its hearing in High Court of Justice on 21st July 1986 at which hearing it was ordered, in the absence of the Plaintiff, that the Plaintiff should be compulsorily wound up. 16 On 23rd July 1986 the Plaintiff first became aware of the Petition and that a winding up order had been made against it when it was so informed by the Official Receiver acting as provisional liquidator of the Plaintiff. . . 20 In acting as pleaded in para 14 above the Second Defendant acted negligently and in breach of its duty pleaded in Para 13 above . . .

Particulars of Negligence

(1) If the Second Defendant made its only search prior to 21st May 1986, failing to search the Register at a time immediately before presentation of the Petition (at which time the Plaintiff's registered office was correct). (2) If the Second Defendant made its only or any search after 21st May 1986, recording or confirming the Plaintiff's registered office incorrectly from Form 9B instead of from the then correct Form 4A, alternatively failing to appreciate that the Plaintiff's Registered Office was 5-7 Singer Street. (3) Whenever the Second Defendant searched, failing to observe that the registered office of 65 Castleton Avenue was for a company with a completely different name from the Plaintiff's, without any change of name having been registered, and to query the correctness of the supposed registered office. (4) Whenever the Second Defendant searched, failing to observe the inconsistencies in the documentation on the Plaintiff's Register and to query the correctness of the supposed registered office. (5) In any event verifying the Petition in the circumstances mentioned above. (6) In any event and in all the circumstances serving the Petition on an address which was not even purportedly the Plaintiff's registered office and had not been since 21st May 1986, either at all, or alternatively without a fresh search, or alternatively without enquiry or notification to the address previously shown as the Plaintiff's registered office namely 5-7 Singer Street.

21 By reason of the negligence of the Registrar or of the Second, Third, Fourth and/or Fifth Defendants or some one or more of them, the Plaintiff has suffered loss and damage including at least the following items.

Particulars of Damage

(1) Costs incurred in connection with application to prevent perfection of the winding up order and to rescind the same, including legal fees and accountant's fees, amounting to not less than £8,197.50. (2) Wasted expenditure on promoting and publicising the name of "Business Computers International", alternatively expenditure incurred in devising, promoting and publicising an alternative trading name to "Business Computers International", by reason of having to abandon such name through damage to its reputation, amounting to not less than £93,134.00. (3) Loss of goodwill in the name "Business Computers International Limited". The Plaintiff will supply further particulars of damage upon the enquiry as to damages which it will ask the Court to order.

The prayer for relief claims damages for negligence.

The plaintiff's action against the second defendant is, therefore, an action in negligence. The alleged negligent conduct was the inclusion of the incorrect address in the winding-up petition, the service of that petition at the incorrect address and the advertisement of a petition which had, in the event, never been properly served.

The second defendant's application to strike out was dated 10 April 1987.

The question for decision is whether the pleading that I have read discloses a reasonably arguable cause of action against the second defendant.

Counsel for the second defendant has presented an attractively simple argument. The alleged negligence was negligence in the presentation and prosecution of a winding-up petition. A claim based on the improper commencement or prosecution of legal proceedings can only be entertained as an action for malicious prosecution: malice is required. Negligence does not suffice. A tortious duty of care is not owed by one litigant to another.

Counsel supported these propositions by references to authority. In Radivojevic v LR Industries Ltd [1984] CA Transcript 514 the first instance judge had dismissed the plaintiff's claim for damages against the defendants for maliciously bankrupting him. The Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiff's appeal. I have been supplied with a transcript of the judgments in the Court of Appeal. May LJ said:

'Although such a claim does not come frequently before the courts, an action does lie in respect of injury to reputation caused by maliciously and unreasonably commencing liquidation proceedings against a company, or bankruptcy proceedings against an individual. It is necessary to show, first, that the proceedings terminated favourably in favour of the plaintiffs; secondly that there was absence of reasonable and probable cause for bringing them; and thirdly, that there was malice or improper motive'.

It is implicit in the decision that the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings or the presentation of a winding-up petition cannot found an action in damages unless associated with malice.

It is clear also that a civil action can never be based on the falsity of evidence given in judicial proceedings. In Marrinan v Vibart [1962] 3 All ER 380, [1963] 1 QB 528 the plaintiff alleged that two police officers had conspired to give false evidence about him, firstly, in a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions, secondly at a trial at the Central Criminal Court and thirdly at an inquiry before the benchers of his Inn of Court. Salmon J held that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action. The Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiff's appeal. Sellers LJ cited with approval the following passage from the judgment of Starke J in Cabassi v Vila (1940) 64 CLR 130 at 140:

'No action lies in respect of evidence given by witnesses in the course of judicial proceedings, however false and malicious it may be, any more than it lies against judges, advocates or parties in respect of words used by them in the course of such proceedings or against juries in respect of their verdicts . . . the rule of law is that no action lies against witnesses in respect of evidence prepared (Watson v. M'Ewan, Watson v. Jones ([1905] AC 480, [1904-7] All ER Rep 1)), given, adduced or procured by them in the course of legal proceedings. The law protects witnesses and others, not for their benefit, but for a higher interest, namely, the advancement of public justice.'

In the present case the winding-up petition must have been verified by an affidavit sworn on behalf of the second defendant. That affidavit must, therefore, have verified 65 Castleton Avenue as the registered office of the plaintiff. There must also have been an affidavit deposing to service of the petition on the plaintiff at its registered office. Both these affidavits must, if the plaintiff's pleaded case is right, have been negligently false. Marrinan v Vibart establishes that an action cannot be based on the falsity of these affidavits.

Counsel for the second defendant referred me also to Rondel v Worsley [1967] 3 All ER 993, [1969] 1 AC 191 in support of his submission that the negligent prosecution of an action cannot be made the basis of an action in damages for negligence. The facts of the case are too well known to need rehearsing. Lord Pearce said ([1967] 3 All ER 993 at 1024-1025, [1969] 1 AC 191 at 268):

'It is a hardship that a man who has done no wrong should be subjected by a plaintiff to a baseless charge, in meeting which he will incur large expense. The charge may be reported largely in newspapers and injure his reputation . . . But the basic hardship is inevitable and will always remain, namely, that any plaintiff can use the legal machine as a sounding board for untruthful allegations and cause harm, trouble and expense to an innocent defendant, and yet the law holds him (and the press who report the case) immune from paying damages for their untruth. Yet to remove this immunity would create a great injury to justice. Without it, the honest litigant might not dare to bring an honest claim for fear that if he fails he might be sued for damages.' a

Counsel for the plaintiff emphasised that the plaintiff's claim in negligence against the second defendant was not based on the incorrect statement in the petition of the plaintiff's registered office and was not based on the falsity of the affidavit verifying the petition or on the falsity of the affidavit of service. He accepted that a claim so based would be barred by the authorities on which counsel for the second defendant relied. The plaintiff's claim, he said, was based on the second defendant's negligent failure to serve the petition on the plaintiff. That failure had deprived the plaintiff of the opportunity of taking steps to prevent the advertisement of the petition and the making of the winding-up order. The need for a petitioner to take care that his winding-up petition was properly served on the respondent company was, counsel submitted, manifest. The potential damage to the respondent company if care were not taken demonstrated the need. Counsel for the plaintiff distinguished Marrinan v Vibart as being concerned only with the position of witnesses. He distinguished Rondel v Worsley as being concerned with a claim arising out of the conduct of a trial. There was, he submitted, no authority which prevented a duty of care in regard to proper service of proceedings from being imposed on petitioners. b c

As to counsel for the second defendant's malicious prosecution point, the requirement of malice for malicious prosecution was, submitted counsel for the plaintiff, no more of a bar to the plaintiff's negligence action than the requirement of dishonesty in an action for deceit was a bar to an action for negligent mis-statement. d

I accept that both Marrinan v Vibart and Rondel v Worsley are distinguishable on their facts. And I accept that the availability of an action for malicious prosecution where malice can be shown is not a conclusive answer to the plaintiff's negligence action.

The propriety of the plaintiff's negligence action against the second defendant depends, in my judgment, on the proposition that a person who institutes legal process owes a duty of care to the respondent or defendant in regard to service of the proceedings. Naturally enough counsel for the plaintiff confined his submissions to winding-up petitions. He accepted that bankruptcy petitions would be on all fours with winding-up petitions. But he did not accept that the same principles would necessarily apply to ordinary actions. For my part, I can see no reasonable ground of distinction. Any and every inter partes originating process is capable of leading to an order against the defendant. If a defendant does not appear an order may be made against him in his absence. No doubt an affidavit of service would be required before the order was made. But if the affidavit was in regular form the court would not usually question whether the address given for service was the correct address. If the originating process gave the wrong address for the defendant and the service thereof was made at the wrong address, an order might well be made against the absent defendant. The order might cause considerable damage before it could be set aside. The damage could be said to have been caused by the negligent default of the plaintiff in correctly identifying the address of the defendant and in serving the originating process at that correct address. e f g

In my view, if the second defendant owed a duty of care as alleged in the present case, every petitioner or plaintiff would have a like duty. h

There is, as counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, no authority which establishes that an action for damage caused to a defendant by the negligent failure of a plaintiff to effect proper service on him of the originating process cannot be brought. Equally, there is no authority which establishes that such an action can be brought. Counsel relied, therefore, on the Donoghue v Stevenson neighbour principle (see Donoghue (or M'Alister) v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1). It is foreseeable, he submitted, that failure to serve at the right address may result in damage to the defendant. So, he submitted, the neighbour principle established by Donoghue v Stevenson justifies imposing on plaintiffs and petitioners a duty to take reasonable care to serve at the correct address. In my judgment, however, this argument is too superficial. A number of recent cases in the House of Lords and the Privy Council have established that foreseeability of harm does j a not of itself automatically lead to the imposition of a duty of care. In Anns v Merton London Borough [1977] 2 All ER 492 at 498, [1978] AC 728 at 751 Lord Wilberforce said:

b '... the position has now been reached that in order to establish that a duty of care arises in a particular situation, it is not necessary to bring the facts of that situation within those of previous situations in which a duty of care has been held to exist. Rather the question has to be approached in two stages. First one has to ask whether, as between the alleged wrongdoer and the person who has suffered damage there is a sufficient relationship of proximity or neighbourhood such that, in the reasonable contemplation of the former, carelessness on his part may be likely to cause damage to the latter, in which case a prima facie duty of care arises. Secondly, if the first question is answered affirmatively, it is necessary to consider whether there are any considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed or the damages to which a breach of it may give rise ...'

In Governors of the Peabody Donation Fund v Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co Ltd [1984] 3 All ER 529 at 533, [1985] AC 210 at 239 Lord Keith said:

d 'Lord Atkin's famous enunciation of the general principles on which the law of negligence is founded, in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562 at 580, [1932] All ER Rep 1 at 11, has long been recognised as not intended to afford a comprehensive definition, to the effect that every situation which is capable of falling within the terms of the utterance and which results in loss automatically affords a remedy in damages.'

e Lord Keith then referred to Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004 and to Lord Wilberforce's remarks in Anns v Merton London Borough and went on to say [1984] 3 All ER 529 at 534, [1985] AC 210 at 240):

f 'There has been a tendency in some recent cases to treat these passages as being themselves of a definitive character. This is a temptation which should be resisted. The true question in each case is whether the particular defendant owed to the particular plaintiff a duty of care having the scope which is contended for, and whether he was in breach of that duty with consequent loss to the plaintiff. A relationship of proximity in Lord Atkin's sense must exist before any duty of care can arise, but the scope of the duty must depend on all the circumstances of the case ... So in determining whether or not a duty of care of particular scope was incumbent on a defendant it is material to take into consideration whether it is just and reasonable that it should be so.'

g In Leigh & Silavan Ltd v Aliakmon Shipping Co Ltd, The Aliakmon [1986] 2 All ER 145 at 153, [1986] AC 785 at 815 Lord Brandon said this about Lord Wilberforce's remarks in Anns v Merton London Borough:

h 'Lord Wilberforce was dealing, as is clear from what he said, with the approach to the questions of the existence and scope of a duty of care in a novel type of factual situation which was not analogous to any factual situation in which the existence of such a duty had already been held to exist.'

The present case involves, I think, that novel type of factual situation.

j The most recent decision is that of the Privy Council in Yuen Kun-yeu v A-G of Hong Kong [1987] 2 All ER 705, [1987] 3 WLR 776. Lord Keith said this of Lord Wilberforce's dictum in Anns v Merton London Borough:

'... there are two possible views of what Lord Wilberforce meant. The first view ... is that he meant to test the sufficiency of proximity simply by the reasonable contemplation of likely harm. The second view ... is that Lord Wilberforce meant the expression "proximity or neighbourhood" to be a composite one, importing the whole concept of necessary relationship between plaintiff and defendant described by Lord Atkin in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562 at 580, [1932] All ER Rep 1 at 11. In their Lordships' opinion the second view is the correct one. As Lord Wilberforce himself observed in McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298 at 303, [1983] 1 AC 410 at 420, it is clear that foreseeability does not of itself, and automatically, lead to a duty of care . . . Foreseeability of harm is a necessary ingredient of such a relationship, but it is not the only one.' a

(See [1987] 2 All ER 705 at 710, [1987] 3 WLR 776 at 783.) Then a little further on Lord Keith said ([1987] 2 All ER 705 at 712, [1987] 3 WLR 776 at 785): b

'The second stage of Lord Wilberforce's test is one which will rarely have to be applied. It can arise only in a limited category of cases where, notwithstanding that a case of negligence is made out on the proximity basis, public policy requires that there should be no liability. One of the rare cases where that has been held to be so is Rondel v Worsley [1967] 3 All ER 993, [1969] 1 AC 191, dealing with the liability of a barrister for negligence in the conduct of proceedings in court. Such a policy consideration was invoked in Hill v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1987] 1 All ER 1173, [1987] 2 WLR 1126 . . . In view of the direction in which the law has since been developing, their Lordships consider that for the future it should be recognised that the two-stage test in Anns is not to be regarded as in all circumstances a suitable guide to the existence of a duty of care.' c

In the present case counsel for the plaintiff is contending for 'a duty of care in a novel type of factual situation which [is] not analogous to any factual situation in which the existence of such a duty had already been held to exist' (per Lord Brandon in Leigh & Silavan Ltd v Aliakmon Shipping Co Ltd [1986] 2 All ER 145 at 153, [1986] AC 785 at 815). So, as Lord Keith observed in the Yuen Kun-yeu case, the second stage of Lord Wilberforce's test becomes relevant. The right approach is, I think, summarily expressed by Lord Keith's dictum in the Peabody case [1984] 3 All ER 529 at 534, [1985] AC 210 at 241 that 'in determining whether or not a duty of care of particular scope was incumbent on a defendant it is material to take into consideration whether it is just and reasonable that it should be so'. d

Is it just and reasonable that a plaintiff should owe a duty of care to a defendant in regard to service of the originating process? I do not think that it is. The plaintiff and the defendant, the petitioner and the respondent, are antagonists. The plaintiff, or the petitioner, is seeking a legal remedy in an adversarial system. The system stipulates the rules and requirements that must be observed by the two parties. The plaintiff must issue his process and must serve it on the defendant. If there is default in service the process may be struck out. If an order is obtained without the prescribed rules or regulations having been observed, the order may be discharged or set aside, sometimes by an application at first instance, sometimes on appeal. The prosecution of the action or of the petition is subject throughout its career from institution to final judgment to judicial control. Service of process is a step, and usually an essential step, in the prosecution. It must usually be proved before an order can be obtained against an absent defendant. The proposition that a duty of care is owed by one litigant to another and can be superimposed on the checks and safeguards that the legal system itself provides is, to my mind, conceptually odd. The safeguards against ineffective service of process ought to be, and I think must be, found in the rules and procedures that govern litigation. The rules and procedures require that, save on ex parte applications, proof of service be shown before an order is made against an absent party. If the proof of service is false, be it through negligence or design, an order may be made that should not have been made. The injured party's remedy is to have the order set aside. An action for damages cannot be based on the falsity of the proof of service. Nor, in my judgment, can the adequacy of the efforts made to effect service be subjected to a tortious duty of care. e

a It would, I suppose, be possible for an undertaking in damages to be required to be given by every plaintiff or petitioner who obtained a final order against an absent defendant or respondent in case the proof of service of process turned out to be false. If that were ever to become the practice it would protect parties in the position of the plaintiff. The practice would become part of the rules and regulations governing the prosecution of actions and would represent an additional safeguard against the damage that might be caused to a defendant by inadequate efforts by a plaintiff to effect proper service. But there is no such practice.

b In Kelly v London Transport Executive [1982] 2 All ER 842 at 850–851, [1982] 1 WLR 1055 at 1064–1065 Lord Denning MR, in an obiter passage, suggested that a tortious duty of care might be owed by the solicitors of a legally aided party to the other party. This passage was commented on by Sir John Donaldson MR in Orchard v South Eastern Electricity Board [1987] 1 All ER 95 at 99, [1987] QB 565 at 571. He pointed out that Lord Denning MR's remarks were not supported by the other two members of the court, and then said:

d 'I have quoted from the judgment [of Lord Denning] at some length for two reasons. First, because it provides a useful summary of the duties of a solicitor acting for a legally-aided client. Whether that duty is owed to the opposing party is open to considerable doubt, at least where the solicitor is acting with the authority of his client and is not carrying on the litigation on his own account. However, the duty is undoubtedly owed to the court (see Myers v Elman [1939] 4 All ER 484 at 497, [1940] AC 282 at 302 per Lord Atkin) the duty being to conduct the litigation with due propriety, and the court may, in the exercise of its traditional jurisdiction over its own officers, order the solicitor to compensate the opposing party where the solicitor is in breach of that duty to the court.'

e I take this passage from Sir John Donaldson MR's judgment as supporting the view that I have endeavoured to express, namely that control of litigation and of the various steps taken in prosecuting litigation lies in the court and the rules and procedures that govern litigation and cannot be sought via a tortious duty of care imposed on one party for the benefit of the other.

f This view is not, in my opinion, undermined but is reinforced by the facts of the present case. Counsel for the plaintiff has submitted forcefully that the plaintiff has been damnified, through no fault of its own, and that, on the plaintiff's pleaded case, the damage would not have happened had the second defendant exercised proper care in ascertaining the correct address of the plaintiff's registered office. All this I am prepared to accept. But the damage of which the plaintiff complains was caused by the legal process instituted by the second defendant and by the winding-up order made by the court. Damage of this character is not, in my judgment, apt to be remediable in an action based on tortious negligence.

g In my judgment, there is no duty of care owed by one litigant to another as to the manner in which the litigation is conducted, whether in regard to service of process or in regard to any other step in the proceedings. The safeguards against impropriety are to be found in the rules and procedure that control the litigation and not in tort.

h I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff's statement of claim does not disclose a reasonable cause of action against the second defendant and ought to be struck out.

Action dismissed as against second defendant. Leave to appeal granted.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
PARKER LJ AND SIR GEORGE WALLER
10 JULY 1987

Rent restriction – Possession – Action for possession – Parties – Tenant's family – Husband and wife living in council flat but separated pending divorce – Council obtaining possession of flat by consent order made against husband – Council required to provide alternative accommodation for tenant and family – Whether wife entitled to separate alternative accommodation – Whether wife entitled to be joined as party to possession proceedings – Whether consent order void – Housing Act 1985, s 84(2)(b), Sch 2, Pt II, ground 10, Pt IV, para 1.

The husband and wife were secure tenants of a council flat which was in the husband's name and which they occupied with two of their daughters. The marriage broke down and divorce proceedings were instituted but before they were concluded the council brought proceedings against the husband claiming possession of the flat under ground 10^a in Pt II of Sch 2 to the Housing Act 1985 in order to carry out repairs and alterations. Under s 84(2)(b)^b of the 1985 Act the court was required, before making a possession order, to be satisfied that 'suitable accommodation', within para 1^c of Pt IV of Sch 2, would be available for the tenant and his family when the order took effect. At the hearing of the council's application the registrar refused an application by the wife to be joined as a party to the possession action and made an order for possession against the husband by consent. An appeal by the wife to the county court was dismissed and she appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending that she was entitled to be heard in the possession proceedings because, in view of the divorce proceedings, suitable accommodation for the tenant and his family meant in her case separate suitable accommodation for herself and her daughters.

Held – Since the court could not make an order for possession under s 84(2)(b) of the 1985 Act unless it was satisfied, as required by para 1 of Pt IV of Sch 2 to that Act, that suitable accommodation would be available for 'the tenant and his family' it followed that every member of the tenant's family living in the premises was a person with a potential interest in any possession proceedings and was entitled to be joined as a party to those proceedings. Furthermore, the court had no jurisdiction to make a possession order simply by consent; the matters specified in s 84 had to be established or express admissions of fact made before such an order could be made by consent. Since the wife clearly had an interest in the possession proceedings and ought to be allowed to present her case the appeal would be allowed and the possession order set aside (see p 478 c to e, p 479 c f g j and p 480 a b d, post).

Appeal

- c Florence Abiowa Fadayomi (the wife) appealed against the decision of Mr Brian Atchley sitting as an assistant recorder in the Wandsworth County Court on 15 May 1987 whereby he dismissed an appeal by the wife against the decision of Mr Registrar Price given on 29 April 1987 dismissing her application to intervene in possession proceedings regarding the property at 92 Arthur Court, Charlotte Despard Avenue, London SW11, brought by the Wandsworth London Borough Council against Emmanuel Iranola Fadayomi (the husband) and refusing to set aside a possession order made on 25 March 1987. The facts are set out in the judgment of Parker LJ.

- d Lincoln Crawford for the wife.
David Medhurst for the council.
David Watkinson for the husband.

- e PARKER LJ. This is an appeal from the refusal on 15 May 1987 of Mr Brian Atchley sitting as an assistant recorder to allow an appeal by the present appellant, Mrs Fadayomi, from a refusal by Mr Registrar Price on 29 April 1987 to allow her to intervene in a possession action brought by the respondents, Wandsworth London Borough Council, against Mr Fadayomi in respect of flat 92, Arthur Court, Battersea. She now appeals to this court seeking to be given leave to intervene or to join as a defendant and for the possession order to be set aside.

- f The history of the proceedings and, indeed, the occupation of 92 Arthur Court needs to be set out in a little detail. Mr and Mrs Fadayomi, who have four daughters, first went to live in 92 Arthur Court in 1971. They are, or were until the possession order was made, secure tenants of the flat. The two eldest daughters have now left and have accommodation of their own, but the flat remained in the occupation of Mr and Mrs Fadayomi and the two youngest daughters up to the time of the possession order. From about 1985 the council have wished to obtain possession of flat 92 in order that they might carry out certain works which are alleged to fall within ground 10 in Pt II of Sch 2 to the Housing Act 1985.

- g A number of offers of alternative accommodation were made to the family as one unit up until August 1986, when, owing to the fact that the marriage had to a large extent broken down, Mr and Mrs Fadayomi requested that the alternative accommodation should consist of two units, one for Mr Fadayomi and the other for Mrs Fadayomi and her two daughters. In August 1986 the council initiated the preliminary steps which are required before possession can be obtained under the Housing Act 1985. Notwithstanding that, since August 1986 they have made four offers of accommodation to Mr and Mrs Fadayomi, in each case the offer having been of separate accommodation for him on the one side and for her and her two children on the other. All offers of accommodation have been refused for one reason or another and it is not for this court to consider whether the reasons why they were refused were good or bad. The reason for the desire to have separate accommodation is because, the marriage having broken down, Mr Fadayomi at any rate finds it to all intents and purposes intolerable to continue to live with his wife and children. Therefore, both sides wish to separate and have separate accommodation.

Mrs Fadayomi has been the breadwinner throughout the period, Mr Fadayomi being disabled, and, in some cases at least, the refusal of alternative accommodation has been on the basis that it involved climbing the stairs, which was unsuitable for him. a

In December 1986 the council launched their possession action claiming possession on the basis of ground 10 in Pt II of Sch 2. Mr Fadayomi filed a defence in which everything was put in issue, and on 22 January of this year there was a pre-trial review which was attended by Mrs Fadayomi and her solicitor as well as the other parties. She at that time took no part in the proceedings. The action was ordered to be tried on 25 March and on that day it came on for hearing and an order for possession was made. The original order, unfortunately, has gone astray. No file copy has been found but a note was taken of the judgment by the council's solicitors which has been agreed to be correct. This is in the following terms: b

'Registrar refused to consider letter from Hanne & Co. Not on record and no locus standi. Consent order agreed for possession on Mr. F.'s undertaking to allow family to move with him. Order: On Defendant's undertaking to allow all members of family presently living with him at 92 Arthur Court to move with him to 56 Arthur Court. Defendant to give possession of whole premises at 92 Arthur Court on or before 6/4/87.' c

On the occasion that that order was made Mrs Fadayomi was present and her solicitor was in the building. The letter at which the registrar refused to look is in the following terms: d

'We are advising Florence Abiowa Fadayomi under the Green Form Scheme. Mrs. Fadayomi is the wife of the Defendant and has occupied the property with the parties' five children at all material times. Although the Tenancy is in the sole name of Mr. Fadayomi, our client is clearly an interested party since she and her children will be affected by the Court's decision. Mrs. Fadayomi is unable to be present at Court because she is on Jury Service. We are writing on her behalf to apply:—(a) for her to be joined as Second Defendant in the proceedings as a person with an interest in the property and (b) for an adjournment of the proceedings to enable her to apply for Emergency Legal Aid for representation and to be represented. Our client is aware that a number of offers of alternative accommodation have been made to the Defendant. These are not suitable for her needs and those of the children. Her marriage to the Defendant has broken down and the parties have lived separate lives under the same roof for the past four or five years. There are Divorce proceedings pending between the parties in the Divorce Registry . . . and we are advised by the Defendant's solicitors in those proceedings that he has consented to a Decree being granted on the basis of two years separation and consent. The Plaintiffs have been kept informed of the progress of the Divorce proceedings, following the last hearing in this matter on the 23rd of January 1987, informed us through their representative Mr. Harvey that a further offer of accommodation would be made to Mrs. Fadayomi for herself and the children and an offer of separate accommodation made to the Defendant. On the 23rd March 1987 we were advised by the Plaintiffs representative . . . that no such further offer of accommodation had been made to Mrs. Fadayomi by the Plaintiffs because nothing suitable had come up. In our submission, it is common ground between all the parties that the Plaintiffs have an obligation to re-house the Defendant, Mrs. Fadayomi and her children. The Court must be satisfied that the offer of accommodation is, in all the circumstances, reasonable before making an order for possession on the grounds sought by the Plaintiffs. It is our submission that it would be quite unreasonable for the Court to consider an offer of accommodation to the family as a single unit as being satisfactory given that there are Divorce proceedings being actively pursued between the parents. In our further submission it would be quite unreasonable for the Court to make a possession order in the circumstances of this case without allowing Mrs. Fadayomi to be joined as a e a party to the action and to have separate representation. Our client quite appreciates that various contractors works are being carried out on the Estate where the demised premises are, and that vacant possession of her flat is urgently required by the Plaintiffs if the progress of these works is not to be impeded. In our submission the onus is clearly on the Plaintiffs to make a suitable offer of accommodation to our client, reasonable in all the circumstances. A number of offers of separate accommodation were made by the Plaintiffs to our client prior to the last hearing of this matter in January 1987 but the further offer promised after that hearing has not materialised and our client remains happy to consider such further offer as may be made.'

c The reason why the registrar refused to look at that letter was apparently because, as appeared from the reference to the green form scheme at the head of the letter, the solicitors supposed to be acting for Mrs Fadayomi were not yet on the record and not yet entitled to represent her in court. On the other hand, that letter contained information which, had it been before the court, could scarcely have failed to result in Mrs Fadayomi being joined in accordance with the rules and the matter being fully investigated. As it was, the order was made, as is recited and accepted on all sides, by consent.

d It is at this stage necessary to look at the Housing Act 1985 but, before doing so, I should mention that the divorce proceedings have not yet progressed to a state even of decree nisi, there apparently being some dispute about the grounds on which it should proceed. Counsel for the wife in his notice of appeal takes a number of points, mostly going to the merits with which this court finds it unnecessary to deal. His principal point is that the order should not have been made by consent, the court lacked jurisdiction to do so and the order should therefore be set aside and, that having been set aside, his client e should be joined as a defendant.

The point which is taken with regard to the consent order arises out of the provisions of s 84 of the Housing Act 1985, which is in the following terms:

f '(1) The court shall not make an order for the possession of a dwelling-house let under a secure tenancy except on one or more of the grounds set out in Schedule 2.

(2) The court shall not make an order for possession . . . (b) on the grounds set out in Part II of that Schedule (grounds 9 to 11), unless it is satisfied that suitable accommodation will be available for the tenant when the order takes effect . . . and Part IV of that Schedule has effect for determining whether suitable accommodation will be available for a tenant . . .'

g If one then turns to the schedule, one finds that ground 10 is in the following terms:

'The landlord intends, within a reasonable time of obtaining possession of the dwelling-house—(a) to demolish or reconstruct the building or part of the building comprising the dwelling-house, or (b) to carry out work on that building or on land let together with, and thus treated as part of, the dwelling-house, and cannot reasonably do so without obtaining possession of the dwelling-house.'

h Put in its shortest form, the alterations which the council desire to carry out are alleged on powerful grounds, and possibly even wholly unassailable grounds, to fall within ground 10. Part IV, which is referred to in s 84, deals with the suitability of accommodation. It provides:

i '1. For the purposes of section 84(2)(b) and (c) (case in which court is not to make an order for possession unless satisfied that suitable accommodation will be available) accommodation is suitable if it consists of premises—(a) which are to be let as a separate dwelling under a secure tenancy, or (b) which are to be let as a separate dwelling under a protected tenancy, not being a tenancy under which the landlord might recover possession under one of the Cases in Part II of Schedule 15 to the Rent

Act 1977 (cases where court must order possession), and, in the opinion of the court, the accommodation is reasonably suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family. a

2. In determining whether the accommodation is reasonably suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family, regard shall be had to . . .

and then a number of matters are set out. They may be summarised as follows: the nature of the accommodation which the landlord allocates in such circumstances; the distance of the accommodation available from the place of work or education of the tenant or any member of his family; its distance from the home of any member of the tenant's family if proximity to it is essential for the member's or the tenant's well-being; the needs, as regards extent of accommodation, and means of the tenant and his family; and the terms on which the accommodation is available and the terms of the secure tenancy. Then there is a provision in relation to furniture which is not immediately relevant. b

It is apparent from that, in my view, that every member of the tenant's family living in the premises is a person with a potential interest in any possession proceedings. He may not in many cases desire to advance any such interest, but it is abundantly apparent, in view of the terms of this provision, that any member of the family who considers that the accommodation is unsuitable because it is too far from his place of work or too far from some other member of the family to whom it is essential he should live in close proximity may be able to advance that if he so wishes. It might well be the case that the tenant himself does not wish to raise the matter, and this section can only work in the event that the tenant does not wish to raise it if the person who has the potential right, on the wording of these provisions, himself is allowed to be joined in order to raise it. c

So far as consent is concerned, we were referred to four cases. The first is R v Bloomsbury and Marylebone County Court, ex p Blackburne (1984) 14 HLR 56, a decision of Glidewell J. d
It is unnecessary to read more than a few words of the introduction to the report. It says:

'Under the Rent Act 1977, and by analogy under the Housing Act 1980, the powers of the court to make an order for possession are restricted. . . .'

Then there is a reference to s 98 of the Rent Act 1977 and s 34 of the Housing Act 1980, which, in all material respects, is identical with s 84 of the Housing Act 1985. Then there are set out the words 'a court shall not make an order for possession unless . . .'. The remainder of the first paragraph it is unnecessary to read. There is then a reference, amongst other things, to a decision of this court in Plaschkes v Jones (1982) 9 HLR 110. e

Both those cases indicate, but do not specifically decide, that a consent order purely as a consent order is beyond the jurisdiction of the court in the face of the express prohibition in s 84 against making an order for possession unless certain specific matters are established to the satisfaction of the court. f

We were also referred to two earlier authorities which are of importance. First, we were referred to Barton v Fincham [1921] 2 KB 291, [1921] All ER Rep 87. I only need read the last paragraph of the headnote in which the finding of the court is set out ([1921] 2 KB 291): g

'Held, that the jurisdiction of the Court to make an order for possession is restricted by the above enactment [namely s 5 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act 1920, which was a prohibition substantially in the same terms as s 85]; that if the conditions upon which alone an order can be made are not fulfilled, an order cannot be made in invitum notwithstanding any agreement of the parties to the contrary; and that consequently the landlord could not recover.' h

The passage to which we were referred principally was in the last judgment, that of Atkin LJ, where he said ([1921] 2 KB 291 at 299, [1921] All ER Rep 87 at 91): i

'I agree with the other members of the Court in thinking that the express provisions of s. 5 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act,

1920, make it impossible to uphold the decision of the learned county court judge. The section appears to me to limit definitely the jurisdiction of the Courts in making ejectment orders in the case of premises to which the Act applies. Parties cannot by agreement give the Courts jurisdiction which the Legislature has enacted they are not to have. If the parties before the Court admit that one of the events has happened which give the Court jurisdiction, and there is no reason to doubt the bona fides of the admission, the Court is under no obligation to make further inquiry as to the question of fact; but apart from such an admission the Court cannot give effect to an agreement, whether by way of compromise or otherwise, inconsistent with the provisions of the Act.'

It therefore appears that, in order to justify an order being made without an investigation of the facts, what is required is not a mere consent to the making of the order but an express admission of facts which, if they had been proved, would give the court jurisdiction to make the order.

The other case which was referred to is Thorne v Smith [1947] 1 All ER 39, [1947] KB 307. That case does not appear to me to take the matter any further. The only matter which is relied on is the last paragraph in the judgment of Somervell LJ, where he said ([1947] 1 All ER 39 at 44, [1947] KB 307 at 315):

'The other point arises from the use of the word "consent" as applied to the order made herein. The expression "a consent order" may suggest some compromise or arrangement which might be inconsistent with the provisions of the Acts. When the defendant is agreeing to submit to judgment because he is satisfied that the plaintiff can establish his right to an order under the Acts, it might be advisable to avoid the use of the word "consent", which may have a wider meaning and cover cases where the "consent" was the result of an arrangement which could not properly be made the basis of an order.'

It may very well be that, if the matter had been gone into, express admissions of fact might have been made by Mr Fadayomi. They might not have been made by Mrs Fadayomi. But, in truth, no investigation of any sort took place and, in my judgment, that order was an order which was made in defiance of the prohibition in s 84. Therefore, it was made without jurisdiction and it is inevitable that it must be set aside.

In my judgment, it is also clear that Mrs Fadayomi has an interest in these proceedings and should have an opportunity to present her case and, accordingly, she must have leave to intervene. It may be necessary to hear counsel on the matter, but the most convenient way to do it appears to me that she should be joined as a defendant rather than to have her, as sometimes happens, lurking in the action without any specific title.

I would only add this. The result of the order which I propose would inevitably be that the action would go forward and there would be some delay. It might well be that, at the end of that delay, the same result is achieved as has been achieved so far. It is not possible for this court, and undesirable for this court, to make any pronouncement on the various issues which have arisen. If this order was made without an investigation of the merits there is nothing for this court to determine with regard to the merits but, having seen as much as we have, it appears to me that the council may have a strong case. That being so, if a further offer of accommodation were made to Mrs Fadayomi, it may well be that a quicker result would be achieved, and she should bear well in mind that if a further offer were made and it were to be turned down that would be unlikely, unless turned down on cogent grounds, to further her interest when the matter came on for trial.

I mention these matters because litigation is always an expensive matter and very often the same result can be achieved without the time and expense involved in pursuing the matter before the court.

I would allow this appeal and make the order which I have already mentioned.

I would only add this. The council are clearly not open to any criticism in this case. They have tried very hard to accommodate Mr and Mrs Fadayomi over a long period and I would not wish it to be thought that, because there was a slip-up at the time when the possession order was made, their conduct has been otherwise than it should have been. a

SIR GEORGE WALLER. I entirely agree. I would only add this. It does seem most unfortunate that Mrs Fadayomi was not made a party at the earliest stage. The assistant recorder was no doubt misled by the apparent agreement of Mr Fadayomi and perhaps saying something else which gave a different impression from that which was intended. b
So it follows that, when the application was renewed to the registrar again, it was unfortunate that he did not feel that it was right to make her a party, and likewise when it came before the assistant recorder. Here were parties whose marriage had broken down. The wife and children had lived in the flat for some 16 years (indeed, it is said that she was really the breadwinner) and, if the information had been put before the court, it was clear that she had a major interest in the disposition of this property, and it probably would have saved a great deal of time if she had been made a party at the earliest date. c
That, as Parker LJ has said, does not necessarily mean that she will be more successful in the proceedings eventually, but it does at least give time for arrangements to be made.

I agree that this appeal should be allowed and that she should be made a party to the action. d

Appeal allowed.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

WATKINS LJ, MARS-JONES AND HENRY JJ

21 MAY 1987

b Criminal evidence – Admissions and confessions – Confession – Confession obtained by deceit – Whether confession ‘evidence’ put forward by prosecution – Whether confession can be excluded even though not obtained by oppression nor likely to be unreliable – Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, ss 76, 78(1).

c The appellant was arrested and questioned regarding an offence of arson. The police had no direct evidence associating the appellant with the crime but they falsely told him and his solicitor that they had found near the scene of the crime a fragment of a bottle which had contained inflammable liquid and that the appellant’s fingerprint was on the fragment. The appellant then told the police that he had filled the bottles with the liquid and had asked a friend to commit the offence. At his trial he challenged the admissibility of the confession. The trial judge considered whether, ‘having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained’, the confession should be excluded under s 78(1)^a of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and decided that it would not be unfair to admit it. The appellant appealed against the judge’s decision to admit the confession. At the hearing of the appeal the Crown contended, inter alia, that s 78 did not apply to confessions since they were expressly dealt with by s 76^b, which provided that a confession could only be excluded if it had been obtained by oppression or was likely to be unreliable.

d Held – For the purpose of s 78 of the 1984 Act ‘evidence’ included all evidence, including a confession, that might be introduced by the prosecution at the trial, notwithstanding that confessions were expressly dealt with in s 76. Accordingly, the trial judge could exclude a confession under s 78 if it would have an adverse effect on the fairness of the trial, even though it had not been obtained by oppression nor was likely to be unreliable. On the facts, the trial judge had wrongly exercised his discretion because he had failed to consider the deceit practised on the appellant and his solicitor and if he had done so he would have been bound to exclude the confession. The appeal would be allowed and, there being no other evidence produced by the prosecution, the conviction would be quashed (see p 484 f g j to p 485 a, post).

Appeal against conviction

Carl James Mason appealed against his conviction in the Crown Court at Newcastle upon Tyne before his Honour Judge Percy and a jury on 20 March 1987 of arson for which he was sentenced to two years' youth custody. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. a Christopher Knox (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeal) for the appellant.

Richard Lowden for the Crown. b

WATKINS LJ delivered the following judgment of the court. On 26 February 1987 in the Crown Court at Newcastle upon Tyne before his Honour Judge Percy the appellant was convicted of arson and on 20 March sentenced for that to two years' youth custody. He appeals against conviction by way of a certificate from the trial judge. The point of law certified by him is thus stated: c

'A point of law arose concerning the admissibility of evidence which it was submitted ought to have been excluded under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, sections 76 and 78.'

It is as well we think to preface the remainder of this judgment by observing that on the evidence this is an appeal without merit, but the point of law raised is one of real substance. d

The facts are that on 1 July 1986 a motor car belonging to a Mr Askew was set on fire. It was very badly damaged. The cost of repairing the damage was something in the region of £1,000. It was obvious to those who later went on to inspect the damage that the fire had been caused by an inflammable liquid thrown against the car and ignited. e

Before that incident there had been bad feeling between the appellant, who is 20 years of age, and Mr Askew. Mr Askew has a daughter who is 18 years of age. The appellant and this young lady had been going out together. She became pregnant by him. She was not willing to bear his child. She decided to have an abortion and she did. She also broke off her relationship with the appellant. He did not take that at all well. His erstwhile girlfriend's father and mother did not look on what had happened with any great favour either; nor did they feel any pleasure in seeing the appellant any more. They began to receive midnight telephone calls. On each occasion they answered the telephone, whoever was at the other end put the receiver down. They suspected the appellant of making those calls. It may be that their suspicions were well founded. f

At two o'clock in the morning of 1 July 1986 Mr Askew while in bed was woken up a by a screech of tyres on the road outside his house. He thought no more of it then and went back to sleep, but a few minutes later he was again woken up, this time it was by a telephone call from a neighbour. As a result of that he ran to a window and saw that his motor car, which was parked outside, was on fire. There was nobody near the car. He had a foam fire extinguisher handy and with that he succeeded in putting out the fire. There were other parked cars nearby. If Mr Askew had not succeeded in putting out the fire, it may well have been if the fire in his car had spread to the petrol tank that the petrol in it would have ignited and the fire spread to the other cars. g

When the police came to the scene there was a lot of broken glass, as they discovered, about the place near the car. It was soon found that an inflammable liquid had been used, probably a combination of petrol and paint thinners. About 12 hours or so later the police paid a visit to the appellant. He denied having been involved in setting fire to the car. On 10 July he was arrested. Be it noted that on arrest the police had in their possession no evidence at all to associate him with the cause of the fire. Before arrest one or more police officers decided to invent evidence and to acquaint the appellant of that so-called evidence as though it was genuinely possessed. What they decided to do was to tell the appellant that a fingerprint of his had been found in a very telling place. As to that Det Con Gunton said: j a 'Detective Constable Walton and I set out deliberately to make the defendant believe we had a fingerprint on some of the glass fragments from the bottle that was used to perpetrate this crime. I agreed with the detective constable to this playing and it was a trick. The bottle, or the fragments of it, had not even been sent for fingerprint testing at that stage. We set about "conning" the defendant. We had a suspicion, but only suspicion against him and we realised that we needed more proof . . . I felt the only way to get the truth from him was to do this.'

b Having been told by these police officers, falsely, that a fingerprint of his had been found on a fragment of glass from the bottle, the appellant saw his solicitor and told him his version of what had happened. The solicitor asked Det Con Gunton to confirm the fact, as the police were asserting, that they had found a fingerprint on a fragment of glass at the scene of the crime. He confirmed to the solicitor that that was so. That was a deliberate falsehood. When giving evidence Det Con Gunton said as to this:

c 'My motive . . . was because if the defendant had had nothing to do with this glass bottle there was no way he would produce a confession. If he . . . knew very well he had handled . . . the bottle and been active in the preparation, of course, he would begin to doubt himself and whether or not he was going to be discovered.'

d The solicitor, influenced by what he had been told by the police as to the fingerprint, advised the appellant to answer their questions and to give his explanation of any involvement he had had in the incident. What he told the police as a consequence of that was that he was not present when the car was set alight. He had asked a friend, whom he refused to name, if he would do it. This was because Mr Askew had been threatening e him, and setting fire to his car would frighten Mr Askew away from repeating conduct of that kind. The only involvement which he (the appellant) had in the incident was to fill the bottles which were used, one with petrol and the other with paint thinners. That was done at his home. The bottles were then taken away by the friend and the fire started.

f The appellant did not give evidence at the trial. Before the end of the prosecution case and when the confession (because that is what it amounted to) was sought to be put in evidence by counsel for the Crown, objection to its admissibility was made by counsel for the appellant. The judge heard argument in the absence of the jury and heard some evidence from the police as to how the confession had been obtained. He decided that the confession was, in his discretion, admissible. He was referred in the course of argument to ss 76 and 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. He gave a ruling g at the conclusion of argument and then said he would allow the prosecution to adduce that evidence. He dealt with what he believed to be the effects of ss 76 and 78, and went on to say, with the provisions of s 78 in mind:

h 'I have no doubt that this defendant was well aware of his right to remain silent and could have remained silent, with his solicitor being present, had he so chosen that alternative. But he did not choose that alternative; he chose to give the interview, listen to the questions and decide individually which questions he was going to answer. In fact, he answered all of them. I see nothing in his doing that which adversely affects the fairness of the proceedings.'

j It is contended here by counsel for the appellant that the judge exercised his discretion wrongly. Counsel for the Crown, who also appeared in the court below, has argued that the judge undoubtedly had a discretion and that in exercising it he took account of all the matters which it was necessary for him to take into account and did not give thought to any impermissible matter in coming to his conclusion. He has also submitted that there is no authority for the proposition that s 78 of the 1984 Act refers to confessions and admissions, seeing that they are especially dealt with in s 76.

Section 76, so far as relevant, states:

'(1) In any proceedings a confession made by an accused person may be given in evidence against him in so far as it is relevant to any matter in issue in the proceedings and is not excluded by the court in pursuance of this section. ^a

(2) If, in any proceedings where the prosecution proposes to give in evidence a confession made by an accused person, it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained—(a) by oppression of the person who made it; or (b) in consequence of anything said or done which was likely, in the circumstances existing at the time, to render unreliable any confession which might be made by him in consequence thereof, the court shall not allow the confession to be given in evidence against him . . . ' ^b

It is to be observed of those provisions that whilst a confession made by an accused person may generally speaking be given in evidence (sub-s (1)), the court is obliged to rule out that confession if it finds to exist any one or more of the circumstances referred to in sub-s (2). ^c

Section 78(1) states:

'In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it.' ^d

It is submitted that, when a comparison is made between the provisions of those two sections and reference made to R v Sang [1979] 2 All ER 1222, [1980] AC 402, it was not the intention of Parliament that s 78 be understood as though the word 'evidence' includes evidence of confessions and admissions. We see no reason whatsoever to put that in our view extremely strained construction on the plain words used in this section. In our judgment on a proper construction of it the word 'evidence' includes all the evidence which may be introduced by the prosecution into a trial. Thus it is that regardless of whether the admissibility of a confession falls to be considered under s 76(2), a trial judge has a discretion to deal with the admissibility of a confession under s 78 which, in our opinion, does no more than to restate the power which judges had at common law before the 1984 Act was passed. That power gave a trial judge a discretion whether solely in the interests of the fairness of a trial he would permit the prosecution to introduce admissible evidence sought to be relied on, especially that of a confession or an admission. That being so, we now return to the circumstances of the present case. ^e

It is obvious from the undisputed evidence that the police practised a deceit not only on the appellant, which is bad enough, but also on the solicitor whose duty it was to advise him. In effect, they hoodwinked both solicitor and client. That was a most reprehensible thing to do. It is not however because we regard as misbehaviour of a serious kind conduct of that nature that we have come to the decision soon to be made plain. This is not the place to discipline the police. That has been made clear here on a number of previous occasions. We are concerned with the application of the proper law. The law is, as I have already said, that a trial judge has a discretion to be exercised, of course on right principles, to reject admissible evidence in the interests of a defendant having a fair trial. The judge in the present case appreciated that, as the quotation from his ruling shows. So the only question to be answered by this court is whether, having regard to the way the police behaved, the judge exercised that discretion correctly. In our judgment he did not. He omitted a vital factor from his consideration, namely the deceit practised on the appellant's solicitor. If he had included that in his consideration of the matter we have not the slightest doubt that he would have been driven to an opposite conclusion, namely that the confession be ruled out and the jury not permitted therefore ^f ^g ^h ^j

- to hear of it. If that had been done, an acquittal would have followed for there was no other evidence in the possession of the prosecution.

For those reasons we have no alternative but to quash this conviction.

- Before parting with this case, despite what I have said about the role of the court in relation to disciplining the police, we think we ought to say that we hope never again to hear of deceit such as this being practised on an accused person, and more particularly possibly on a solicitor whose duty it is to advise him, unfettered by false information from the police.

Practice – Trial – Trial by jury – Libel – Trial of action requiring prolonged examination of documents and accounts – Trial by judge alone – Discretion of court to order trial by jury even if prolonged examination of documents likely – Libel alleging illegal share dealings by public figure – Prolonged examination of documents likely – Whether trial should be by jury or judge alone – Supreme Court Act 1981, s 69(1)(3).

- The first plaintiff was the chairman or director of a number of large international companies, including the second plaintiff. The defendants published an article in their satirical magazine alleging that the first plaintiff had been involved in secret dealings in the shares of the second plaintiff in breach of s 27 of the Companies Act 1967. The plaintiffs brought an action for libel against the defendants in respect of the article. The defendants pleaded justification and the master ordered trial by jury. The defendants subsequently came into possession of detailed information concerning the first plaintiff's business affairs with the result that the particulars of their defence involved detailed documentation of complex multiple transactions carried out by the first plaintiff in the shares of his interlocking companies. The defendants applied to the judge for an order under s 69(1)(b)^a of the Supreme Court Act 1981 for trial by a judge alone, on the ground that the trial of the action would require 'prolonged examination of documents . . . which cannot conveniently be made with a jury'. The plaintiffs, in order to pursue a claim for aggravated damages, sought discovery from the defendants of some 2,500 documents which formed the working papers on which articles about the plaintiffs were based. However, the plaintiffs resisted the application for trial by a judge alone on the ground, inter alia, that even if a prolonged examination of documents would be required, the judge ought nevertheless to exercise his discretion under s 69(3)^b to order trial by a

- j a Section 69(1), so far as material, provides: 'Where, on the application of any party to an action to be tried in the Queen's Bench Division, the court is satisfied that there is in issue . . . (b) a claim in respect of libel [or] slander . . . the action shall be tried with a jury, unless the court is of opinion that the trial requires any prolonged examination of documents or accounts . . . which cannot conveniently be made with a jury.'

(b) Section 69(3) is set out at p 490 b, post jury, because the reputation and integrity of the first plaintiff, who was a public figure, would be in question. The judge ordered trial by a judge alone. The plaintiffs appealed against that order. a

Held – Under s 69(1) of the 1981 Act a plaintiff in a libel action had an absolute right to trial of the action by a jury unless the trial required a prolonged examination of documents which could not conveniently be made with a jury because it would be less efficient and practical to use a jury. However, if the trial would require prolonged examination of documents which could not conveniently be made with a jury there was a clear presumption in s 69(3) that the trial should be without a jury and only in rare cases of public importance should the judge exercise his discretion under s 69(3) to order trial by jury notwithstanding that prolonged and inconvenient examination of documents would be required. The judge had been right to order trial by a judge alone because, notwithstanding the imputations against the first defendant's reputation and integrity, prolonged and constant examination of very complex documents would be required and there were not sufficient grounds for the exercise of the discretion under s 69(3) to order trial by a jury. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see p 490 c, p 491 c d, p 492 e f h j, p 483 d to g, p 494 b to e, p 495 b to d g to j, p 496 a to e h and p 497 g j to p 498 b d to f, post). b c

Interlocutory appeal

The plaintiffs, Sir James Goldsmith and Cavenham Ltd, appealed against the order of Jupp J made on 12 March 1984 varying the order of Master Creightmore that the plaintiffs' libel action against the defendants, Pressdram Ltd, Richard Ingrams and Michael Gillard, should be tried by a judge and jury, and ordering that the action be tried by a judge alone. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lawton LJ. f

Lord Rawlinson QC and James Price for the plaintiffs.

Desmond Browne for the defendants. g

LAWTON LJ. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs, Sir James Goldsmith and Cavenham Ltd against an order made by Jupp J on 12 March 1984 whereby he varied the mode of trial of a libel action brought by the plaintiffs against the three defendants. In 1982, Master Creightmore had ordered, without opposition from the defendants, trial by jury. Jupp J ordered that the case should be tried by a judge alone. h

In order to make clear what arises in this appeal it is necessary to say something about the parties. The first plaintiff, Sir James Goldsmith, in an affidavit which is before the court, described himself as follows:

'I am Chairman or Director of a number of large international companies based, inter alia, in Paris, New York, Hong Kong and London employing tens of thousands of people and having numerous subsidiary companies'. j

One of the companies in which he is interested, and in which he is a large shareholder, is the second plaintiff, Cavenham Ltd. The first defendants are the publishers of the fortnightly magazine called 'Private Eye'. The second defendant is the editor of that magazine. The third defendant, Mr Gillard, is an investigative journalist specialising in looking into the affairs of companies. He is a regular contributor to Private Eye. He writes under the pen name of 'Slicker'. In almost every edition of Private Eye for some years past, there has been an article by Mr Gillard revealing aspects of company affairs which he seems to think merit critical comment. For some years now Sir James Goldsmith and Private Eye have been at odds with one another. It is said in this case that regularly, over a period of about four years before 1980, Private Eye had made derogatory remarks about Sir James, and from time to time had made defamatory remarks about him. These comments, on occasions, have angered Sir James. It is part of the background history of this case that on two occasions, the last of which was in 1983, Sir James has sued Private Eye for libel; the cases never came to trial: they were settled by the payment of substantial sums of money to Sir James, either on account of his costs or on account of costs and damages. Mr Gillard, too, has sued Sir James for libel. Sir James pleaded justification for what he had said about Mr Gillard. The case came on for trial. Mr Gillard's claim failed.

It has been submitted in this court that this libel action has been made necessary because of the alleged campaign of vilification and derogation which has been waged against Sir James by Private Eye for so long.

The publications in Private Eye relating to Sir James before the issue of the writ in this action, which was on 10 September 1980, are not the subject matter of complaint in this action, but Lord Rawlinson, on behalf of the plaintiffs, has said that the early history is relevant because it may justify the award of aggravated damages. Indeed, so enthusiastic are the plaintiffs about that aspect of the case that they obtained from Jupp J, on 12 March 1984, an order for further discovery of documents consisting of Mr Gillard's working papers which, before September 1980, had formed the basis of the articles he had written about Sir James and his companies. We have been told by counsel who has appeared on behalf of all three defendants, that that order for further discovery will probably lead to something like 2,500 pages of documents being disclosed.

On 9 September there appeared on the bookstalls an edition of Private Eye which was dated 12 September 1980. In that edition there was an article written by Mr Gillard about Sir James. It is unnecessary to reproduce the article in this judgment. It suffices to say that it came to this: that the Department of Trade were investigating the way in which Sir James had dealt with shares in Cavenham Ltd in relation to the parent company of Cavenham Ltd, Generale Occidentale. The suggestion in the article was that Sir James had hidden from the public, in breach of s 27 of the Companies Act 1967, his dealings in those shares and his interests in Generale Occidentale and other companies. Sir James resented this suggestion because his case is, as he has revealed in an affidavit before the court, that although dealings in his shares were not recorded in Cavenham Ltd's register as they should have been, he did not himself know about those dealings at the time when the entries in the register should have been made and, further, in respect of some dealings, he had been advised by his lawyers that he could claim exemption from revealing them.

It is necessary now to say a few words about s 27 of the Companies Act 1967. Before 1967 it had been a fairly common practice for persons interested in companies to hide their interests by means of nominee shareholdings and subsidiary companies. In 1967 Parliament decided that that kind of activity was not in the public interest. Section 27 of the 1967 Act provided that for the future directors of companies who had shares in other companies should reveal in writing to the secretary of the companies what their holdings were, and they should also reveal in writing any events which affected their interests in other companies. The Act provided that the notifications should be made within five days of either the acquisitions of the shares or the occurrence of the events which affected holdings in shares. Failure to comply with s 27 was to be a criminal offence, punishable with imprisonment.

By s 28 there was a deeming provision, the effect of which was that a person was deemed to have an interest in shares either if a company was normally in the practice of acting on his directions or he held more than a specified proportion of the shares in that company. a

The effect, so Sir James alleged, of the article written by Mr Gillard was to suggest that he was in the habit of hiding from the public his interest in various companies, and as Sir James himself has admitted in the affidavit to which I referred he has interests in a large number of companies and it is clear that they are inter-locking companies. He has interests in shares in a complex group of companies. b

As I have already stated, the writ was issued on 10 September 1980. By January 1981 the defendants had delivered a defence which included a plea of justification. That plea had a large number of sub-paragraphs setting out various matters which the defendants intended relying on in support of the allegations contained in the alleged defamatory article. The litigation did not proceed very rapidly. There may have been good reason for that. Counsel for the plaintiffs says there was. But we do know, as I have already recounted, that in 1982 Master Creightmore made an order for the trial of the action by a jury. In 1983, however, the defendants came into possession of more information about Sir James's dealings in shares and, as a result, they decided to apply for leave to amend their particulars of justification by adding more allegations. They were also of the opinion that, having regard to the new particulars of justification and the complexity of the action, the case was not one which could conveniently be tried with a jury. That was what came before Jupp J on 12 March. By this time the plaintiffs had decided that they wanted to amend their statement of claim. Sir James was of the opinion that the way that the case had been pleaded in the statement of claim delivered when the action started did not specify his real complaint against the defendants. In this statement of claim the article was set out in extenso and then, following the modern practice, the pleader set out what he alleged were the ordinary and natural meanings of the words. No innuendo was pleaded. Later, I think it was in 1982, it was decided that it would be prudent to plead an innuendo. An application was made to Master Creightmore for leave to amend the statement of claim in order to do so. Master Creightmore refused the application and, so far as I can judge, one reason at least for so refusing was that the innuendo had not been pleaded in accordance with RSC Ord 82, r 3. c

The matter was allowed to rest there until the hearing before Jupp J in March 1984. When the defendants' application for varying the mode of trial was before him the plaintiffs asked for an adjournment so that they could take further instructions from Sir James as to what he wanted and then amend their statement of claim. Jupp J refused an adjournment. f

After he had made the order which is the subject matter of this appeal the plaintiffs took out a summons which, in the ordinary way, would have been heard next week, for leave to amend their statement of claim. When this was brought to our attention by counsel for the plaintiffs we formed the opinion that as we had to consider the mode of trial, and the mode of trial necessarily involved our considering the issues in the case, it would be sensible for us to deal with the application to amend the statement of claim. In my opinion we had jurisdiction under RSC Ord 59 to do what we thought was sensible; but it was unnecessary for us to invoke that jurisdiction because counsel on both sides agreed that it would be convenient for us to deal with the application for leave to amend. We heard that application and we gave leave to amend. g

It is now necessary to call attention to the material parts of the amendment. What the plaintiffs were asking for, in their application for leave to amend, was leave to plead an innuendo; and they did it in this way. They said: 'The said words in their natural and ordinary meaning and/or by innuendo meant and were understood to mean that ...'. They left in two of the original alleged natural and ordinary meanings, and they went on as follows: j

'That the first plaintiff operated a deliberate policy of making false claims for a exemption from the disclosure requirements of local laws so as thereby to suppress information about his business in various parts of the world.'

The reference to 'local laws' arose in this way. There was a suggestion in the particulars of justification that not only had Sir James failed to comply with s 27 of the Companies Act 1967 but he had also failed to comply with the requirements of the Securities Exchange Commission (the SEC) in the United States.

b The proposed amendment went on to allege, as to meaning:
